with several portly old men. Don Pasquale approached him at once and whispered that these dignitaries had just returned from another interview with the Podesta, but in vain. "Ready-money and nothing but ready-money could get the key out of his pocket." "Are we really to understand," added Don Pasquale, "that your Excellency was in earnest about the kiss?"

"I give you my word of honour."

Don Pasquale's first step was to tell the chief dignitaries of the town of the stranger's munificent offer. They finally decided to commit the intelligence to the highest clerical authority.

The worthy Padre Sebastiano could hardly refrain from a right worldly expression, so great was his surprise. They had to assure him again and again that the distinguished foreigner was not joking.

Finally he leaned back in his chair, crossed his legs, took a pinch of snuff, and gave the matter his serious consideration.

"A most absurd story!" cried he, rubbing his hands. "As you know, my friends, the Lord Bishop comes to-morrow. We must try and get this business settled before he comes. I think I will undertake it. The good Bishop will absolve me. Dear me, what does the proverb say: 'A kiss given in honour harms nobody.' And if it should serve to liberate our Holy Patroness, old Novelli will certainly give in when he sees the money."

The Countess came in from the balcony.

"Oh, Holy pity!" cried one of the men, aghast. "Reverend sir, you are not thinking of making the proposition to the Podesta himself?"

"Yes, why not?" answered the priest. "He is the lord and master of Signora Elena's lips."

"Then all is lost," said Don Pasquale, in distress. "His avarice is great, but his jealousy is greater. I know what I am talking about, Reverend Father!" and the five old men nodded assent. Then Padre Sebastiano became very serious.

"So you want me to treat with the fair lady herself; ah-ah!" he took another pinch of snuff, reflected a little, then started to his feet with a comical sigh, and said:

"So I am going to make a go-between of myself in my old days! But what will not a man do for his patron saint. I may as well start at once."

Padre Sebastiano put on his newest Sunday cassock, brushed his hat with special care and started off. He chose the least frequented streets so that no one might detain him on the way, and also that he might reach the Podesta's house unobserved.

His plan of operation was, however, not very clear to him. More than once he stood still to think it over. His mind was so occupied that before he knew it he found himself on a terrace overlooking the Novelli's back building. He could see Signora Elena at her needlework and her little ones playing about.

By a round-about way Padre Sebastiano reached the wall of the same fruit garden where Don Pasquale had lain in ambush. The whole neighbourhood seemed deserted, so he might venture to try and attract Signora Novelli's attention. But he was a little man and would be obliged to climb a tree as Don Pasquale had done before him. To be sure, he was rather afraid of spoiling his new cassock, and besides—what if anyone should see him! He laughed softly to himself. "Ah, saints in Heaven, I certainly never dreamed of playing such boyish pranks in the service of my blessed patroness!"

Presently the Signora caught sight of the good padre, her reverend confessor, a comical-looking object, perched in the green tree-top, smiling up at her rather sheepishly, and gesticulating eagerly with his walking-stick.

"Good day, my daughter!" said he in a loud whisper. "I must positively speak to you without your husband's knowledge. Are you sure that nobody is listening?"

"No, no, indeed, Father!" answered her sweet voice plaintively. "I am never safe from him anywhere and especially to-day. He thinks that there was somebody in that tree before, trying to attract my attention. What can you want of me?"

"A kiss, my little pigeon; only a kiss," whispered Padre Sebastiano with a roguish smile. Her childish terror made her look so charming, that he could not resist the temptation to add to the little woman's bewilderment. Then she stood with wide eyes and open mouth; the crimson blood rushed to her face; then she uttered a low cry and vanished.

After a while she came back and peeped shyly over the parapet. "Reverend Father, are you still there?" whispered she, behind her hand. The Reverend Father had been sucking an orange to while away the time, and had not seen her return. When he heard her voice he started and answered with his mouth full of orange juice, "Yes, indeed, my daughter. I am still here. Why did you run away in such a hurry?"

"Oh, I am so terribly frightened. Suppose somebody should hear us. He follows me about everywhere, and the servants are not to be trusted. But it is not right for you to make fun of a poor woman like me!"

Padre Sebastiano answered eagerly: "But I am not in fun. What I said is sober earnest. Can you not come down into the garden, child, so that I can tell you about it?"

"No, no, impossible! All the doors are locked. But he has given me permission to go to church in the evening."

"Alone?"

"Yes, alone. He is not going. He is afraid of the people, proud as he is."

"Very well; I shall rely upon your coming," said Padre Sebastiano gravely, "for, let me tell you, Santa Elena's ransom depends on you, and you alone. God bless you, my child!" and with a kindly smile he climbed down from his perch.

A quarter of an hour later he knocked at the door of the Count's apartment.

The Count had returned from his walk warm and dusty, and stood at the washstand in his shirt-sleeves.

He thought that Don Pasquale was knocking to announce dinner, so called out "Come in!" and in came Padre Sebastiano with a polite bow. "Ah," was the Count's first thought, "that chatterbox of a landlord has brought the clergy about my ears. Now I suppose this Reverend Father will point out to me the exceeding impropriety and sinfulness of my offer, and show me how a miserable heretic like myself can earn the Church's blessing and St. Elena's thanks by spending one thousand lire, leaving the kiss out of the bargain, however."

He was so confused that his knowledge of Italian deserted him, and his apologies for his incomplete toilet, as well as his inquiries as to what procured to him the honour of so unexpected a visit, were a jumble of several different tongues.

The reverend gentleman was also embarrassed, and their mutual apologies would never have come to an end, if the Countess had not come in from the balcony and invited Padre Sebastiano to take a seat.

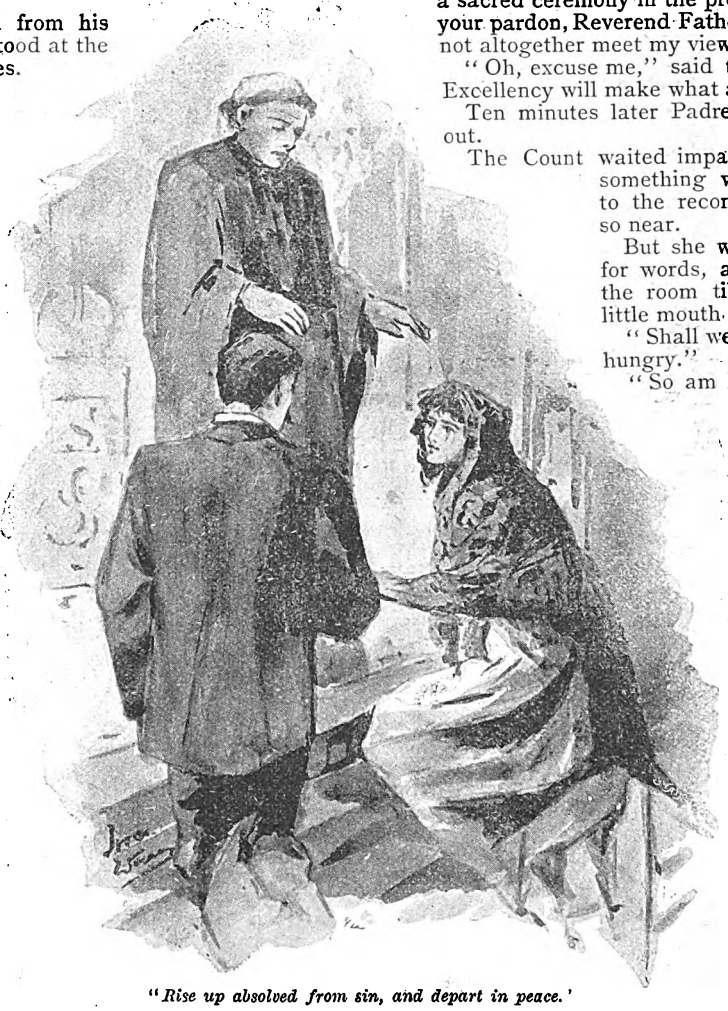
She sat down opposite him smiling, and opened the conversation in the most matter-of-course tone of voice, by the question, "I suppose you have come about the kiss, Reverend Father?"

Padre Sebastiano looked in amazement from the Count to his beautiful young wife, and at last managed to say: "Yes, of course—I mean—Signor Pasquale told me that your Excellency—Does the Signora know about it?"

"Yes, certainly," said the Countess, smiling. "My husband has no secrets from me. I think it is a charming idea."

The Count, with his red face buried in a towel, could not help muttering, "Well, upon my word!"

The Countess pretended not to hear him, and went on quite composedly, "I have been looking at the little woman all the morning. She is really lovely. I must confess that if I were a man I would give two thousand lire for a kiss from her. Indeed, I am afraid I should go so far as to carry her off from her old scarecrow of a husband."



"Rise up absolved from sin, and depart in peace."

The Countess went on cheerfully: "And you think that the young woman will consent to the kiss?"

The Reverend Father blushed like a bashful boy, and answered shyly: "Yes; I do not see why she should refuse. Your husband, Comtesse, is by no means repulsive. I—I mean—she has promised to come to church this evening. The Lord Bishop will be there you know. The church is beautifully dressed. The clergy and the choir boys will wear their finest vestments. Oh, your Excellency must see it! It will be fine. And after the service, when the people are gone and the church is dark, I think—I think she will not refuse. And if she should be so foolish, the Lord Bishop will have a serious word to say about it."

"So it seems that this unfortunate kiss is to be solemnised at a sacred ceremony in the presence of the clergy. I beg your pardon, Reverend Father, but this arrangement does not altogether meet my views," said the Count.

"Oh, excuse me," said the Padre politely. "Your Excellency will make what arrangements you please."

Ten minutes later Padre Sebastiano bowed himself out.

The Count waited impatiently for his wife to say something which should open the way to the reconciliation which now seemed so near.

But she would not speak. She hoped for words, and he paced up and down the room till she opened her charming little mouth to say:

"Shall we go down? I am dreadfully hungry."

"So am I," said he, hastily opening the door for her to pass.

. . . . .

The bells announced with joyful clamour the approach of St. Elena's festa. The day's heat had been succeeded by a cool, refreshing sea-breeze, and the Count, weary with climbing about the rocky streets, sat smoking in the balcony.

The Countess came out and said, still with the same ironical smile:

"Well, don't you hear the bells calling you? St. Elena is waiting for her deliverer."

Count Dietrich tossed his head angrily and tugged at his moustache. But, after a moment's reflection, he answered quite meekly, "Yes, I am ready. Are you going with me?"

"No indeed! I would not be so indiscreet as to interfere with your amusements."

The Count sprang to his feet and his eyes flashed. He took two steps towards his wife.

"Do you know, Lenore, I——" He had almost humbled himself to make the suicidal confession: "Do you know, Lenore, I have made an awful ass of myself!" But just in time he noticed her calm, superior smile, and his words remained unspoken. He seized his hat, and, with a stiff little military bow, he left the fast darkening room.

With a grim determination in his look, like a noble criminal determined to carry out his own sentence, he walked down the street to the church.

At the close of the ceremonies the clergy formed a procession and made a short visit to each of the saints in the little side chapels. The Count stood leaning against one of the slender Moorish pillars which supported the low gallery which ran round the rotunda.

The procession passed; everybody bowed deeply, some women fell on their knees and tried to kiss the Bishop's hand outstretched in blessing. Just behind the Bishop walked Padre Sebastiano, his kindly old face full of anxious care. His eyes were searching here and there over the heads of the crowd. Ah, now he catches sight of the eccentric German gentleman. He touches his arm in passing and whispers: "I am in despair, my dear sir; she will not do it. She is in such fear of her tyrant's anger, that even the promise of all manner of heavenly blessings cannot move her."

He kept hold of the Count's sleeve and drew him gently along. Suddenly he grasped him tightly by the arm, so that the Count could hardly suppress an exclamation of pain.

"Eccola!" ("There she is") whispered the Padre hastily, and nodded towards a little woman kneeling near by. She had just caught the Bishop's hand, and was looking up beseechingly into the benignant prelate's face.

The Count broke from the Padre's grasp, and stood as if rooted to the spot. Yes, it was she! And she was so far, far prettier close at hand than at a distance. He had never seen such fabulously innocent, childish eyes in a woman's face, and it seemed far less idiotic and reprehensible to have offered one thousand lire for a kiss from those lips than it had done half-an-hour ago.

After the procession had passed he stepped forward, intending to speak to the devout little beauty; but she seemed to recognise him, and a burning flush suffused her pale cheeks.

She rose hastily, drew her black lace veil over her face and slipped away in the crowd. After a moment's hesitation, the Count followed her. But he had hesitated too long; she had already disappeared in the crowd. The Count elbowed his way recklessly out, but she was nowhere to be seen, neither on the steps nor in the Piazza. Could she have slipped out by another door? He ran round the church. No, there was no other entrance. Perhaps, she was still inside. He entered the cathedral again. Choir-boys and acolytes were extinguishing the lights. She was not there.

But wait, what was that? A slender female form, with a black lace mantle over the head. Ah, there she was at last! She stood below the pulpit in earnest conversation with a black cassock which could hardly belong to anybody but Padre Sebastiano. Now the old gentleman turned round. It was indeed he. The sound of footsteps had attracted his attention and when he recognised the Count, he opened the little bronze door under the pulpit steps and pushed the lady through.

The Count rushed up, seized the good priest by the arm and in his excitement said to him in German: "What have you done with her? Why do you hide her from me? Am I to have my kiss or not?"

Padre Sebastiano placed his broad back against the door and waved the excited man gently away. A broad smile lighted up his kindly face, and he cooed softly to him: "Gently, gently; be quiet, be quiet, my son! She has changed her mind, the little pigeon. You shall have your kiss, Excellenza, but not here in the lighted church. The poor little thing is too timid."

"Of course, of course; in outer darkness, if she likes it better," cried the Count impatiently. Then he tried to get hold of the door handle.

"Excuse me a moment. Do you happen to have the one thousand lire by you? If so, I must beg you to——" and with an insinuating smile he held out his open hand.

The Count felt in his breast-pocket, and said with an angry shrug: "How suspicious you Italians are. Well, I'll pay in advance," and hastily took a red bank-note from his pocket-book and pressed it into the hand of the priest, who now drew aside with a polite bow.

Now at last the road was clear. Padre Sebastiano himself threw open the little bronze door for him. His heart beat faster than on the day when, as an ensign, he had fought his first duel. The door closed behind him. It was very dark, but by the faint gleam of light from the little shuttered window, he could see a shadowy form. He whispered softly, "Signora Elena!" a garment rustled, the shadowy figure glided towards him, and the next moment he felt a pair of soft warm lips against his own, two arms were thrown about his neck, and the delicate little hands clasped behind his head.

His expectations were more than realised. Never in her most loving moments had his Lenore kissed him so tenderly, so fervently. Ah, these hot-blooded Southern women knew how to love! It would be a pious mission, a work of humanity to rescue this lovely creature from that horrible, ogreish miser. He clasped her closer, and warmly returned her caresses.

But now sighed Lenore: "Stop, stop, enough! You will smother me! Forgive me, Dietrich, forgive me! I have been very silly! Forgive me the deceit. I love you so dearly. I cannot live when you are angry with me."

The Count's arms sank helplessly down. "You, Lenore!" cried he, quite overcome with astonishment.

"Yes, you dear, faithless man. It is I, your wedded wife! To be sure I cannot give you kisses worth one thousand lire apiece, but——"

He silenced her with kisses, and murmured, "You dear, sweet, lovely creature; can you, indeed, forgive me?"

He felt her tears upon his cheeks, though she did not answer, and then they went out of the dark, close little room.

Padre Sebastiano stood outside the door and shook his finger playfully at them.

"Aha!" said he. "You have kept me waiting a long time!"

With one accord they each seized one of his hands and stooped to kiss it. He drew back and said modestly, shaking his grey head: "No, no; not that, my dear children. I do not deserve that. I am only a poor, sinful man, and have been cherishing sinful thoughts. May St. Elena intercede for me when I come to make my atonement. But I am a priest, and have power to absolve from sin when I see true repentance. You are, I know, arch-heretics and Lutherans, but if you do not despise God's mercy——"

Count Dietrich seized his wife's hand and drew her to her knees beside him, and the old priest laid his hands on them in blessing, and said, in rather a trembling voice: "Rise up absolved from sin, and depart in peace!"

OUR Count, as we called him, had lived here so long that we forgot that he was not an Englishman born and bred. It was chiefly when he chose to relate some strange tale of his native Poland that we remembered that he had been obliged to seek refuge in this country owing to the part he took in the unsuccessful uprising of 1831. One winter evening a conversation about hunting led him to relate, in perfect seriousness, the following wild and legend-like story of his early life in Poland:—

The year before the rising I went from my native place to spend Christmas at the house of my uncle in the wooded country of Upper Lithuania. He was a nobleman who boasted his descent from one of the oldest houses in Poland, and still held the estate which his ancestors had defended through many a Tartar invasion. My uncle had three sons—Armand, Henri, and Constantine—brave, handsome young men. His nearest neighbours were a family named Lorenski whose property bordered on my uncle's land. There was not a family of their station within leagues; but, independently of that circumstance, the household had attractions for my cousins, as it consisted of the young Count Emerich, his sister Constanza, and two orphan cousins, Marcella and Eustachia, who had been brought up with them from childhood.

My stay at my uncle's house had not been long when I discovered that Armand was as good as engaged to Marcella, and Henri to Eustachia, while Constantine, the youngest and handsomest of the three brothers, paid vain though deferential court to Constanza. The rising was not then publicly talked of, though known throughout the country to be in full preparation. All the young and brave hearts among us were pledged to it, and my cousins did not hesitate to tell me in confidence that Cousin Emerich and his sister were its chief promoters in that district. They had a devoted assistant in Father Cassimir.

I had scarcely got well acquainted with him and the Lorenskis when two more Christmas visitors arrived at the house. They were a brother and sister, Russian nobles, known as Count Theodore and Countess Juana. Their native place was St. Petersburg. They had spent years in travelling over Europe, and, though nobody knew the extent of their estates, it was supposed to be great, for they spared no expense, and always kept the best society.

Latterly they had been somewhat attracted to Poland, and became so popular among our country nobles that they were invited from house to house, making new friends wherever they went. Count Theodore was a splendid shot, his sister was matchless in singing, and neither ever tired of fun or frolic.

The Lorenskis and the travellers had become fast friends almost on their first acquaintance, which had taken place the previous winter; and Count Theodore and his sister had performed a long winter journey from St. Petersburg to celebrate Christmas time with them.

The peasants said it was never lucky when Christmas came without a wolf-hunt; but that year it was likely to do so. The snow kept falling at intervals, with days of fog and thaw between, till the night before the vigil. In my youth the Lithuanians kept Christmas after the fashion of the old northern times. The celebration began with great devotion, and ended with great feasting.

Christmas Eve was considered particularly sacred; many traditional ceremonies and strange beliefs hung about it, and the more pious held that no one should engage in any profane occupation, or think of going to sleep after sunset. When the day before Christmas came, our disappointment concerning the wolf-hunt lay still heavy on many a mind; but when we rose, we were delighted to see that a strong frost had set in during the night, and by the afternoon no finer prospect of sleighing could be desired.

My cousins and I stood at my uncle's door. Suddenly our ears caught the sound of bells and laughing voices, and in a few minutes up drove the Lorenski sledge in its gayest trappings, with Constanza, the Russian countess, and the young cousins, all looking blithe and rosy in the frosty air, while Emerich and Theodore sat in front, in true hunter's trim, with Father Cassimir himself in charge of the reins.

They had two noble horses of the best Tartar blood, unequalled in the province, as we knew, for speed and strength; and Emerich's cheerful voice first saluted us with: "Ho! friends, it is seven hours yet till midnight, won't you come with us? It is a shame to let Christmas in without a wolf-skin!"

Our hunting gear was donned in a trice; and with my uncle's most trusty man, Metski, to assist in driving, away we went at full speed to the forest. Father Cassimir was an experienced general in expeditions of that kind. He knew the turns in the woods where the wolves scented best; and when we had got fairly among the oaks, down went the pork. For some time it dragged on without a single wolf appearing, though the odour came strong and savoury through cords and straw. "If I were a wolf myself, I would come for that," said old Metski.

The priest quickened his speed, vowing he would not say mass without a skin that night; and we got deeper into the wilderness of oak and pine. Like most of our Lithuanian forests, it had no underwood. We could see the long icicles gleaming like pendants of diamonds for miles through the wild woods, but never a wolf.

The priest began to look disappointed. I have said they were in great spirits, particularly Count Theodore; indeed, he was generally the gayer of the pair; his sister being evidently more prudent—and in this respect they resembled the Lorenskis. Many a jest, however, on the non-appearance of the wolves went round our sledge, of which I remember nothing now except that we all laughed till the old woods rang.

"Be quiet, good children," said the priest, turning in his seat of command; "you make noise enough to frighten all the wolves in creation."

"They won't come to-night, father; they are preparing for mass," cried Count Theodore. "Juana, if the old Finn were here now, wouldn't he be useful?"

"Perhaps he might," said the Countess hesitatingly, with a forced laugh; and she cast a look of strange warning and reproof on her brother.

"What Finn?" asked the priest, catching the Count's words.

"Oh, he is talking of an old nursery-tale we had in St. Petersburg," hastily interposed the lady, though I thought her face had no suggestion of a nursery-tale in it at that moment.

"About the Finns, I'll warrant," said Father Cassimir; "they are a strange people. My brother, the merchant, told me that he knew one of them at Abo who said he had a charm for the wolves; but somebody informed against him for smuggling, and the Russian Government sent him to the lead mines of Siberia. By St. Sigismund, there's the first of them!"

As the priest spoke a large wolf appeared, and half the guns in the sledge were raised.

"Not yet, not yet," said our experienced commander, artfully turning away as another and another came in sight; "there are more coming," and he gradually slackened the speed of our horses. Far off through the moonlit woods and the frozen night we could hear a strange murmur, which grew and swelled on all sides to a chorus of mingled howlings as the wolves came on by troops.

"Fire now, friends," cried Father Cassimir. "We are likely to have skins enough for Christmas." And, bang! went all our barrels. I saw five fall; but, contrary to expectations, the wolves did not retire—they stood for an instant snarling at us. The distant howling continued and grew nearer; and then, from every glade and alley, down the frozen forest, came by scores and hundreds such a multitude of wolves as we could not have believed to exist in all Lithuania.

"Hand me my gun and take the reins, Metski," cried Father Cassimir. "Drive for your life!" he added, in an undertone; but everyone in the sledge heard him.

Heaven knows how many we killed, but it seemed of no use. Our pork was swallowed—straw and all. The creatures were pressing upon us on every side, as if trying to surround the sledge; and it was fearful to see the leaps that some grey old fellows would take at Metski and the horses.

Our driver did his part like a man, making a thousand winds and turns through the wood; but still the wolves pursued us. Fortunately the firing kept them off, and, thanks to our noble horses, they were never able to get ahead of us; but as far as we could see in the moonlight came the howling packs, as if rising from the earth.

We had seen nothing like it, and all of us did our best in firing, especially Count Theodore, but his shots had little effect, for his hand shook, and I know not if any but myself saw the looks of terrified intelligence which he exchanged with his sister. Still, she and the Lady Constanza kept up their courage, though the young cousins were white as snow, and our ammunition was fast decreasing.

"Yonder is a light," said Constanza at last, as the poor horses became unmanageable from fright and weariness. "It is from the cottage of old Wenzel, the woodman."

"If we could reach that," said Father Cassimir, "and leave the horses to their fate. It is our only chance."

No one contradicted the priest's arrangement, for his last words were felt to be true—though a pang passed over Constanza's face at the thought of leaving our brave and faithful horses to the wolves. Louder rose the howls behind us as Metski urged on with all his might, and far above all went the shout of Father Cassimir—he had the best lungs in the province: "Ho, Wenzel! Open the door, for pity's sake!"

We heard the old man reply, sent one well-aimed volley in among the wolves, and as they recoiled man and woman leaped from the sledge—for our Polish girls are active—and rushed into the cottage, when old Wenzel instantly double-barred the door.

It was woeful to hear the cries of pain and terror from the poor horses as we deserted them; the next instant the wolves were upon them. We saw them from the window, as thick as flies stuck on sugar. How we fired upon them, and with what goodwill old Wenzel helped us, praying all the time to every saint in the calendar, you may imagine.

Ammunition was by this time getting scarce among us There was not a man with a charge left but old Wenzel, who supplied us as long as he could. At length, loading his gun with his last charge, he laid it quietly in the corner, saying one did not know what use might be for it, and he never liked an empty gun.

The wolves had now left nothing but the bones of our horses, which they had dragged round and round the cottage, with a din of howling that almost drowned our voices within. Then they seized on the bodies of their own slain companions, which were devoured to the very skins; and still the gathering was going on. We could see them coming in troops through the open glades of the forest, as if aware that some human prey was in reserve. The hut was strongly built of great pine logs, but it was fearful to hear them tearing at the door, and scratching at the foundations.

The bravest among us was terrified by these sounds. Metski loudly avowed his belief that the wolves were sent upon us as a punishment for hunting on Christmas Eve, and fell instantly to his prayers. Wenzel flung a blazing brand among them from the window, but they did not seem to care for fire; and three of them were so near leaping in that he drove to the log shutter and gave up that method of defence.

None of the party seemed so far overcome with terror as Count Theodore; his spirit and prudence both seemed to forsake him. When the wolves began to scratch he threw himself on his face in a corner, and kept moaning and praying in Russian, of which none of us understood a syllable but old Wenzel.

Emerich and I would have spoken to him, but the woodman stopped us with a strange sign. Count Theodore had taken the relic of some saint from a pocket-book which he carried in his breast, and was, in Russian fashion, confessing his sins over it; while his sister sat silent and motionless by the fire, with livid face and clasped hands. The fire was burning low, but I saw the woodman's face darken. He stepped to the corner and took down his gun, as I believed, to take a last shot at the wolves. Count Theodore was in his way. Wenzel levelled the weapon for an instant at the prostrate man, and before I could speak or interpose a report, followed by a faint, shrill shriek from the Russian, rang through the hut. We rushed to him, but the count was dead. A bullet had gone right through his heart.

"My gun has shot the count, and the wolves will leave us now," said Wenzel coolly. "I heard him say in his prayers that a Finn, now in the Siberian mines, had vowed to send them on him and his company wherever he went."

As the woodman spoke, he handed to Count Emerich, with a hoarse whisper, a bloody pocket-book, taken from the body, and, turning to Juana, said something loud and threatening to her in the Russian tongue. The lady only bowed her head, seeming of all in the hut to be the least surprised or concerned at the death of her brother.

As for us, the complicated horrors of the night had left us stunned and stupefied, till the rapid diminution of the wolfish din, the sounds of shouts and voices, and the glare of torches lighting up the forest, brought us to the window. The wolves were scouring away in all directions; there was a greyness in the eastern sky, for Christmas day was breaking; and from all sides the tenantry of the count, and my uncle, with skates and sledges, guns and torches, were pouring to the rescue.

They had searched for us almost since midnight, fearing that something fearful had detained Father Cassimir and his company from mass. There were wonderfully few wolves shot in the retreat, and we all went home to Count Emerich's house, but not in triumph, for with us went the body of the Russian, of which old Wenzel was one of the bearers. The unanimous determination we expressed—to bring him to justice as a murderer—was silenced when Emerich showed us in confidence a letter from the Russian Minister, and a paper with all our names in a list of the disaffected Upper Lithuania, which he had found in Theodore's pocket-book.

After that we all affirmed that Wenzel's gun had gone off by accident; and on the same good Christmas Day Count Emerich, with a body of his retainers, escorted the Lady Juana to a convent at the other end of the province, the superior of which was his aunt. There is a wooden cross with his name and a Latin inscription on it marking Count Theodore's grave, by our old church on the edge of the forest. No one ever inquired after him, and the company of that terrible night are far scattered.

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

CHAPTER XLIII.

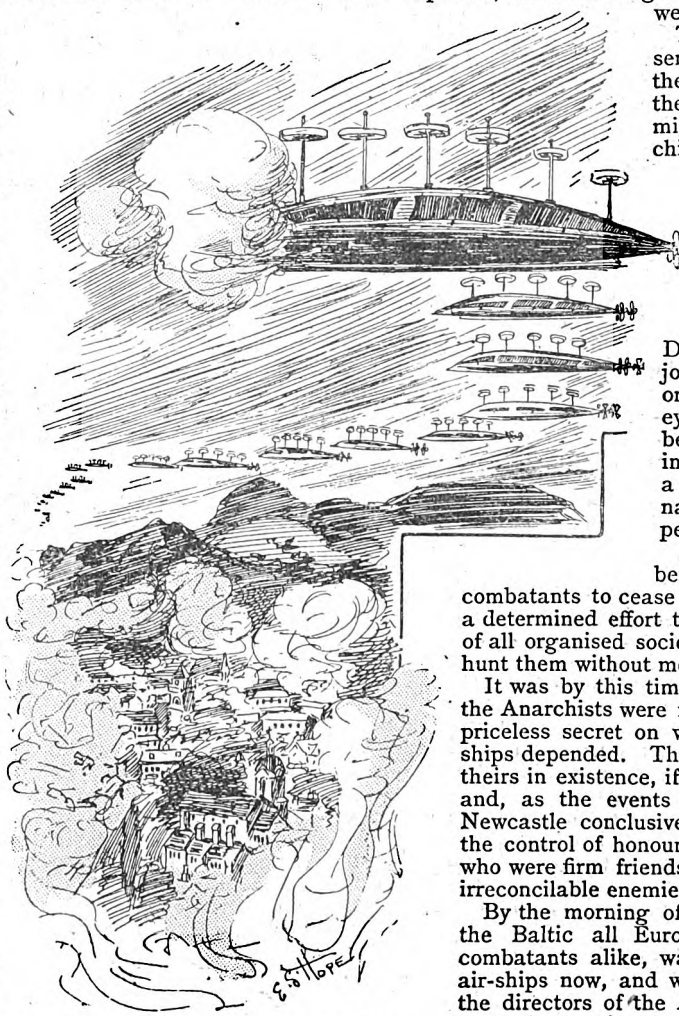
The Outlaws' Eerie.

Immediately the signal to cease firing had been obeyed the air-ships formed in line, and then the Revanche flew the signal, "Mount Prieta at a hundred miles an hour. Follow me. Do as I do."

The fleet was now floating over the Bay of Kiel. An almost straight line of over a thousand miles in length drawn south-west from Kiel, marked the course that the Revanche began to steer towards the stronghold, which the organised forces of Anarchy, now ranged under the leadership of Renault, had established, in a little rock-walled valley, or rather a deep gorge fenced in with precipices impassable to man or beast, which lay on the northern verge of Mount Prieta.

This is the highest peak of the Cantabrian mountains, the chain, which a glance at the map of Europe will show, running in continuation of the Pyrenean chain from the Bidassoa to Cape Finisterre. Another look at the map will show that the line of flight would pass over Hamburg, Bremen, Antwerp, Paris, and Bordeaux.

Max kept the fleet at an elevation of two thousand feet, and as each of the cities was reached he halted his fleet, sent a couple of shells from the bow gun of each vessel into the midst of it, and then, passing over it at ten miles an hour, dropped half-a-dozen fire-bombs from each of the ships which were flying extended in a long line abreast. This was, of course, merely done for the sake of further intensifying by purely wanton destruction the terrorism which the news of the frightful termination of the Battle of the Baltic had by this time carried like wildfire over the telegraphs of the Continent.



Dropped half-a-dozen fire-bombs from each of the ships.

That night Europe went almost mad with fear. The impartial destruction of the remains of the contending fleets in the Baltic proved, not only that the Anarchists saw in the warfare that was being waged on land and sea an opportunity ready made to their hand for intensifying their terrorism of Society ten-fold, but also that against a fleet of air-ships so powerful as the one under Renault's command, both the Russian aerostats, from which such tremendous results had been expected, and the mightiest naval armaments afloat were absolutely defenceless.

This of itself was enough to send a thrill of terror through the Continent, but when, within the space of twelve hours from mid-day to midnight, five of the chief cities in Germany, Belgium and France had been set on fire in a hundred places at once, it did not take long before terror was aggravated into something like delirium. The war, in which Germany and Denmark had now definitely joined, and upon which, under ordinary circumstances, the eyes of the world would have been fixed with all-absorbing interest, already occupied quite a secondary place in the imagination and the fears of the peoples of Europe.

Indeed, voices were already being raised in appeal to the combatants to cease their own strife and unite in a determined effort to meet the common enemies of all organised society in their own element and hunt them without mercy out of the world.

It was by this time perfectly well known that the Anarchists were not in sole possession of the priceless secret on which the power of the air-ships depended. There were other air-ships than theirs in existence, if anything superior to theirs, and, as the events that had taken place at Newcastle conclusively proved, they were under the control of honourable and distinguished men, who were firm friends of order, and therefore the irreconcilable enemies of Anarchy.

By the morning of the day after the Battle of the Baltic all Europe, combatants and non-combatants alike, was asking where were these air-ships now, and what possible reasons could the directors of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate have for keeping their ships out of the way and allowing the Anarchists to pursue their unheard-of depredations unmolested?

The next morning the Times published the following letter from the Chairman of the Syndicate:—

"Sir,—Will you allow me to remind those who are apparently under the impression that the Aerial Navigation Syndicate has a special mission and obligation to protect Society at large from the onslaughts of the Anarchists, that this Syndicate is a private Corporation founded primarily upon a commercial basis for the furtherance of the purposes of those who have put their work and their money into it. What those purposes are, or in what manner they will be carried out, is our business and no one else's.

"We recognise no obligations to employ the force at our disposal according to the direction of any Government or Governments. We have broken no laws and attacked no one save the enemies of Society, and therefore our right to complete freedom of action cannot be impugned. We shall act when and how we think fit, and that is all that I either can or will say on the subject.

"I may add that, so far, the publicity given by the newspapers with regard to events still fresh in the public memory has, in each instance, directly assisted the Anarchists in their designs. Through the newspapers Renault's accomplices received the disguised message which he gave them from the dock at Bow Street; through the same medium they were informed of the precise hour at which his execution was to take place, and so were able to rescue him in the nick of time; and thus, too, the rescue of the crew of the Vengeur and the terrible tragedy at Newcastle were directly due to information derived from the minute details published in the newspapers.

"I feel sure that all sensible people will agree with me that it would be something worse than madness for us to follow the same foolish course.—Yours truly, "HIRAM S. MAXIM."

To this letter there was obviously no other answer than the admission that the position taken up by the Syndicate was unassailable from the points of view both of legality and expediency. Neither the British nor any other Government had any claim to the knowledge of the secret of the motive-power which was practically the sole yet priceless possession of the Syndicate. The Government was free to experiment in the same direction if it chose, but it had no power to compel a disclosure of the secret which had been brought from Utopia.

Therefore, there was nothing else for Society to do but to wonder and to wait, while warfare on land and sea and Anarchy militant in the air spread terror and disquiet through the nations, and undermined the very foundations upon which the social fabric rested. But great and all as was the panic which obtained under the new reign of terror, it was by no means lacking in justification. Indeed, if all the facts could have been made public, they would rather have intensified than diminished it.

During the short period that had elapsed since Max had escaped with the Vengeur from Utopia he had accomplished wonders both of construction and organisation. He had used the practically unlimited funds which the depredations of the Destroyer on the North and South Atlantic had placed at his disposal with an administrative skill well worthy of a far better cause.

By means of the disguised agencies which Hartog had established, and he had perfected, he had been able to obtain the materials for the construction of a fleet of twenty-five air-ships for warlike purposes and one aerial transport, a very large craft capable of lifting great weights and conveying them through the air at a speed which, though only about half that of the cruisers, was still quite enough to put her beyond the risk of capture save by the Syndicate's air-ships, of which only two were known to be in existence.

This transport, which he had named the Voyageur, formed the link of communication between the camp of the Anarchists on Mount Prieta and the outside world. She never travelled save by night and under the escort of two of the cruisers, and her duty was to meet the Pilgrim, which still passed unsuspected as the private yacht of a wealthy South American gentleman, whose real name was Leo Marcel, at stated rendezvous at sea, out of the regular tracks of shipping, and to relieve her of the stores, guns, ammunition, or treasure which she carried, and bring them back through the air to the camp, which none of the air-ships were permitted even to approach, save under cover of clouds or darkness.

The camp itself, despite the ruggedness and forbidding character of its surroundings, was admirably fitted by nature for the purpose to which Max had devoted it. The gorge was walled in by rocks ranging from a hundred to a hundred and fifty feet in height on all sides save the north, where, through a deep narrow cleft, the stream of water, which came from the upper part of the mountain and traversed the centre of the little sheltered valley, found its way down the slopes which inclined toward the shore of the Bay of Biscay.

On either side of this stream extended for about three hundred yards to the walls of rock a fairly level sloping plain of light sandy soil, on which between fifty and sixty wooden huts and workshops were now standing. As long as it remained undiscovered by the only enemies that Renault and his followers had to fear, this refuge formed a hidden, entrenched camp from which the Anarchists could safely defy the combined forces of Europe.

From it they could issue forth to slay and plunder and destroy, and to it they could return without the slightest fear of being followed. It was, in fact, a very fortress of Anarchy entrenched in the midst of Civilisation, impregnable and unassailable by all means save one, and only treachery or the most improbable accident could bring that means into operation against it.

A few minutes after midnight on the 17th July, Renault's fleet sighted the dark summit of Mount Prieta rising high above the sea of clouds over which the air-ships had been flying at an ever-increasing altitude after leaving Bordeaux in flames behind them.

Speed was immediately slackened, and the fleet swept slowly forward until a single faint ray of light became visible at the bottom of the dark gulf formed by the gorge in the mountain side. Then the propellers stopped, and one by one the ships sank downwards, until they rested side by side on a little plateau at the upper part of the valley. The Revanche landed last, and as they disembarked Max said to Hartog:

"Well, aerial navigation is a very fine thing in its way, but it's a relief to get your feet on terra firma again and have a good stretch, after all. Isn't the air of this valley splendid? I wonder what the powers that be down yonder would give for a sniff at it."

"I don't tink myself," said Hartog sententiously, "dat dey vould find it very goot for deir healts unless dey came mit an air-fleet dat vould make it very unhealty for us. But goot air it is, and I can tell you I am as hungry as a volf. Ve had better go and get some supper."

"Yes," replied Max, "that's a very sensible and practical remark. I used to think birds of prey voracious to the extent of greediness——"

"But now dat you are a bird of prey yourself you see dat flying gifs a big appetite. Dat's so, eh?" interrupted Hartog, with a guttural chuckle at his own joke.

"If you like to put it so, yes," laughed Renault. "But you might have put it more politely, perhaps. Still I'll return good for evil for once, and ask you to supper. Lea expects me to-night, and I daresay she'll have enough for two or three."

"Eh? Vat is dat? Is Mam'zelle Lea here? I did not know dat de camp of de outlaws vas putified by such a charming presence as hers."

"Look here, Franz," said Renault, with another laugh, "I shall begin to think that the air of the upper regions has made you drunk if you begin to talk like that. That speech was the nearest approach to poetry that you've made by at least a thousand miles. I must try and remember it for Lea's benefit. But, by the way, you mustn't call her 'Mam'zelle Lea' now."

"Ah, I see!" said Hartog, nodding and patting him on the shoulder with his little fat and somewhat flabby hand. "I remember vat you said dat night in de club-room. And so de proud demoiselle has surrendered at discretion, has she? Vell, I congratulate you, friendt Max. I don't tink fery much of vomen myself, for deir mental machinery is altogeder too complicated. I likes my own machinery much better. I feel I can depend more upon it. But still Lea is as putiful as she is goot, and in every way a vorty mate for de chief of de Outlaws of de Air. But you haf not told me yet how she came here."

"Franz," said Max, "if you were not literally rolling in your ill-gotten gains, I should think you wanted to borrow something from me, but as that can't be the case I suppose I must put it down to pure good nature. As for the way Lea got here, that's very simple.

"You see the notoriety that Mrs. Cora Dail got through that unfortunate affair at Bow Street and the Old Bailey got rather oppressive, and then some long-nosed mouchard in the service of the French police managed to smell out a distant connection between her and one of the President's servants, who was suspected of putting that bomb in the carriage, and so Madame Dail decided to return to America while the road was yet open to her.

"She sold off her house before any of our stray shells or bombs smashed it up, and sailed from Marseilles to New York in that Messageries steamer, the Champagne, which you remember never was heard of again. She had the misfortune to fall in with three of our air-ships, of which the Revanche was one, and they stopped her, kidnapped Madame Dail and two or three other lady friends of hers, some of whom you know. Then they cleared everything that was light and handy and valuable out of the ship, and then sent her to the bottom, as it wasn't thought advisable that she should get to New York and tell any tales."

"Ah!" said Hartog, with a chuckle. "So dat is vat became of her, is it? I tought some accident of dat kind had happened, ven I heard she had not arrifed. Max, I am fery glad to heard dat you haf learnt visdom at last, and seen de folly of being merciful to your enemies. De oder course is just as cheap and piles safer."

"Yes," said Max. "I think you're right. I haven't forgotten what a fool I made of myself when I let those fellows from the Bremen go, and I can tell you that the Society that tried to hang me isn't going to get much more mercy at my hands. But here we are at my humble home, for the time being, and there is Lea's own fair self coming to meet us. Now do try and remember that pretty speech for her again."

CHAPTER XLIV.

NEWS AND BAD NEWS.

THE building from which Lea, clothed from head to foot in costly furs, came to meet them was a small wooden house of the bungalow type, which can be purchased in sections and put together with very little trouble. Most of the dwelling houses in the camp were of this kind, and had been taken out to sea in the Pilgrim, transferred from her to the Voyageur, and then carried through the air to the gorge.

"Welcome, my lord, you come in victory, as usual, I suppose?" said Lea as she came forward to meet Max with her gloved hands outstretched.

"Yes," said Max. "In victory, as usual, if you can call it victory where all the destruction is on one side; but, as far as amusement has gone, we have done very well indeed. We have rescued friend Franz here with his crew from the clutches of British law, set Newcastle on fire, watched the British, Russian, and German fleets do each other mortal damage in the Baltic, and then finished the work for them, and after that, as we came home, we left our cards on the good bourgeois of Hamburg, Bremen, Antwerp, Paris, and Bordeaux, and gave them the wherewithal to illuminate their cities in honour of our visit. Altogether, we have had a fairly busy and most enjoyable four days of it."

"Bravo!" said Lea, slipping her hand through his arm as she turned back towards the house. "What a pleasant state of excitement Europe must be in now. But I suppose you must be as hungry as the usual hunter, so you won't be sorry to hear that supper is ready."

"Not at all," said Max. "Franz here compares his hunger to that of a wolf, and mine would do credit to an Indian after a four days' fast. I suppose you've got enough for both of us?"

"Oh, yes, plenty, and the Voyageur has brought back some very nice champagne you will be glad to hear. I believe it originally came from the Duke of Downshire's yacht, which met with an accident the other day on a cruise to the North Cape."

"Oh! so the Voyageur's back, is she?" said Max, as they entered the house. "I am glad of that, because it's quite time that we had some definite information as to the movements of the enemy. We had better ask Maurin to supper, and then he can give us the news."

"While we're about it," said Lea, "we may as well have a party, so I'll ask the Rollands and your engineer Raoul to come too, for I know Sophie is dying to see him. Those two will be going into partnership before long, I fancy."

"Dey vouldt make a very goot match if dey did," observed Hartog. "Taxil is a fine young fellow, and a goot Anarchist, and Sophie Vronsky is a goot girl, and fery clever mit her pen, as dose Russian passports she vonce did for me clearly proved. Jah, dey vill do very vell for each oder, I should tink."

"Very well, then," laughed Lea, "we will make a match of it. Now, if you two want a wash, you had better go and get one. I'll have supper ready in half an hour, and then we can make an interesting night of it. Sophie and I had a good nap this afternoon, so we don't care how long we sit up."

Unpretentious as the bungalow looked from outside, its interior was a marvel of warmth and luxury. Between purchase and plunder, Lea had fitted it up with a dainty magnificence that made its interior at least no bad exchange for her boudoir in the Rue Vernet. The little dining-room in which the party sat down to supper about one o'clock, lighted by a couple of silken-shaded lamps on high standards of solid silver, and warmed by a fire of blazing pine logs, was as cosy an apartment as ever a conspiracy was hatched in, and the supper to which these epicurean Anarchists sat down, would not have disgraced the Hotel Bristol or the Café de l'Opera.

Lea and Sophie had cooked it with their own hands, for domestic service was as yet unknown in the Anarchist camp, and the company waited upon them selves and each other with a free-and-easiness which was of the essence of true Bohemianism. In fact, no more well-bred, pleasant-mannered supper party could have been found in Europe than this little company of murderous conspirators, whose names, so far as they were known, were execrated throughout the continent, which was just then shuddering in a frenzy of panic under their last assault.

Until the meal itself was over the conversation was general, but as soon as the two girls had cleared the table of the remains of the eatables, and replaced them with a variety of liquids, cigars and cigarettes were lighted, and Max called upon Maurin, the captain of the Voyageur, for such news as he had to tell of the outside world.

"You will be able to get most of it pretty fully from the newspapers I have brought with me," he said in reply. "But I can give you an epitome of it now, and also some particulars which have not found their way into print. In the first place, nothing has been heard of the air-ship War-Hawk, commanded by Sir Harry Milton, which captured M. Franz here. After leaving Newcastle, she vanished with the Vengeur, and we have not been able to pick up a trace of her since.

"It is rumoured that the Syndicate has another vessel ready to take the air, if not actually afloat, and also that before long a large fleet will be ready for service, but in what part of the world the ships are being built, or when they will actually get afloat, we have not been able to learn."

"That doesn't seem to say much for the intelligence of our agents," said Max with a frown.

Maurin shrugged his shoulders and replied apologetically: "It would seem so, but unhappily the Syndicate appears to have unlimited command of money and so can pay any price for secrecy. Added to that the terrorism which you have inspired both in Europe and America has led to the most extraordinary precautions being taken at all the dockyards and arsenals, ship-building yards, and manufactories, and it is practically impossible to obtain reliable information.

"It is believed that the ships are being built on islands in remote parts of the sea, and that no one is allowed to put foot on these islands who is not personally known to the directors or their friends. We have found that the Syndicate holds no meetings, but Maxim, the chairman, goes to his offices in Victoria Street, Westminster, quite in the ordinary way, and as though nothing had ever happened."

Lea, clothed from head to foot in costly furs, came to meet them.

"Then we must pay him a visit," said Max. "What is the number? Thirty-two, isn't it?"

"Jah, dat's it," chimed in Hartog. "I vent to see him dere vonce about an engine for his aeroplane, and de old fellow insulted me by telling me dat he tought he knew more about engines as I did, so I came avay; but I should like to see him again—at de oder end of von of his own guns."

"All right, we'll go and leave cards on the Maxim-Nordenfelt Company in a day or two, and now, Maurin, can you tell us anything about the Nautilus, and that Lieutenant Wyndham, who ought to have been dead long ago?"

"Ah, yes. Lieutenant Wyndham is by this time almost as famous a man as you are yourself, and that Nautilus has proved herself to be a really marvellous craft. You know, I suppose, that the French squadron which went to the Baltic to assist the Russians, got through the narrow seas under cover of a general attack on the English Channel Ports and Dover?

"About a week before, the British had been very badly beaten in the Mediterranean. They had neither ships nor men there to give her anything like a chance against the Toulon fleet and the Russian Black Sea fleet, which had forced the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus. What force she had in the Mediterranean was caught between the French and Russians and almost annihilated.

"Then the combined Franco-Russian squadron forced the passage of the Straits of Gibraltar, and made a descent on the south coast of England just when the French squadrons from Brest and Cherbourg were ready to make a dash for the north. The dash, as you know, was quite successful, but the other part of the operations ended in complete disaster, thanks chiefly to Lieutenant Wyndham and the Nautilus. She had been fitted with two guns of a new type, only lately invented by Maxim——"

"Always that confounded Maxim!" interrupted Renault, between his clenched teeth. "That man's dangerous, and the sooner we go and pay him a visit the better. Well, go on, Maurin; what about the Nautilus and her guns?"

"Well," continued Maurin, "according to the descriptions of them published in the papers, they are pneumatic dynamite guns, which will carry cartridges containing five hundred pounds of dynamite to a distance of four miles, and drop these every time within a space of twenty feet square. The guns can be fired four times a minute, so you will see that means that she can throw two thousand pounds of dynamite a minute on a fleet or a fortress. You can easily imagine what that would mean.

"You know also that this Nautilus goes into action with nothing but a little oval platform and a conning-tower showing above the water, and therefore invisible at any range over about two miles.

"The French and Russians began with a torpedo attack on Plymouth. This was beaten off with great loss, and just as the French and Russians were drawing off, the Nautilus was sighted coming down from Portsmouth. It was about two hours after daybreak then, and the air was clear enough for very good shooting.

"She was made out first by a French torpedo-catcher, which turned and ran for the fleet to report. She was a thirty-knot boat, but she hadn't run half a mile before the Nautilus had her ram into her and ripped her up from end to end. Then she got the outside of the fleet, and went to work with her guns. Every shot that struck either disabled a ship or sent her to the bottom. The British warships kept out of the way, and contented themselves with blocking the western end of the channel, until the Nautilus, which simply danced round the fastest vessels in the French and Russian fleets, and pounded them to bits with dynamite without their once getting a shot into her.

"When the biggest ships were crippled, the British battleships and cruisers went in and finished them, and then the Nautilus turned her attention to the torpedo flotilla. The papers compare it to what a sword fish might do among a lot porpoises. She rushed at them at a speed that made them look as if they were standing still, and smashed them up one after another like so many eggs, and by mid-day there wasn't a single battle-ship or cruiser or torpedo-boat left of the division that had attacked Plymouth.

"Then the Nautilus and a lot of the British ships came up the Channel, and found two divisions attacking Portsmouth, while a fourth had gone on to Dover. By nightfall a few shattered French and Russian vessels got away to Cherbourg, where they were blockaded by a detachment of the British Channel squadron, and that was the end of the fight.

"Later on that night the Nautilus joined them, and by morning her dynamite guns, assisted by the bombardment from the fleet, had laid the fortifications of Cherbourg and half the town in ruins.

"Meanwhile the other French squadron had got away to the north through the Straits of Dover. It was reported that Wyndham wanted very much to pursue it in the Nautilus, as he declared he could have destroyed it ship by ship before it reached the Sound, but he was under the orders of the Admiral commanding the Channel squadron, and he sent him to Cherbourg instead."

"Then," said Renault, "between what they've done and we've done, the French and Russian fleets are about destroyed, and the British have lost their Mediterranean Squadron and the one that was blockading the Sound. That, with the two German squadrons that we destroyed, makes a total of, say, six fleets smashed up within as many days. That's pretty good work, even for modern warfare."

"Even mit der valuable assistance of an Anarchist air-fleet," chimed in Hartog, with a chuckle, rubbing his hands with pleasure at the idea of such fearful slaughter and destruction as this meant.

"Yes," said Lea, sending a little cloud of scented smoke from her pretty lips. "I should think a few more experiences like that ought to give even the most civilised nations of Europe enough of fighting for some time to come. What a pity you couldn't get hold of the Nautilus, Max. She'd have been very useful as a toll-collector along the steam-ship routes. Wouldn't it be possible to capture her in some way?"

"Max, I've got bad news for you."

"I'm afraid not," said Max, shaking his head. "Of course, I've no doubt we could destroy her, but I don't see much good even in doing that yet, for all the damage she does helps on the cause of Anarchy in general. By the way, Maurin, is there any fresh news about the fighting on land?"

"Not much," replied Maurin. "You remember, of course, that the ten thousand men which the British were able to throw into Antwerp, thanks also to the assistance of the Nautilus, frustrated the designs on Belgium, and enabled England to form a junction with Germany in the Low Countries and to make the Quadrilateral practically impregnable.

"That was checkmate to France on the north. The Germans are massing on their eastern frontier, and the Russians on their western frontier, so that there will be some pretty heavy fighting in the next few days; that is, if what has happened at sea, and the general terror that we have spread pretty well all over Europe doesn't put a different aspect on the face of affairs. Now I think that's about all I've got to tell. We've brought a lot of English, French, and German papers with us, and you'll be able to read the accounts in full in the morning."

"All right," said Max, with a half-stifled yawn. "And now I think it's about time to get to bed, for a good many of us haven't slept for two nights. We'll have a council of war in the morning, and decide what is to be done next."

The party broke up very soon after this, and as soon as Max and Lea found themselves alone, all the careless gaiety that she had worn while the others were present suddenly vanished from Lea's manner, and going up to Max, who was standing on the hearthrug by the fire, she put her hands on his shoulders and said very seriously:

"Max, I've got bad news for you, and you ought to hear it at once, so that you can decide what to do before the morning."

"You have bad news, Lea!" he said, in a voice whose gentleness would have astonished anyone who had heard him giving an order on board his ship, or laughing at the slaughter of the helpless crowd in London. "You! Well, if I'm to hear bad news, I would rather hear it from those pretty lips of yours than anyone else's. Now, what is it?"

As he spoke he took her face between his hands, and, holding it there, kissed her two or three times upon the lips before he would let her speak, saying when he at last released her:

"There, that will sweeten the bad news, whatever it is. Now, out with it."

"It's this," she said. "At the council of war you are going to hold to-morrow, the captains of the air-ships are going to make a united demand that you shall appoint a committee of five of them, and tell them the secret of the motor fuel. It has been talked about quite openly while you have been away. They say that it is dangerous for it to remain in the keeping of one man, because if you were to be killed or captured, the fleet would soon be useless."

Max's brows had been gradually coming together while she was speaking, until they formed an almost straight back line across his eyes. He was silent for a moment, and then he said slowly:

"Yes, that's bad news indeed; it means conspiracy, and probably treachery. I wonder who's at the bottom of it? However, I'm too sleepy to think very clearly to-night. Let's go to bed now; I daresay I shall either dream or think of a way out of it by the time I meet them in the morning."

THE CARD.

IN the house—a perfect hive of working people, in the Rue Delambre, where Tony Robec had occupied a room for the last two quarters—everybody believed him to be a widower. And not for very long either, for his little boy, with whom he lived all alone, this little boy always so well cared for, as though by a loving mamma, was hardly six years old. And besides, neither the son nor the father had crape on their arms or hats.

Early every morning Tony Robec, who worked as a compositor in a printing house in the Quartier Latin, set out with his little Adrien, the sleep still in his eyes, his head resting on his father's shoulder, and left him at a neighbouring school. After his day's work was done he went to fetch him, and taking his little man by the hand, visiting the butcher's and baker's, carried his purchases home in the child's basket, as any housekeeper would have done, and shut himself up until the next day.

The good-hearted gossips pitied the poor man—he could not be forty years old yet, and his pale face wore so sad a look, his black beard was so profusely streaked with grey, they said to themselves, behind his back:

"That man ought to marry again. He is a good man, never drinks. Surely he could easily find a good young girl who would take care of him and his little son. Have you remarked how well cared for his little one is? Not a tear nor a speck on him. You may be sure he is an orderly man. It seems he earns as high as ten francs a day."

They tried to make his acquaintance. Ordinarily it is not difficult to strike up a friendship in these overcrowded houses, where every one lives with his door open. But Tony had a reserved air about him, a polite way of bowing to persons when he met them on the staircase, which intimidated them.

Every Sunday the father and son, as neat as new pennies, set out for a walk together. They had been seen in the museums, in the Jardin des Plantes. They had also been seen before dinner, in a little café in the Quartier, where Tony indulged in the only dissipation of the week, a glass of absinthe, which he tarried over and sipped slowly, while Adrien, sitting alongside of him, on the leather-covered bench, looked at the illustrated papers.

"No, Mesdames," said the concierge, who was given to sentimentality, to the gossips; "that widower will never marry again. The other Sunday we ran across each other, in the Montparnasse Cemetery. It is there his wife is doubtless buried. It makes one sad to see him with his child. He must have loved the dead wife dearly. It is a rare thing, but there are some like that. He is inconsolable."

Alas, yes; Tony Robec had loved his wife tenderly; and would not soon console himself for her loss. But he was not a widower.

His life had been simple and unhappy.

He was a conscientious workman, but not an expert at his trade; it had taken him a long time before he had been able to "set type" rapidly and make good wages; and for this reason he had not thought of marriage until after he had passed his thirtieth birthday. He should have chosen a sensible girl, having like himself learned the lesson of economy. But love is never conventional.

Tony lost his head to the pretty frivolities of an artificial flower-maker of nineteen years; a good girl, but so frivolous, thinking of nothing but her clothes, and knowing how to dress on a few francs like a little princess.

He had some money saved which he spent in setting up housekeeping; buying a wardrobe with a long mirror front, for which he paid eighty-five francs in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, so that his wife could see her pretty figure from head to foot. He married his Clementine, and the first few months were a foretaste of Heaven. How they loved each other! They had two rooms on the fifth floor in the Boulevard Point-Royal, with a mite of a balcony from which they could obtain a bird's-eye view of Paris.

Every evening as he left the printing house on the left bank, Tony, his overcoat hiding his blouse, and looking almost like a gentleman, waited at the corner of the Pont des Saints-Péres for his little wife, who was on her way home from the Rue Sainte Honore, where she worked.

Arm in arm they hurried gaily along to the far away home and gaily prepared their evening meal. But the Sundays were inexplicably delicious. It was so pleasant a home that they would not go out. Oh, what charming summer breakfasts they partook of by the open window, the panorama of the great city spread out before them and the blue sky above.

While he sipped his coffee and smoked his cigarette, Clementine watered her flowers on the balcony. Overcome by her prettiness, he would rise and kiss her white neck; she would cry out in her soft voice: "Stop now—you naughty fellow!"

Then came a child, their little Felix, and every fortnight they went to visit him at Margency, where he was out at nurse. He died of convulsions at the end of a year. They had soon been consoled by the birth of Adrien, whom the mother desired to nurse herself. She left the shop and took home work, but made only half her usual wages; she dressed tastily and played the lady in the Luxembourg gardens as she pushed her baby in his wicker carriage in front of her.

Tony had to make a greater effort; he took extra work on a daily paper, the housekeeping was straitened, they ran into debt.

Then the child grew and went to the infants' school, and the mother, without occupation, naturally a coquette, fell into the habit of dangerous flirtations.

Imagine this poor man, old before his time, and this foolish young thing of twenty-five as pretty as a Greuze.

One evening, coming home with the boy, whom he had taken from school as he passed by, he had found a letter on the mantelpiece, from which, upon opening it, had fallen Clementine's wedding ring. In this letter the naughty child had said good-bye to him and her child, and had asked him to forgive her.

Tony was more broken-hearted than angry. He mourned deeply, and when Adrien said to him, "Where is mamma? Will she return soon?" he would embrace the little one passionately and reply, "I do not know."

Clementine had gone away in the first part of May. Oh! how perverse the odour of lilacs sometimes is. Tony in the July term had sold nearly all his furniture in order to liquidate his debts, and had gone to live in the Rue Delambre, trying to economise. This was where he was living so quietly, so honestly with his little boy, and where they took him to be a widower.

Towards the end of September the workman had received a letter from his wife, four pages of incoherent, despairing pleadings. She was abandoned and repentant, and she cried out, begging for mercy. But Tony was proud, and made no reply to the guilty woman.

He heard nothing more from Clementine until Christmas Eve.

On that day for several years he had been in the habit of going with his wife to lay a modest bouquet—a few artificial violets with a rose in the centre—on the grave of their little Felix, their first-born, who had died so young and who was buried at Montparnasse.

For the first time since his marriage Tony Rubec was obliged to perform this pious pilgrimage alone, but for his little Adrien; and, as he passed under the cemetery gateway in the gloomy winter, the image of the absent fugitive came more vividly before his eyes and caused him poignant sorrow.

"Where is she now?" he thought. "What has she become?"

But on reaching Felix's grave, which he only found after a long search, he stopped in surprise.

On the flat stone lay three or four playthings, such as one would give to the poorest children—a trumpet, a punchinello, and a jack-in-the-box. They had just been laid there evidently, for they were brand new having been bought that very day.

"Ah! here are some toys," cried Adrien joyously on his knees before his treasure-trove.

But the father spying a piece of paper tied to the playthings took it up and read these words, the writing of which he recognised: "For Adrien, from his little brother Felix, who is now with the Christ Child."

All at once he felt his son press against him and heard him murmur in a frightened voice: "Mamma!" and some few feet away from him, kneeling among a group of cyprus trees, he saw his wife, clothed in a poverty-stricken robe and shawl. Oh, so pale! her eyes so sunken! her joined hands extended towards him in supplication.

Between ourselves, readers, I am sure that Tony Robec had not until then given one thought to Him who, born on this Christmas Day, taught by word and by example the Divine precept of pardon for injuries done to us. The workman had no religion, but his plebeian heart knew not self-love or rancour. After a shiver, caused more by the anger at the remembrance of the wrong done him than by pity for the condition of his miserable wife, whom he had once so passionately loved, he pushed the little one towards her gently.

"Adrien," he said, "go and kiss your mamma."

She seized the child and strained him to her convulsively, kissing him hungrily on his lips, his eyes, his hair, and, then rising and turning a beseeching look upon her husband, she murmured:

"How good you are."

But he was already standing near her and replied, his dry mouth emitting a harsh sound:

"Do not speak. Give me your arm."

It is not far from the cemetery to the Rue Delambre. They walked the distance quickly. Tony felt Clementine's arm trembling as it rested on his. The child walked beside them, his mind already occupied with his playthings.

The concierge of the house in which Tony lived was standing upon the threshold of her room.

"Madame," he said to her, "here is my wife, who has been in the provinces for the last six months, tending her sick mother, and who has returned now to care for me and the little one."

And as they climbed the staircase he was obliged to partly carry the poor woman, who had burst into sobs and was almost fainting from emotion and joy.

On reaching his room, Tony seated his wife in the only armchair, placed her child in her arms once more; then he opened a drawer, drew forth a common pasteboard box, and took Clementine's wedding ring from it, placed it upon her finger without one reproach or bitter word; without one rebuff for the past; and silently and gravely, with the large generosity of simple hearts, he kissed her on the forehead, to assure her more completely that he pardoned her.

A LADY OF WESTMORELAND

THE days and the nights were very lonely for Mrs. Francis Evelyn. Francis, her husband, was in India somewhere with the army, and she was here in the old house in the north, alone with her servants.

Mrs. Evelyn was very beautiful. So beautiful that she found much diversion in sitting for hours before the mirror contemplating her own loveliness; admiring the brilliancy of her golden hair, the sweet languor of her blue eyes, the graceful contours of her figure, and the peach-like bloom of her skin.

She was very young. So young that she romped with the dogs, teased the parrot, and could not fall asleep at night unless old Mrs. Simkin sat beside her bed and told her stories.

Lord Nolan found her looking very lovely and disconsolate one day when he stopped to talk with her. She was pale, and her blue eyes were dim with unwept tears.

When he left Mrs. Evelyn that day her eyes were no longer dim and a something of the dreariness that weighed upon her had been lifted away. That mysterious, that treacherous bond called sympathy had revealed them to each other.

He came to her very often that summer, clad always in cool white flannels, with a flower in his button-hole. His pleasant brown eyes sought hers with warm, friendly glances that comforted her as a caress might comfort a disconsolate child. She took to watching for his slim figure, a little bent, walking lazily up the avenue between the double line of chestnuts.

They would sit sometimes during whole afternoons in the sheltered corner of the verandah; playing the piano and talking, talking incessantly during the first days when they were unconsciously unfolding themselves to each other. Then a time came—it came very quickly—when they seemed to have nothing more to say to one another.

He brought her news of the war; and they talked about it, listlessly, between long intervals of silence of which neither took account. An occasional letter came by roundabout ways from Francis—guarded and saddening in its tone. They would read and sigh over it together.

Once they stood before his portrait that hung in the drawing-room, and that looked out at them with kind, indulgent eyes. Mrs. Evelyn wiped the picture with her gossamer handkerchief and impulsively pressed a tender kiss upon the painted canvas. For months past the living image of her husband had been receding further and further into a mist which she could penetrate with no faculty or power that she possessed.

One day at sunset, when she and Lord Nolan stood silently side by side, looking across the wild expanse of moor to the mountains, aflame with the western light, he said to her: "Dearest, let us go away from this gloomy country. Let us go to Paris, you and me."

She thought he was jesting and she laughed nervously. "Yes, Paris would surely be gayer than Westmoreland," she answered. But he was not jesting. She saw it at once in the glance that penetrated her own; in the quiver of his sensitive lip and the quick beating of a swollen vein in his brown throat.

"Paris—or anywhere—with you—ah, yes!" he whispered, seizing her hands. But she withdrew from him, frightened, and hurried away into the house, leaving him alone.

That night, for the first time, Mrs. Evelyn did not want to hear any stories, and she blew out the wax candle that till now had burned nightly in her sleeping-room under its tall, crystal globe. She had suddenly become a woman capable of love or sacrifice. She would not hear Mrs. Simkin's stories. She wanted to be alone, to tremble and to weep.

In the morning her eyes were dry, but she would not see Lord Nolan when he came. Then he wrote her a letter.

"I have offended you and I would rather die!" it read. "Do not banish me from your presence that is life to me. Let me lie at your feet, if only for a moment in which to hear you say that you forgive me."

Men have written just such letters before, but Mrs. Evelyn did not know it. To her it was a voice from the unknown, like music awaking in her a delicious tumult, that seized and held possession of her whole being.

When they met he had but to look into her face to know that he need not lie at her feet craving forgiveness. She was waiting for him beneath the spreading branches of an oak that guarded the gate of her home like a sentinel.

For one brief moment he held her hands, which trembled. Then he folded her in his arms and kissed her many times. "You will go with me darling? I love you—oh, I love you! Will you not go with me, dearest?"

"Anywhere, anywhere," she told him in a fainting voice that he could scarcely hear.

But she did not go with him. Chance willed it otherwise. That night a telegram brought her a message from the frontier telling her that Francis, her husband, was dead.

When the new year was still young Nolan decided that, all things considered, he might, without any appearance of indecent haste, speak again of his love to the little widow. That love was quite as acute as ever; perhaps a little sharper, from the long period of silence and waiting to which he had subjected it. He found her, as he had expected, clad in deepest mourning. She greeted him precisely as she had welcomed the parson when the kind old priest had brought to her the consolations of religion . . . Clasping his two hands warmly, and calling him "My friend." Her old attitude and bearing brought to Lord Nolan the poignant, the bewildering conviction that he held no place in her thoughts.

They sat in the drawing-room before the portrait of Francis, which was draped with his scarf. Above the picture hung his sword, and beneath it was a huge bunch of flowers. Lord Nolan felt an almost irresistible impulse to bend his knee before the altar upon which he foreshadowed the immolation of his hopes.

There was a soft air blowing gently over the garden. It came to them through the open window, laden with a hundred murmurs and scents of the springtime. It seemed to remind Mrs. Evelyn of something far, far away, for she gazed dreamily out into the blue firmament. It fretted Lord Nolan with impulses to speech and action which he found it impossible to control.

Playing the piano.

"You must know what has brought me," he began impulsively, drawing his chair nearer to hers. "Through all these months I have never ceased to love you and to long for you. Night and day the sound of your dear voice has been with me; your eyes——."

She held out her hand deprecatingly. He took it and held it. She let it lie unresponsive in his.

"You cannot have forgotten that you loved me not long ago," he went on eagerly, "that you were ready to follow me anywhere—anywhere; do you remember? I have come now to ask you to fulfil that promise; to ask you to be my wife, my companion, the dear treasure of my life."

She heard his warm and pleading tones as though listening to a strange language, imperfectly understood.

She withdrew her hand from his and leaned her brow thoughtfully upon it.

"Can you not feel—can you not understand," she said calmly, "that now, such a thing—such a thought, is impossible to me?"

"Impossible?"

"Yes, impossible. Can you not see that now my heart, my soul, my thought—my very life must belong to another? It could not be different."

"Would you have me believe that you can wed your young existence to the dead?" he exclaimed with something like horror. Her glance was sunk deep in the pile of flowers before her.

"My husband has never been so living to me as he is now," she replied, with a faint smile of commiseration for Lord Nolan's fatuity. "Every object that surrounds me speaks to me of him. I look yonder across the moors and I see him coming towards me, tired and toil-stained from the hunt. I see him again sitting in this chair or in that one. I hear his familiar voice—his footsteps upon the galleries. We walk once more together beneath the stars; and at night in dreams I feel that he is there, there, near me. How could it be different? Ah! I have memories, memories to crowd and fill my life, if I live a hundred years!"

Lord Nolan was wondering why she did not take the sword down from her altar and thrust it through his body then and there. The effect would have been infinitely more agreeable than her words, penetrating his soul like fire. He arose confused, enraged with pain.

"Do not be offended," she said kindly, holding out her hand. "You are going to Paris I suppose?"

"What does it matter," he exclaimed desperately, "where I go?"

"Oh, I only wanted to wish you bon voyage," she assured him amiably.

Many days after that Lord Nolan spent in the fruitless mental effort of trying to comprehend that psychological enigma—a woman's heart.

Mrs. Evelyn still lives in Westmoreland. She is rather an old lady now—a very pretty old lady, against whose long years of widowhood there has never been a breath of reproach. The memory of Francis still fills and satisfies her days.

E read over that part of her letter:

"And this is the condition, that you send me for a Christmas gift, a tiger-skin large enough to make a cape. I am tired of sable and lynx and Persian lamb. I want something absolutely new. If it arrives in time—that is, before the 25th—you may consider that I am engaged to you. A caprice? Well, perhaps I am a creature of caprice!"

In the shadow of the splendid mountain he lay at ease that balmy November afternoon. He had yet some six or seven leagues to ride to the capital; but his horse was a good one and he could ride by moonlight. He was returning from the port. The tiger-skin was already on its way to London, it would be in her hands within two weeks. He had gone far out into the wilderness to the south and he had shot and skinned his tiger, and the skin was a glorious one, more beautiful than he had hoped to find. Dorothy would be delighted. All was well. He would go back in April and press an immediate marriage.

In the distance, winding up the mountain in the path that Jerome had come, another traveller toiled along slowly and ill at ease. He had misjudged his horse, and had ridden too furiously for the first ten miles. The beast had suddenly gone lame. The traveller knew no Spanish, and could gain little assistance from houses by the roadside. Jerome watched him lazily from his resting place, until the new-comer was close at hand, then suddenly sprang up.

"Norton!" he shouted. "Melville Norton! In the name of all that is good! Is that you?"

The lame horse stopped. The traveller gazed intently for a minute.

"Ah! There you are, Phil! Rather surprised to see me? Well, I just thought I'd come down here. Got a confoundedly bad bargain in horseflesh here. Made good time for awhile, but the brute's gone to pieces. I'll be a couple of days in this old Mexican saddle, I suppose."

"We'll ride along together," said Jerome. "But this is a surprise. You told me nothing on earth would induce you to come to such a country, you know."

"Yes, I know; but I changed my mind. The truth is, I got into a beastly scrape. Thought best to get out of the way."

"Was it—a woman?" Jerome smiled faintly.

"You guess easily."

"Well, what then?"

"Why, another man was going to shoot me. And as the pretty creature happened to be the one she wanted, I didn't think it worth while."

"You didn't love her?"

"No."

"She loved you?"

"Never cared a straw for me. Used me as a convenience. Other fellow is very rich and very devoted. She keeps him at a high pitch—stirs it up to the boiling point of jealousy. We were engaged in a flirtation when he came in on us. Old Steele—you know Steele? She'll manage him as she does her father. A knowing girl is Dorothy."

"Who did you say?" asked Jerome, very quietly.

"Dorothy Holman. Why, you know her well enough. Flirted with her yourself, I should say."

Jerome had untied his horse that was grazing close by. He bent over and let down the stirrup on the near side. After a moment he spoke soberly:

"When did you arrive?"

"This morning, of course."

"I didn't know any steamer had come in. It will be going out again to-night or to-morrow, I suppose; I think I will return to the port at once. I must go back to England."

Norton stared. "Go——to——England?"

"Yes, I have just thought of something most important. I——I had meant to go back in a fortnight." He sprang into the saddle. "You can't miss the road to the capital—it's plain enough. Good-bye." He struck his spurs into the horse and was off down the mountain again.

Philip Jerome rode at wild speed for a time. His heart was beating crazily within him. To be tortured thus thousands of miles away! Had Dorothy deceived him?

The next four hours were only a confused horror for him. At midnight the steamer sailed and he was on board.

It was bitter weather in the metropolis when Jerome arrived in England. A cab took him direct from Waterloo to her father's house. Miss Holman was in her boudoir; the maid hesitated and looked again at him. It was getting late. Miss Holman was having her afternoon tea—he would go straight up. There were no words spoken, yet this was somehow the understanding. Jerome flew up the easy staircase. At the top he paused. It was her voice:

"Yes, it only arrived this morning. Handsome, isn't it? Didn't I tell you I would have a tiger-skin cape? You didn't expect me to take that rug of papa's in the library? Isn't he a darling fellow. Poor Philip! You never would take all that trouble for me, would you, Mr. Steele? Poor Philip! I daresay he has the fever out there, and a lot of devoted Indian maidens to nurse him. It makes me quite blue. If I married him instead of you—oh, don't be silly, George, you know very well it's you I'm engaged to. Nobody else could afford me. I'm an expensive piece—a luxury—eh, George?—There, stop I really don't want my hair disarranged—fancy papa or some one else coming in—No I won't hear any more of your silly jealousy. It was just the same way with Jordan and Charlie Hunt and Mr. Norton. I can't imagine such a stupid—hush! There is——"

Jerome went on and in with white, drawn face. He bowed to Steele and uttered a brief greeting. Dorothy received him with gracious surprise. It was so delightful. But Jerome seemed to have no words. Steele presently rose and withdrew. The two were left alone.

"You look out of temper," she said, with a careless shrug of the shoulders.

"I overheard your conversation," Jerome replied, the words coming with difficulty from his lips.

"Well? And then?"

"You really intended to—to marry Mr. Steele? You—you were not in earnest when you wrote to me about the tiger-skin?"

A sudden passion came over her.

"You've come here to torment me—all about your nasty tiger-skin. Take it away. What do I care for it—or you?"

She stamped. "Go, I say! And never come near me again. I never dreamed of marrying you, you simpleton——"

A flash—a sound that seemed to stun—smoke—and Philip Jerome lay stretched across the tiger-skin.

It was a sudden, desperate impulse; he had not thought of taking his life. He was still breathing when they carried him out.

Two months later Dorothy married Steele. The shooting had been hushed up as "an accident," but Melville Norton read of it in a New York paper weeks after in the far away tropics. With a smile and a sigh he murmured:

"Poor Phil! That was the business that made him leave me there in the road. What a fool she made of him! She'll keep the tiger-skin, no doubt, with blood stains on it.

A GIFT WORTH £3, AND WATCH, FREE.

THIS is a beautiful "Gladstone," open-face, STOP-WATCH; strong, exquisitely made and finished, gent's size, jewelled, Swiss movement, imitation gold; looks and wears like genuine 18-carat gold. Good enough for millionaires. The best watch ever sold so cheap. Only experts can tell it is not pure gold. I offer it to you from the factory in Switzerland at the lowest price, 16s., as an experiment, to learn if money can be saved by avoiding shopkeepers, and selling direct to the public at wholesale prices. This offer will never appear again, unless a large number of watches are sold from this offer. Special offer. Good for thirty days only. Send me only 16s., and promise to show this offer, also watches and Gift to your friends and acquaintances during this entire year, and I will make you a present of a Gift which costs £3 in London, and a beautiful "Rosebery" watch free. These are my special gifts to you, to pay you for the trouble to advertise my watches. This is an honest, bona fide offer, and may seem over-liberal only to persons ignorant of my business, and of the fact that £200,000 are expended annually for advertising purposes by many firms. The Gift worth £3 cannot be sent by Parcels Post, but an Order which will promptly secure it for you will be sent with the "Gladstone" and "Rosebery" watches, post paid, to any Lady or Gentleman, on receipt of only 16s. by P.O. Order. Write quick, to-day! Money cheerfully returned if not as represented. Address, H. C. DEAN, 36, Great Portland St., London, W.

Delicate Children become Bonny, Chubby, and Strong.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full Instructions accompany each bottle.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 320.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 16, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE WOMAN IN BLACK

THE men had driven away. Their carts and horses disappeared behind the low hills. They appeared now and then like boats on the crest of a wave, farther each time; and their laughter and singing and shouts grew fainter as the bushes hid them from sight.

The women and children remained, with two old men to protect them. They might have gone, too, the hunters said. "What harm could come in the broad daylight? The bears and panthers were far away. They'd be back by night, with only two carts to fill."

Then Jim, the crack shot of the settlement, said: "We'll drive home the bears in the carts."

The children shouted and danced as they thought of the sport to come, of the hunters' return with their game, of the bonfires they always built.

One pale woman clung to her husband's arm. "But the Indians?" she said.

That made the men all laugh. "Indians," they cried; "why, there've been none here for twenty years. We drove them away down there"—pointing across the plain—"to a hotter place than this, where the sand burns their feet and they ride for days for water."

The pale woman murmured: "Ah, but they returned."

"Yes," cried her big husband, whose brown beard covered his chest, "and burned two cabins. Small harm they did, the curs."

"Hush," said the pale woman, pressing her husband's arm; and the men about were quiet, pretending to fix their saddles as they glanced at another woman, dressed in black, who turned and went into her house.

"I forgot her boy," said the bearded man, as he gravely picked up his gun.

They started off in the morning cool, towards the mountains where the trees grew. And the long shadows lessened as the sun crept up the sky.

The woman in black stood silent by her door. No one bade her good-bye. The other women went back to their houses to work. The children played in the dust; clouds rose as they shouted and ran. A day's freedom lay before them.

But the woman in black still stood by her door, like a spectre in the sunshine, her thin hands clasped together as she gazed away over the plain towards Mexico.

Her face was parched and drawn, as if the sun from the sand had burnt into the bone. Her eyes alone seemed to live; they were hard and bright.

Her house was a little way from the rest, on the crest of a hill facing the desert plain.

She had heard the words of the bearded man—"Small harm the Indians did." Had he forgotten her boy? How could he forget while she was there to remind them of the dead? Near her house was a small rock roughly marked. The rude letters "Will, gone in '69," she had cut on it with her own hands. It marked the last place where her boy had played. She remembered how she went away softly—so he should not cry to follow her—without a word, without a kiss.

Here her hands beat the side of the house.

"Oh, to have that kiss now and die!" But she had gone, unthinking, up the road where the pale woman lived, when a rosy-cheeked bride, not a widow, like herself. They laughed and discussed the newcomers at the settlement. It was a holiday; for the men were away over the hills, cutting down trees to build their houses with.

As they talked there idly, they heard what they thought was the shrill bark of dogs running up the hill. Startled, they went to the window. Round the curve of the road came horses wildly galloping, and upon their backs——Here the pale woman shrieked and fled. They were Indians, beating their horses with their bare legs, their black hair streaming in the wind.

Like a flash she had bolted the door and barred the shutters as they galloped up. She turned then. Through the open back she saw the women run screaming up the hill, their children in their arms.

Their children! Where was hers? She stopped as if turned to stone, then undid the door.

They dragged her out by the wrists, by the hair. She fought with them stronger than ten men. But there were twenty; she was alone. The little street was empty. They strangled her, beat down her face, dragged her upon a horse, and, with her crossways on the saddle, galloped up and down, as they fired the cabins and the sheds. Her hands were shackled, and her eyes blind with blood, but she thought only of her child. "Where could he be?"

There were gunshots. Down the hill like mad came the white men for their wives and children.

Then the Indians turned back towards the plain. They rode past her house.

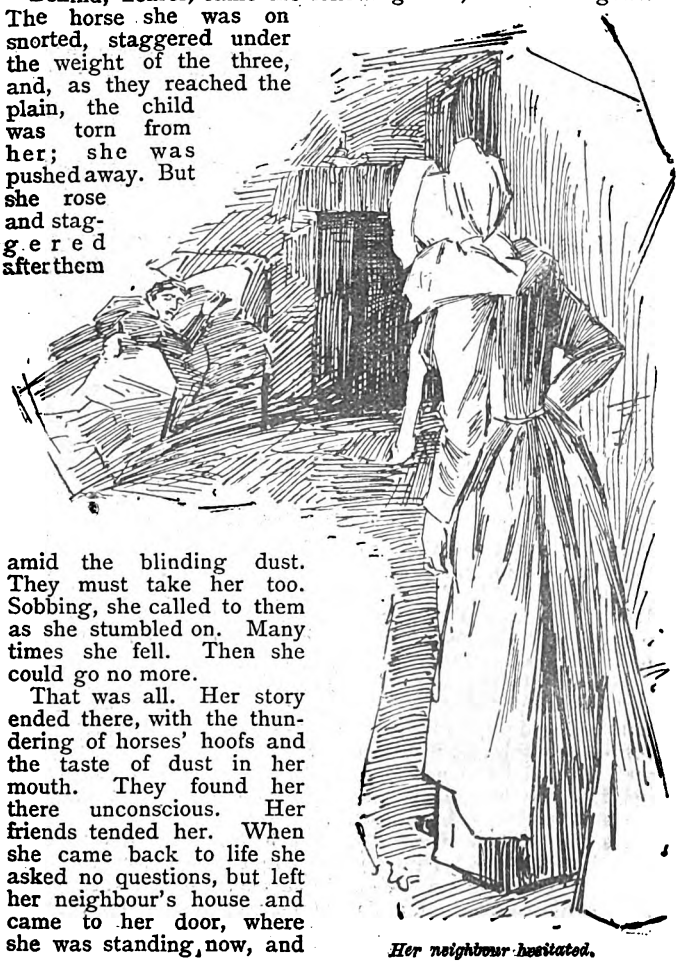
There, where she had left him, stood the child, dazed with surprise. She held out her arms, tied together, and called to him to come.

"Fool! fool!" Here the woman in black struck her temples with her hands. "Fool!" Why had she not galloped by and never noticed him?

But she begged, caught at the horse's head, struggled to get to him, and the Indian stopped for a moment in his flight and caught up the child and went on.

Then the thought came to her of the end of that ride—what was to come—after! And she tried to drop the boy, to let him slide gently to the ground; but the Indian held them fast.

Behind, nearer, came the following men, louder the guns. The horse she was on snorted, staggered under the weight of the three, and, as they reached the plain, the child was torn from her; she was pushed away. But she rose and staggered after them amid the blinding dust. They must take her too. Sobbing, she called to them as she stumbled on. Many times she fell. Then she could go no more.



Her neighbour hesitated.

That was all. Her story ended there, with the thundering of horses' hoofs and the taste of dust in her mouth. They found her there unconscious. Her friends tended her. When she came back to life she asked no questions, but left her neighbour's house and came to her door, where she was standing now, and gazed away over the sand where he had gone, down towards Mexico.

The years went by, and she was still alone in the house where two should have been. And now, far off, she saw the dust blowing in a long, rolling, pinkish line. But the dust blew so often, and nothing came of it—not even the Indians.

The boy, she knew, was dead, but they—his murderers—remained, somewhere.

If she could have one now in her power!

The woman in black pondered, as she had so many times, how she should torture him. No pain could be too horrible. She looked at the fire in the stove, and piled on the logs—the logs that were brought with so much trouble from the mountains where the trees grew. She could not make it hot enough. She dropped on her knees and watched the iron grow red. And the letters of the maker's name stamped on it grew distinct, and the word "Congress," half defaced, and the figures "64." Ah, those letters! She could have kissed the spot, for her child had touched it. Charmed by the glow when alone, he laid his baby hand flat upon it, and burned deep into the parts were those letters, "ss, 64."

She would know him among a million by that mark.

But he was dead. The Indians remained.

The woman in black stood up. Why should she not go to them? There were pools in the plains where she could drink. That would be enough.

The men were away; the women were at work. Who would stop her?

She put on her bonnet and started off down the hill through the green bushes. The air was still crisp, though the sun was hot.

The desert must have an end. She would keep on to Mexico. She walked quickly, and her dress grew grey with dust, and the air scorching, as she reached the plain. But she kept on, and only looked back once at the house on the hill, and at the window where the pale woman sat.

The dust choked her, and she stumbled, and the sole of one shoe came half off, and slapped, and banged, and delayed her as she walked. She tore it off and went on, but the sand cut and burned her so that she sat down and wept, and wanted to go back for her other pair, the ones she wore on Sundays. The hill, though, looked so distant that she wearily got up and went on, till she could go no more, and crept under the shadow of a rock. There was no water near. Her throat was parched, and her temples beat wildly. She must go back and start again, strengthened, fortified. She would start to-morrow, or at night, when the cool would let her get too far to return.

By slow degrees she dragged herself up the hill. The pale woman came out of her house, and nodded; but the woman in black did not smile in return. She closed the door, and went up to her bed, and fell on it and slept, amid the buzzing of the flies, and the fitful flapping of the window-shade in the breeze.

The pale woman sighed and glanced across the plain. The roll of blowing dust was larger, and more regular, and nearer. The woman shuddered as she watched it creep slowly along behind the sand mounds. "It always blows," she said to herself, "but not like that, so steadily, so even." She strained her eyes, but there was only dust to be seen. Then she thought of a telescope that belonged to the minister's wife, who came from a seaport town, and ran to fetch it. The two women came out with it together, the minister's wife laughing at her friend, she was such a timid thing.

But the pale woman was paler than ever, and trembled so that she could not steady it. The laughing one looked through it, and laughed no more.

"I see a head over the mound there," she said.

The pale woman shrieked.

"They are miles away; we may have time."

"For what?"

"To get away."

"They may be friends——"

"They are Indians! White men would not live through that sand. We must go to the woods. Help me! Warn the women! Gather the children! Come!"

The axe fell upon the wrist.

She rushed into her house. The other still stood and looked.

The dust-cloud was a little nearer. In a moment all was wild confusion; names were called, but not loudly; girls sobbed; some carried their little treasures; mothers held their children. All gathered together, hidden from the plain by a house.

The pale woman led out her father, then ran to her neighbour's door. She opened it and called clearly, but softly, "Mary! Mary!" There was no answer. The woman in black, on her bed, slept on. Her neighbour hesitated, then hurried after the others, as they ran up the low hills towards the mountains, where their men had gone.

The dust-cloud grew nearer. Now and then a head could be seen. But all was still as the grave. The woman in black slept heavily, and dreamed that revenge had come at last—that in her hand she had an Indian's head.

The window-shade flapped loudly, and she woke with an apprehension crushing her. She went to the window and looked out. There was no blowing dust upon the plains, and the street was empty. The doors of the houses stood open; a shawl lay in the middle of the road. The woman leaned out and looked towards the woods.

She saw on the crest of a hill the white skirts of the flying women, and then below, down the road, her ears sharpened, her heart tightening, she heard the soft, regular thumping of horses' feet.

Then she knew.

She sat on the edge of the bed. This was what she had waited for! Was it her turn now!—Or theirs again?

She could kill one.

Where was her gun?

She had lent it to the men.

But her axe—that was below.

As she started for it there was a burst of war-cries.

She ran down the narrow stairs and took the axe from its place on the wall.

They were passing her door. The room grew lighter. She turned. One stood in the open doorway, black against the sunshine. She set her teeth hard, hid the axe behind her skirts, and watched him, motionless.

He stretched out his hand, claw-like, and laughed, his eyes gleaming, as, cat-like, he moved nearer. A terror seized her; with a hoarse cry she sprang up the stairs, flinging down a chair as he followed, panting.

Quickly she climbed up the ladder to the loft, threw down the trap-door, fell on it, bolted it, waited. All was still. Outside she heard the distant yells. She stooped noiselessly and put her ear upon the floor. There was soft breathing underneath, and through a crack in the floor she saw an eye peering up at her.

She stood a long time motionless, axe in hand, ready.

Her back was to the bolt, but suddenly she felt that there was something there. She turned softly. A slim, brown hand was almost through a crevice in the floor.

She raised her axe. The slender fingers touched the bolt and gently drew it back.

Then, with the force of all her hatred, fell the axe upon the wrist. The hand sprang up at her. With a howl of agony the creature fell bumping beneath.

Then all was again still.

Her face was wet and warm with the spattered blood.

Outside she heard the crackling of a burning house, then gunshots far away, and distant shouts. On tiptoe she went to the garret window, and peeped round its edge. Over the hills, quite near, she saw the men returning. One house was blazing—the minister's. The Indians were retreating. Near her door, grazing, stood a riderless horse. She knew its owner. As they rode past they caught at it, but were stopped by a shout from her door. An Indian rushed out, handsome, young, holding aloft a bare right arm without a hand. In his language he shrieked to them for revenge, pointing up with his red wrist to the attic where she stood.

The eyes of the woman shot fire. She leaned far out and shook her fist from the garret window.

"One Indian, at least!"

She hurled the axe at them. It fell far short. They fired as they passed, but none hit her. Nearer came the men.

The wounded man leaped to his horse and rode on. The woman laughed as he passed beneath, then sat down in the dusty loft with a red pool at her feet.

Shortly the men returned. Some went by down the hill

"Have you killed any?"

after the Indians. Others put out the fire. All was confusion, bustle, shouts.

Then the women and the children came and added to the din, and the men who had followed returned. But the woman in black sat alone in the loft till she heard the crowd at her door below, and the voice of the pale woman say:

"Where is Mary?"

She rose and lifted the trap-door—it was unbolted—and went down.

The pale woman came to her, but she pushed her aside, and wiped her face with her sleeve.

"Are they killed—any of them?" she said. Her friend answered, "No, Mary, not one." "No harm this time," said the bearded man. "Except my house is burned," said the minister's wife. "We'll soon have another."

"I don't mean you!" cried the woman in black. "I mean them—the red devils. Have you got any?—killed any? You"—this to the bearded man—"Have you killed any?"

And the men answered, "No."

And one man said, "Their horses were faster than ours."

"Not one!" The woman in black drew herself up proudly. "Yes, one; better than killed. Wait!" The women shrunk from her as she climbed up the stairs. They looked at each other wonderingly. The woman returned with something in her grasp. She flung it on the table. "It is an Indian's hand. His arm will shrivel to the bone. They will leave him some day to die in the sand." The women shuddered and drew back; the men crowded round, but they did not touch the hand.

"Are you afraid?" said the woman in black; "afraid of that thing?"

She bent back the fingers and looked in it with a smile of contempt. Her face took an ashen hue; the hand struck the table edge and fell on the floor. She seemed to be trying to think for a second, then she gave one awful cry, and leaned her face against the wall, with her hands hanging at her side.

The pale woman tried to go to her, but her husband drew her back, and, with a silent crowd around, slowly picked up the hand.

For a second he hesitated, then did as she had done, but gently. He bent the fingers of the severed hand, and read its history written there, "ss, 64," in white letters on the palm.

He remembered then how, twenty years ago, when she brought the child to him, he had tied its little hand in cooling salve.

It was larger now.

The whisper went round, "It is her boy's hand," and they crept towards the door.

The pale woman took a flower from her dress, one she had put there hours before, and placed it in the brown fingers on the table, and went out.

The woman did not stir from the wall. "Leave the hand," she said.

"It is there," and the bearded man closed the door gently after him.

The woman in black turned. Her hard eyes were dim now. She took the hand from the table and undid her dress and placed it in her breast, and went to the window and watched, far off, a cloud of dust made golden by the sun as it rolled away across the plain, down towards Mexico.

BIBLIOTECA BODLEIANA

His Lordship.

IT was in the deep pine woods of Florida. The wind, dallying through the needles, played soft music above their heads and wafted balsamic scent about them. Sandy, stretched at full length, could only answer her tirade of girlish talk in monosyllables for looking at her. She was surpassingly pretty, with auburn hair which the Southern sun kissed into ropes of gold. Her eyes were brown, with a dangerous tendency to grow soft and deep. Her skin was very fair, with clear pink colouring and some tiny freckles. She sat leaning against a moss-covered tree trunk, her hands toying with a pine cone as she talked.

"I should have been a man," she said. "When I graduated last June I had a very fair prospect in the world. When one is born merely a Society girl one's place is in a city, of course. I had no thought under heaven but that I should stay in London and enjoy living. Then, when papa announced his intentions of going to Florida in the autumn, I looked upon it merely as a lark. Now I know. And we are to live here always. Think of it! In this wilderness, with no advantages, no servants. Some of my girl friends write to me. I do not tell them I wash the dishes and make the fire for my mother to get the meals upon. I am learning to cook."

"What do you tell them?" asked Sandy, to brighten her thoughts.

"I tell each one something different. I tell my art student friend of the beautiful scenery; my literary chum of the queer backwoods people. To another I write merely chatter. I wrote of the dance we went to in Fallonton's barn. I—I described the only man I have met. That is you, sir."

"How did you describe me?" he asked.

"I told her you were as tall as the pine trees, and just as painfully thin. Nay, now, but I did not. I said you were tall and slender, with blue eyes, dark hair, and fine teeth. I said that you did not talk much, but that what you said was good." Her eyes laughed.

"Does she know you well?" he asked.

"Better than anyone."

"Doubtless, then, she will understand that I cannot find opportunities to talk much."

There was a little silence after this, broken by Sandy's peculiar soft laugh.

"My lady," he said gently, "that is but as one of the pine needles. It pricks a bit, but it is easily bent."

"Then I told her," continued Cris, "that you had come from Scotland for your health, and that, like myself, you were poor, and trying to raise a crop of potatoes off a patch of ground no larger than a man's hand."

Sandy blushed faintly, but he did not remove his blue eyes from her sparkling face. Cris, quite unconcerned, finished her story.

"My friend calls you 'his lordship.'"

"She invests prosaic me with a romance, then?"

"Yes. It makes it more interesting, you know." Cris rose. "I am going. You need not come. Call for me on Sunday at four o'clock."

"Then you will go rowing after all?" he asked eagerly.

"Yes, of course. I was only tantalising you. Good-bye, your lordship," she laughed.

"Good-bye, your ladyship," he said, lifting his hat.

Cristine Hayden, commonly called Cris, went her way over the fallen pine needles, and he went his. He walked with his head bent, thinking.

"I have known her five months. She is only eighteen; I am twenty-five. She has beauty, health, youth, no regrets. I have but a delicate body and a mind oppressed. Oh! well. It may all come right some day yet!"

Heaving a tremendous sigh he struck into a brisk pace, and soon neared the little piece of land and the cabin he called home, and as he beheld it a light danced into his clear eyes, and he gave a short mirthful laugh.

Cris, meantime, had a longer road to travel. The soft-carpeted woods were with her for the most part; then along the river, and so home.

Then she went indoors to help her mother prepare dinner. At the table Mr. Hayden was quite talkative, and had much to say about the orange plantation where his business interests lay.

"Cris, your friend Mr. Irvin has been promoted. The boss is very well pleased with him. Quiet young man, but good worker. Delicate, isn't he?"

"Yes, but Sandy Irvin has a brave spirit. I think he is an honest young man."

"Precisely. That is why they raised him."

So, he had been promoted and had not told her! What a queer fellow he was. But then, it was her own fault! It was just as he had said. She had not given him an opportunity to talk. She had met him by accident as she walked home through the woods, and she had at once begun to tell him of a report she had heard. The district school was in need of a teacher and she wanted the place in order to make a little money for herself. They had always talked poverty to each other. So he was promoted!

On Sunday afternoon his lordship came strolling in at half-past three. He was always a trifle early, because then he did not have to hurry. They started at four o'clock in the trim little boat which was the apple of Sandy's eye. There was a charm about the river which Cris could never explain. She always connected Sandy with it, for she had never been for a row with anyone else.

"I am going to take you up the river to-day," he said; "I have often promised that I would do so, but by some fate or another we have always gone down."

"We are going up?" asked Cris.

"Yes."

"Towards the plantation?"

"Yes." Sandy looked at her a bit keenly.

"I feel hurt that you did not tell me you were promoted," she pouted; "to have a bit of news in this desolate region, and not to tell me!"

"You were so much more interesting that I forgot it," he said, audaciously. Cris, mollified, congratulated him.

Sandy looked at the shore, at his feet, at his hands on the oars, at Cris.

"I have some news to-day," he said, "that may interest you. I saw Hobber this morning. He says you may perhaps obtain the school, but he wants to question you first."

Cris leaped to her feet in the boat.

"Take care!" warned Sandy.

Cris sat down again, demurely folding her hands together and gazing at his lordship.

"Don't look at me so," he said, in his quiet way, "or I may be tempted to tell you something else."

Cris dropped her eyes, and the most exquisite colour streamed over her face.

"I shall tell you, anyway," he said.

"No—oh, no—don't," cried Cris.

"Oh, I wish to tell you," he said; "I have been having a small house built. It is copied from one in Chicago. It is there behind you."

Cris turned and looked. It was back among trees and shrubs, but she could see that it was a charming cottage—all but completed, clean and new.

"Would you like to look at it?" he asked her.

"Yes," said Cris, quietly.

They landed. The sky looked very blue and clear, and formed a background for the little gabled house which sat amidst the deep green of the pines. Down to the left stretched out the river in a long, broad, shining ribbon. To the right, in the distance, began the orange groves where Sandy was to work in the management. Cris's heart beat excitedly as they went up the lawn to the cottage. His lordship unlocked the portals of his domain, and threw wide the door for Cris to step across the threshold. It was quite an immense house. There were six rooms. What would his lordship do with six rooms?

Cris raved over it. How pretty it would be when it was furnished. He must have such and such a thing here, and she herself would make the curtains for the little windows in the hall, and so on.

"It shall not be completed for a year," he said.

"Why not, your lordship," asked Cris, who was pleased to maintain the little fiction.

"Because I do not wish it," he said, locking the door behind them.

They were out into the sunshine again. From much thinking Cris was quiet. At the brink once more he helped her into the boat, and as they floated down the enchanted river Sandy lifted up his beautiful voice and sang while they glided by the mist-green shores.

Cris obtained the school, thanks to Sandy. The children soon adored her, and she grew quite fond of her life.

One day she was riding through the pine forest, near the place where she and Sandy had talked that day almost eight months ago. She was thinking over what one of her scholars had said—a girl as old as her teacher. This pupil and Cris had become great friends. She told Cris that there had been whispers in the neighbourhood about Sandy Irvin.

They all believed he came from Scotland, but they said he was an outlaw. Rapt in indignation over this, Cris rode almost plump upon him. He sat by the mossy tree reading a letter of many thin pages. When he saw Cris he rose, blushing like a boy. But his eyes burned into hers with a deep intensity.

"I want to ask you something," she said.

And then she told him what she had heard, boldly and fearlessly, with never a wince. She finished, and waited his reply.

"I will go home with you," he said.

"No," said Cris, drawing rein, "tell me here."

He leaned upon the pony's neck, looking at Cris as he spoke.

"I was born in Scotland. My father, Lord Wavertree, was a rich landowner. I had a brother older than myself, with whom I could never agree. When my father died Angus succeeded to the titles and estates. I had just graduated at Edinburgh, and was to have been a lawyer. My health failed me, and I came to this country. Of course, I was poor. I was hopeless—until I met you. Then I went to work. I was ashamed to offer myself until I could give something with it. I built the cottage out of what I had. I said, I will work for a year first, that I may start a small fund I—I find I need not wait to tell you that I love only you in the whole world, and ask you to be my wife. Give me my answer now."

"I do not know," began Cris, slowly. "I—you must have seen that I love you, for I do. But—I have others to think of. If we are poor it is best not to marry."

"You said you loved me," he said, with her hand to his lips, "that is enough. I have received word to-day that—ah! my darling, how can I tell you? It seems so unreal. My brother is dead. He had no children. Therefore, I succeed, and must go back home to Scotland."

"After all, then," said Cris, "Mamie was right. You are your lordship."

"And you?" he said, looking into her eyes.

"I? I—I shall—be—"

"Your ladyship," he answered for her.

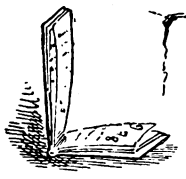
THE STORY OF A STRANGE DEVICE



LIKE all really great men, Mr. Phillipus Snodgrass was modest about his own accomplishments. Few people, not even his own relations and friends, had any idea of the actual position which he occupied in the great world of business. The loose expression that he was "something in the City" by no means gave the impression that the heads of three or four hundred of the largest firms in London were in constant consultation with him over some of their most delicate daily transactions.

That Mr. Snodgrass suffered occasionally from periods of financial depression was not a matter of any great surprise in these times when the millionaire of yesterday is the dustman of to-day, and the mendicant of to-day is the philanthropist of to-morrow.

There were those, however, who noticed that it was during one of the most enduring of these moments of temporary embarrassment that Mr. Snodgrass, at the age of 51, suddenly grew tired of living alone, and startled the whole circle of his friends by the announcement of his marriage with a certain Miss Willoughby, whose father had recently died leaving her £50,000 entirely at her own disposal.

The coincidence, if it was nothing more, was a remarkable one, and all the more so because Miss Willoughby, who might have been pretty fifteen or twenty years ago, was now decidedly passé and faded.

Mr. Snodgrass, however, was entirely indifferent to the covert criticisms of those who, from the blackness of their own hearts, considered that no other motive than the love of money would have led him to take the great irrevocable step of wedlock. At first it was apparent that he even neglected his business to devote himself to his wife, with that absolute desire to make life happy for her, and to insist on her slightest whim becoming law, which has an exactly opposite effect to that intended on silly empty-headed little women like Mrs. Snodgrass, who cry their eyes out until a man grovels at their feet and then kick him to show how they despise his attitude.

Now this policy is all very well in the hands of a lady who is young and pretty, and it was unfortunate for Mrs. Snodgrass she did not realise that the time when she could afford to be charmingly capricious had passed. There is a certain type of womanhood, however, who can never be brought to understand this any more than that the fact that they paint and powder their face, and wear false teeth and camel hair fringes, is no secret between themselves and their maid.

For a time Mr. Snodgrass took his wife's hectoring in excellent part, but as days went by and she grew more exacting and less inclined to fall in with his views, it became very clear to everyone that the relations between husband and wife were strained, to say the least of it.

Finally there was the inevitable scene. Mr. Snodgrass came to the conclusion that he had been wasting his time in adoring a painted idol of wood or stone, and returned to business condoling himself upon his unfortunate selection by the thought that, if his wife had no affection and no womanly feeling, she had a very desirable little fortune of £50,000 in the bank.

Picture, then, his indignation and disgust when Amelia flatly refused to allow him to touch a penny of her money, and still less to invest it in his business, of which she did not even know the nature. In vain Mr. Snodgrass pleaded; in vain he protested that as a partner in his concern her private fortune would increase a hundred per cent. per annum; in vain he went down on his knees; in vain he threatened and used hard words. Mrs. Snodgrass remained obdurate.

"I see it all now," she declared with tears in her eyes, "you married me for my money. That was all you cared for. But you were mistaken if you thought you were going to twist me round your little finger. You are very much mistaken if you think I am going to sacrifice everything to a mean, selfish, unprincipled man like you," and if her feelings had not been restrained by the fear of revealing the rouge on her cheeks by the tear tracks, Mrs. Snodgrass would certainly have burst into a storm of weeping, or, at the least, gone into hysterics.

After this defeat and rebuff Mr. Snodgrass grew more and more cold in his manner. He spent longer hours at his office and three or four nights in the week came home after dining at the club. If relations were strained before, they were on the point of breaking now. His behaviour removed all doubt from Amelia's mind that her husband had married her simply and solely for what he could make out of her purse. This made her desperate.

Those who sided with Mrs. Snodgrass afterwards (when the Snodgrass family matters became the topic of the hour) were disposed to the belief that the course she adopted of flirting desperately with the Hon. Frederick Charles was merely a little ruse to bring her husband to his senses; while those who looked at the matter from a less frivolous point of view said that she deserved all she afterwards got as a senseless and unprincipled woman.

The way of it was this.

One afternoon at the height of the London season, Mrs. Snodgrass had ordered her carriage for her customary afternoon drive in the park, and while listening to the band she suddenly became conscious that an elegantly-dressed young man, lounging against the railings, was staring at her in a very marked manner.

At the moment she was annoyed, and studiously turned her head in an opposite direction. Presently, however, a vague feeling of gratified vanity stole over her, and she shot a little glance in his direction.

The young man immediately dropped his eyes in a well-bred manner with a little start of apology, but the next instant he looked again in Mrs. Snodgrass's direction, and this time their eyes met.

Mrs. Snodgrass felt her pulses quicken at this flattering attention from a young man whose dignified bearing, and many acquaintances among the well-dressed and fashionable crowd passing up and down, marked him out as a man of some standing in society.

No doubt Mr. Snodgrass's recent neglect made this tribute to her attractive appearance all the more acceptable, and when, after their eyes had met several times, the young man suddenly raised his hat and approached her carriage, Mrs. S. flushed with pleasure at the thought of a little romance.

"I believe we have had the pleasure of meeting before, Mrs. Snodgrass," the young gentleman observed, with a slight inclination of his head.

The lady started when he mentioned her name, for she was quite convinced that they had never set eyes on one another previously. Evidently he had been attracted by her appearance, and had taken the trouble to ascertain her name for the sake of an informal introduction.

"What a long time it is since I have seen you," she cried, gaily, stretching out her hand, and holding the young man's, perhaps a little longer than was necessary.

The Hon. Charles took the cue at once, and the most careful listener could not have detected a single syllable to raise the suspicion that they were absolute strangers to one another.

At last there was a general movement among the carriages, and Mrs. Snodgrass felt that it was a moment which would require considerable tact.

"Perhaps I may call to-morrow afternoon in the hope of meeting your husband," observed the Hon. Charles, as their hands clasped for an instant.

"Tea at any time between three and five," answered Mrs. Snodgrass, with a fascinating smile. "Delighted if you care to come."

"Let me see—13, Eaton Square is your new address, is it not?"

"17, Grosvenor Place—yes. Don't forget. Good-bye," and the next moment she was leaning back in her carriage with flushed cheeks, and feeling deliciously naughty and happy.

It was not until the next day, when, needless to say, Mr. Snodgrass was not at home, that his wife learned the name of her new acquaintance. From that moment she was doubly charmed, and began to fall in love with the handsome young Guardsman in earnest.

Although his visits were soon of almost daily occurrence, Mr. Snodgrass, owing to the late hours he kept at his office, was not allowed to hear anything of them. In this way things went on for a time, until what had begun as a more or less harmless flirtation became a very serious matter with at least one of the parties concerned.

"By the way, Amelia," exclaimed the Hon. Charles, as he rose to go one afternoon after an unusually prolonged visit, "I am going round to Martin's place for my sister to put five pounds on 'Thistle' for the Drapers' Cup. I suppose you don't care to have a little flutter?"

Mrs. Snodgrass hesitated.

Gambling she held in abhorrence—horse-racing was a crime.

Once or twice when her husband had suggested "placing" a little money for her she had drawn herself up and dismissed the matter with scathing ridicule. She hesitated, wavered, and gave way. How could she refuse on principle to amuse herself in the same way as her admirer's sister, the Hon. Violet Charles.

The £5 which she intrusted to her dear boy "Freddie" brought back, to her astonishment, not unmingled with gratitude, a cheque for £100, signed by the famous bookmaker, Martin.

At first Mrs. S. could hardly believe her eyes. Then she grew excited. What an easy way of making money! This was certainly better than investing it in her husband's business. The horrid man! He should never touch a penny of her fortune.

The next day she increased her stakes; and won again. The gambling fever took possession of her. Her winnings mounted up. She had never known what it was to live before. How exhilarating! How exciting!

The Hon. Charles was in his element. His knowledge of racing matters was inexhaustible. He could not afford to invest much himself, but all his knowledge was at my lady's disposal. There were losses, of course, sometimes. The gambling fever coursed through her veins. She must win back every penny that has gone.

A month passed. The losses out-balanced the gains!

Mrs. S. dipped deeply into her banking account.

And lost.

She doubled her stakes.

And lost.

The Hon. Charles advised her earnestly to stop.

She would not listen to him. Her luck must change.

Two months passed.

Only a few hundreds of her fortune remained.

Mrs. S. grew desperate. She could not depend on the newspapers. The reporters knew nothing about the matter. With the Hon. Charles in attendance she went from race meeting to race meeting, and sometimes only reached home a moment before her husband returned from business.

It was on the occasion of one of these expeditions that the Hon. Charles and Mrs. S. sat side by side in a first-class carriage of a racing special, with their heads very close together, comparing the entries in their betting-books.

As usual, luck had been against them. Neither of them, however, had lost much. In fact, the Hon. Charles always insisted on doing the greater part of Mrs. Snodgrass's transactions through the celebrated firm of Martin.

Just as the train was leaving the station the door was thrown open, and Mr. Snodgrass in a white top hat, grey frock coat, and field-glasses under his arm jumped in, and threw himself down on the opposite seat of the carriage.

The guilty couple sprang apart.

The Hon. Charles turned white to the lips. His jaw fell. His knees knocked together. As for Mrs. Snodgrass, she shrank back on the cushions, staring at the new-comer with terrified eyes.

"Amelia!"

"Phillipus!"

"What are you doing here. By Heaven——"

Mrs. S. raised her hands with a supplicating gesture, while the Hon. Charles moved a little further towards the other end of the carriage.

"What are you doing here with that scoundrel? Do you know, madam, the character of the man with whom you appear to be on such intimate terms?" A sudden stoppage of the train checked the torrent of his wrath.

The Hon. Charles sprang to his feet and threw open the carriage door. Divining his intention, Mr. Snodgrass made a grab at his coat tails, and missed them, as he jumped out on to the line and disappeared.

"If I ever see your face again, you blackguard," he screamed, "I'll horsewhip you to within an inch of your life."

Then he turned on his wife, who, finding herself deserted, uttered a cry of despair, smiting her hands to her face.

"So, madam," he said, "this is how you have been amusing yourself while I have been at my profession."

"You deserted me," sobbed Mrs. S.

"I did nothing of the sort," retorted Mr. S.

"You did," reiterated Mrs. S. "If you had treated me properly I should never have had to turn to anyone else," and she burst into a flood of tears.

"I admire your choice of a substitute," sneered Mr. S.

"At all events, he loves me, which is more than you do, you heartless wretch," sobbed the wife.

There was a moment's silence.

"You are aware, of course," observed Mr. S., maliciously, "that I shall apply for a divorce?"

For an instant the poor woman seemed stunned by his words. Then she raised her head with some show of spirit.

"Then I shall be at liberty to marry the man I love," she cried, and broke off with another sob.

"Don't flatter yourself. You will never see the Hon. Charles again."

"You don't know what a noble man he is," said Mrs. S., with a defiant glance.

"Don't I!" and Mr. S. laughed cruelly. "Perhaps you don't know that I bribed him to make love to you. Perhaps you don't know that I saved him from ruin to teach you to gamble away your fortune. Perhaps you don't know that I am Martin, the bookmaker, and I thank you, madam, for the fortune of which I was never to touch a penny!"

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

CHAPTER XLV.

VENDETTA.

IT will be necessary now, in order to preserve the continuity of the narrative, to leave Max Renault, and the followers who, in his estimation, were bidding fair to become conspirators, to await the development of events, which might, perhaps, be pregnant with the future fate of civilised society, and rejoin the War-Hawk and her crew, as she left Newcastle with the partially disabled Vengeur in tow.

Three of her men were sent on board the captured vessel to get the engines into order as far as possible, and to keep up the supply of power to the lifting fans, so that the War-Hawk might not have any downward drag upon her, and could so tow her through the air at the highest possible speed. She was able to travel a little over seventy-five miles an hour under these conditions, and an hour or two before dawn on the following morning she and her prize of war dropped through the darkness upon Lundy Island, and found that the Volante was still there waiting, although she was quite twelve hours late for the appointed rendezvous.

"This is altogether unexpected good luck," said Sir Harry, as he shook hands with Adams. "We were afraid you would have got tired of waiting for us, and thought that something had happened to us, and so have gone off on a relief expedition to find us. In fact, as matters turned out we did almost want a relief, because we'd hardly got into the air——"

"Oh, yes," said Adams, interrupting him with a laugh. "I know all about that. We haven't learned to fly quite as fast as the telegraph yet. You forget that the Syndicate has had a private wire laid from Bull Point to the island, so that we could get the latest intelligence, as the evening papers say. We know all about the attack on you at Farne Island, and your brilliant capture of the Vengeur and her crew.

"That's why we waited. I felt pretty sure you could take care of yourselves, because I know the War-Hawk is a good deal better ship than any the Anarchists have, so I thought it better to wait here till you came than go off after you on a wild goose chase—I don't mean anything rude, you know—and perhaps miss you after all, and then make you miss us here at the rendezvous."

"Oh, but we've done more than that," said Sir Harry. "We sent one of the Anarchists' ships into perdition with a well-aimed shell, and terrible things those shells are, I can tell you, when they hit squarely. It was like a charge of shot from a choke-bore gun under the wing of a partridge. She stopped dead and went down like a stone, and when she struck the ground she went off like a shell full of dynamite. But I am sorry to say we let the other one go. We had to, and what made it all the more exasperating was the fact that we learnt from the prisoners we took that that blackguard Renault was in command of her."

"Oh, yes, we know all about that too," laughed Adams, again interrupting him. "By to-morrow morning that news will be all over England, and, perhaps, Europe, and if the Anarchists have got anything like a fleet together I'm afraid there'll be something like disaster come of that. However, that's not our business. If the authorities are silly enough to make this sort of thing public property they must, of course, run the risk of telling the Anarchists what has happened. You did all you could without taking the law into your own hands. For my own part I think I should have shot the brutes on sight, but then I haven't got quite orthodox ideas about law and order, and the authority and dignity of the powers that be."

"It's quite possible that that might have been the wisest course," said Mr. Austen, who had joined the pair just at this moment. "But somehow we couldn't bring ourselves to send the wretches into eternity in cold blood, although it might have been wiser from the point of view of public safety."

"Oh, well, that doesn't matter now," said Adams. "If the authorities can't take care of their prisoners when they have them delivered into their hands, that's their business. But there was another reason why I waited for you—something a good deal more important I fancy than even the capture of the Vengeur and her crew."

"Oh, indeed," said Sir Harry, lifting his eyebrows. "And what might that be?"

"Well, come into the farmhouse and have a drop of whiskey and a smoke in comfort, and I'll tell you all about it," said Adams, leading the way to the homestead which the Syndicate had purchased with the island.

Sir Harry and Mr. Austen followed him, after sending a messenger back to the War-Hawk to tell Violet and Dora not to expect them for the present, and when they had established themselves in the sitting-room of the farmhouse Adams went on with his story.

"About an hour before sunset last night the steam launch came off from Ilfracombe flying our private signal, and landed at the jetty, and Markham, who has been running her since we came down here, brought up a man who had a letter for me from Mr. Maxim. This letter introduced him as a Corsican, named René Berthauld, who had satisfied him that he had important information to give us, and asked me to cross-examine him about it.

"He also told me that the man had been given distinctly to understand that if I was not satisfied with what he had to say he would not be allowed to leave the island alive. So you see the man, as it were, brought his life in his hand—about the best pledge that a man could bring; so I heard his story, and I was satisfied with it. At the same time, guessing that you would be here soon, I didn't care to do anything definite on my own responsibility, so I kept him here, and telegraphed back to the office that I would do nothing until you arrived. Now the man's here yet, and if you would like he shall come down and tell his story in extenso before us all; perhaps it will sound more interesting from his lips than from mine."

"Oh, by all means!" said Mr. Austen. "You have whetted our curiosity quite far enough to show that there is something interesting behind this."

"Yes, and something very interesting I can tell you," said Adams, "not only as regards the actual information, but also as showing how a man, doing what certainly appears to be exactly the right thing to do at a given juncture, makes the one fatal mistake of his life."

"Now you have sent our curiosity up to boiling point," said Sir Harry. "Let us have him in at once, and get our suspense relieved."

"Very well, you shall have him here in a moment," said Adams, getting up and leaving the room as he spoke.

In a couple of minutes he came back accompanied by a man of medium height and middle age, whose dark olive complexion, black hair, and somewhat deep-set black eyes betrayed his southern origin at a glance. His face showed a curious mixture of shrewdness and openness, but there was something about the square brow and the squarer jaw which gave Sir Harry and Mr. Austen the impression that he was the sort of man whom it would be better to have for a friend than an enemy.

"Now, M. Berthauld," said Adams politely, motioning him to a chair, "these are the two gentlemen of whom I spoke to you. Take a cigar and help yourself to whiskey, and then oblige us by telling your story over again in order that they may understand all the particulars better than they might understand them from me. This is Sir Harry Milton, and this is Mr. Frederick Austen."

The stranger bowed to Sir Harry and Mr. Austen in turn with that natural grace which, among the peoples of the south, seems to supply the place of aristocratic breeding, helped himself to a cigar from a box on the table, while Adams mixed him a glass of whiskey and water, and then, with the air of a man who has something important to say and doesn't want to waste any time in saying it, settled himself in the chair and began his story forthwith in French, after being assured that all his hearers would understand him:

"Gentlemen, I am a Corsican. My name, as you already know, is René Berthauld, and I was born thirty-four years ago at Porta Vecchio in Corsica. I had an elder brother named Victor, three years older than I, who, after the death of my father, became head of our family. Six years ago, or thereabouts, my brother, who I may say, without disrespect to his memory, was a man of more imagination than education, and a man, too, whom fate had not treated very kindly, became disgusted with the order of things as they are arranged in Europe, and I may say, too, without offence to you gentlemen, that that order of things presses somewhat hardly upon those who have nothing but a pair of hands at the end of fairly strong arms for their patrimony in life.

"My brother became a Socialist through listening to the lectures of those who find it easier to talk than to work, and from that he became a member of the Mala Vita, which, as you know, is an Italian secret society whose hand is against every man's. But this did not content him for long, and at last he joined the Anarchists. He was suspected of being concerned in the bomb outrage in the Liceo Theatre in Barcelona, which you gentlemen will, no doubt, remember, and from Spain he fled to London—the universal refuge of all Anarchists and criminals who have made their own countries too hot to hold them.

"I corresponded with him from Rome, where I had got employment in the municipal electric lighting works, and in all my letters I exhorted him to cut off his connection with the Anarchists and return to a decent way of life, for I am a practical man myself, and I have no faith in these theories for undoing the work of hundreds of years at a single stroke.

"At last my letters seemed to have some effect upon him. He told me that he had determined to forsake the Anarchists, but he said that he was, by this time, so far implicated in their doings that unless he could win the pardon of the authorities by some great stroke against the Anarchists it would be impossible for him to live except in constant fear for his life or liberty. Then, after that, he hinted at some great blow that was to be delivered by the members of the Group that he belonged to.

"It was Autonomie Group No. 7, which had its headquarters somewhere in London, though, of course, he would never tell me where, and he said that he would foil this great design and save Europe from such a shock as it had never had before. In this letter he mentioned one name as that of the leading spirit of the Group. It was a name that you gentlemen and all the world now know too well—Max Renault."

The Corsican paused for a moment, and Sir Harry and Mr. Austen said in a breath:

"Ah now, that's getting interesting. Go on, please. We are listening with all our ears."

"It is even so," said Berthauld. "But it shall be more interesting before I have done. That was the last letter that I ever had from my brother. I wrote to him at his lodgings, and the letter came back marked 'Gone Away' through the English post office. Victor had never failed to answer a letter of mine before, but before my letter came back to me all Europe was ringing with the assassination of President Carnot by Caserio Santo.

"Now I knew Santo slightly, and he knew that I had a brother who was Anarchist, and it was from him I learnt that, although these people profess to act entirely as their own minds prompt them, they are really under the direction of a governing Group, and that Group is always in London, because that is the only place where they can be safe.

"As soon as I learnt this I put two and two together, as you say. My brother had told me of the great blow that was to fall on Europe, and said that he would prevent it, but the blow had fallen, and my brother had disappeared. From that it did not take much reasoning for me to convince myself that Victor had betrayed himself, or had been betrayed in some way, and that the Anarchists had killed him as a traitor.

"I gave notice at the works and drew what wages were due to me, and with these and my savings I went to London, but not before I had become a member of the Cette Group of Anarchists, to which Santo himself belonged. I gave my name as Gabriel Malato, and under that name I travelled to London with credentials from the Cette Group. I can tell you I was not in London very long before I made the acquaintance of several of the London Anarchists, and not very much longer before I met one Rolland, who introduced me to Max Renault himself as a candidate for membership of the Group No. 7.

"You may be sure that I was put through a pretty searching examination, but my brother's letters had told me so much about the Anarchist organisation that what I had learned from them, together with my passports from the Cette Group, satisfied even Renault himself at last, and so I was admitted. On the night of my admission Renault told me that in the very room in which I took the oath he had with his own hand shot a traitor named Victor Berthauld, who had almost betrayed the plans for the assassination of President Carnot.

"Gentlemen, what better proof did I want than that? The Fates had led me to London, and had placed me face to face with my brother's murderer, and, more than that, the murderer had confessed to me with his own lips. But Max Renault, clever as he is, made a mistake when he confessed that to me in his boasting way to warn me of the doom that would be mine if I turned traitor.

"He thought that Victor Berthauld was a Frenchman, and that Gabriel Malato was an Italian. He did not know that Victor Berthauld and Gabriel Malato were brothers and Corsicans. Now, gentlemen, you will understand why I became an Anarchist in profession, and joined the Group No. 7. You have heard of the Vendetta. Look you, look at this!" and as he spoke the Corsican bared his right arm to the elbow and showed on his forearm a livid scar in the form of a cross.

"That is the sign of the Vendetta. You know what it means. Blood for blood. The night that Renault confessed that my brother had died by his hand, I went home and cut that cross with my dagger, and as the blood came out I kissed the sign and swore that his life and those of his companions should pay for Victor's, and so they shall.

"Without betraying my name, I gave information to the police in London which led, as perhaps you know, to the club being raided—the club with which they used to cover their meetings—and four of them were arrested. Max Renault himself and Franz Hartog, the German who commanded the Destroyer, and Rolland, and an Italian named Cassano were captured. You know what happened. This stupid English justice let them go again because they had a clever advocate, and because they could not prove for the satisfaction of a stupid jury that they had made bombs or actually stabbed the President, and so for that time my vengeance was defeated.

"That is the sign of the Vendetta."

"But I was not discouraged. The group broke up, and Renault went away to your island of Utopia, where he got the air-ship, and Hartog went to Germany to build the boat which he stole, and Lea Cassilis, Renault's sweetheart, disappeared, and afterwards came out in Paris as Madame Cora Dail——"

"Good heavens! you don't mean to say that that pretty little woman was really his sweetheart?" broke in Sir Harry. "Oh, Lord, what fools she made of us at the theatre that night, and of me in particular! Well, never mind; go on please, it can't be helped now."

"There is not much more to tell," continued the Corsican. "I kept friends with Rolland, and when Renault returned I was able to learn all that was going on. Now I know the agents of these Anarchists and their plans; and more than that, I know where their hiding-place is; and if you will take me on board one of your air-ships I will lead you to it, up near the summit of Mount Pietra in the Cantabrian Mountains, and you shall destroy it.

"Mind, gentlemen, I am not an Anarchist, nor am I a spy or a traitor. I am a Corsican, and Max Renault killed my brother. I will have blood for blood, according to the creed of my race, so help me God, and the Holy Virgin, by this sign!"

And so saying he pressed his lips once more to the sign on his arm, and looked up at them with hungry eyes waiting for them to speak.

CHAPTER XLVI.

TURNING THE TABLES.

THERE was a pause of silence for some moments after the Corsican had done speaking. His three hearers looked at him as they might have looked at some half-wild animal endowed with speech, for it was the first time that any of them had been brought face to face with the personified passion of revenge, which is the concrete form of all that is implied by the terrible word Vendetta.

There was no possibility of mistaking the absolute sincerity of Berthauld for any skilfully simulated pretence for gaining their confidence with a view to betraying their plans to the enemy. The man's whole frame seemed vibrating with the passionate frenzy into which he had worked himself during the telling of his story. Hate and blood-hunger blazed out of his eyes, and his lips were drawn back from his long white teeth like those of an animal ready to spring at the throat of its prey, and then on his arm, which he still kept bared before them, was the livid cross scored in the flesh, the visible sign-manual of his oath and his resolve.

By tacit consent, the other two waited for the oldest man to speak first, and at length Mr. Austen said in a cold, almost judicial tone:

"Mr. Adams has told us that you have already satisfied him of the truth of your story and the sincerity of your intention, and for myself I may also say that I am satisfied. Sir Harry Milton will speak for himself."

Sir Harry nodded, and said briefly:

"You may speak for me too, Mr. Austen. If you are satisfied, I am."

"Very well, then," continued Mr. Austen, turning again to Berthauld. "I may cut matters short by saying that under the extraordinary circumstances of the case we will accept your assistance. You will, of course, understand that we have nothing whatever to do with your private enmity to Renault, or with the motives which lead you to desire revenge upon him, and I must also tell you, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, that if Renault is not killed in battle, and if, as I think very unlikely, we capture him alive, we shall hand him over to the proper authorities for execution, of course taking proper precautions to prevent a second escape."

"I have sworn to kill him with my own hand if I can," said Berthauld, with the hungry gleam still in his eyes, "and if the opportunity offers I shall do so. But if you take him prisoner I will forego that, and only ask that you will make me one of his guards until he is handed over to the hangman, for if you take him he will be yours, not mine, but if I take him I will kill him as I have sworn to do. Does that content you?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Austen. "There can be no fault found with that, though I think the point is hardly worth discussing, for I cannot believe that he will ever allow himself to be taken alive. He will blow his ship to atoms first with his own hands. But now as regards yourself. You understand, I suppose, that you give yourself as a hostage for your own sincerity."

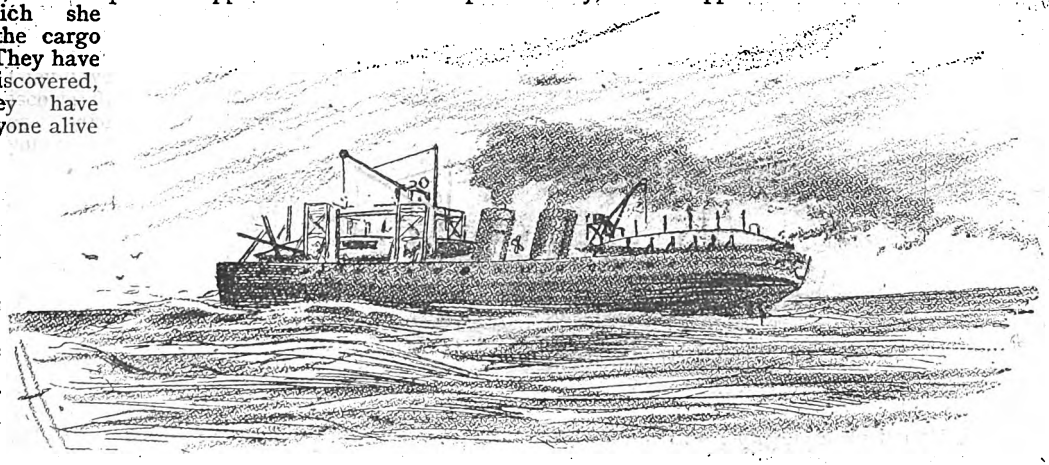
"Yes," said the Corsican, rising to his feet, and stretching out his arm with the gesture of a man who voluntarily surrenders his liberty. "Until this is accomplished I am yours, body and soul. Do with me as you please. I have no arms, not even a knife, and I want none. You may search me and see. You may guard me night and day on board your air-ship, and shoot me if you even suspect me. I ask nothing but that you will let me help you to hunt this Renault down, and when he is dead, set me free to go about my business."

"That is enough," said Mr. Austen. "You will go on board Mr. Adams' ship as soon as we have decided what is to be done first; and now tell us, if you know, how Renault and his accomplices managed to get their air-ships built."

"Yes, I can do that," said the Corsican. "The North German Lloyd liner, Bremen, which they captured, Renault and Hartog transformed into a floating dockyard. They kept her in the South Atlantic, cruising constantly east and west a few degrees south of the Tropic of Capricorn and between the tenth and thirtieth meridians. This, as you no doubt know, is mid-way between the two great steamship tracks to South America on the one side, and the Cape of Good Hope and Australia on the other. The Destroyer acts as a sort of tender to her, and keeps her supplied with coals and provisions, which she takes from the cargo steamers. They have never been discovered, because they have never left anyone alive to tell tales. When they have got all they want out of a steamer they send her to the bottom with all hands on board."



Transformed into a floating dockyard.

"The scoundrels!" exclaimed Sir Harry and Mr. Austen in a breath; and Sir Harry, bringing his open hand down with a slap upon his knee, said angrily, "Ordinary justice has no punishment for crimes like that. I begin to see now the reason for the Vendetta."

"It is more just than your justice," said the Corsican quietly. "Think of the friends and kindred, the mothers and the wives and the lovers of those poor fellows whose bones have been picked by the fish in the South Atlantic, and you will see why I want my revenge on Renault.

"But I must go on with my story. The last air-ship that is built on board the Bremen always remains by her till the next one is finished, to guard against the accident of being discovered by a war-ship, then the other takes her place, and she goes to the camp at Mount Pietra to join the fleet. More than this, they have establishments for stores and depots for treasure and arms and ammunition at an inlet on the African coast, south of Cape Bojador; another on one of the keys of the Bahamas; another in one of the bayous of Florida; another in the Island of Trinidad, in the Atlantic; and another at your Island of Utopia, which I suppose you know they have taken possession of."

"We didn't know it, but we expected it," said Adams. "But we can very soon turn them out of there. And now, M. Berthauld, we can get to work, I think. I propose that the War-Hawk and the Volante shall go in company first to Trinidad, destroy the depot there, then you will guide us to the Bremen and the Destroyer, and we will sink them; and after that——. But stop a minute, there is something else. How do the Anarchists get their materials for building the air-ships, and their ammunition and guns, to the Bremen?"

In answer to this question the Corsican described the Pilgrim and her work, and added with a laugh: "This gentleman's yacht, as everyone believes her to be, was lying quietly in Plymouth while the attack of the French and Russians was being defeated only a few days ago."

"And where is she now?" asked Sir Harry.

"She had then a full cargo on board, and I believe it was intended for the Bremen. If that is so she would sail for the South Atlantic, probably for Trinidad first, as soon as the Channel was clear of French and Russian ships, and so we may overtake her on the way. May I ask, gentlemen, how many ships you will take with you on the expedition?"

"Only the two that are here," replied Adams. "They can fly nearly two hundred miles an hour, and their armaments are much more powerful than anything the Anarchists have, if what we saw in the north last night is any guide."

"Yes, they will be quite enough," said Berthauld. "Renault has about twenty-five ships altogether now, but none of them are as fast as yours. With those two you could fight the whole fleet, and beat it. And now, may I ask when you propose to start, gentlemen?"

"There is nothing to stop us starting at once," said Adams. "And the sooner we are off the better. The Volante is quite ready, and I suppose the War-Hawk will have filled up her fuel magazines by this time."

"Oh, yes, she'll be quite ready, and we ought to get afloat as soon as possible, so as to be well out of the way before the light gets too strong."

In less than half an hour the two air-ships were afloat again, and flying at sixty miles an hour on a course a little to the west of south. An elevation of four thousand feet was kept, and as the light increased a bright look out was kept for steamers corresponding to the description which Berthauld had given of the Pilgrim. As far as they had been able to calculate she ought by this time to be about a thousand miles on her way, supposing she had taken the route to the South Atlantic, and was steering, as in that case she would do, a direct course for the island of Trinidad.

The whole ocean, however, seemed deserted, except far away to the northward, where a few faint smoke hazes betokened the presence of the Atlantic liners and their convoys. The speed was therefore increased, first to a hundred and then to a hundred and fifty miles an hour, and at length, towards four o'clock in the afternoon, Adams, who was scanning the ocean through his glasses from the conning-tower, made out a faint wreath of smoke coming from some solitary steamer far away on the southern horizon.

The two air-ships were flying side by side about a hundred yards apart, and Adams, seeing Mr. Austen in the conning-tower of the War-Hawk, attracted his attention by running the Volante up closer, and then told him in the deaf and dumb language on his fingers that he had sighted a steamer and wanted to slow down and speak to him. The two air-ships rapidly decreased their speed until they were flying close together at thirty miles an hour, then the slides in the conning-towers were drawn back, and they arranged that if the solitary vessel by good fortune proved to be the Pilgrim the Volante would go down and speak her while the War-Hawk remained a thousand feet above her so as to put any idea of resistance out of the question. Then the speed was increased again and twenty minutes later the Volante took a downward sweep and stopped a hundred feet from the surface of the water and some half-mile ahead of the steamer.

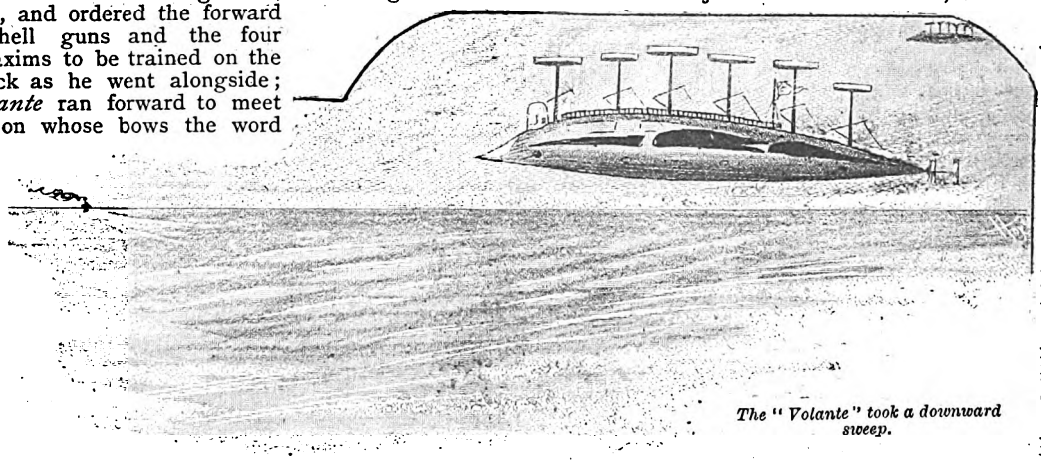
"We are in fortune!" said Berthauld, whom Adams had called into the conning-tower. "That is the Pilgrim. I thought it would be, from what they told me about her having to make another voyage soon to the Bremen. May I ask what you will do with her now that you have caught her?"

"As soon as I am satisfied that she is the vessel you describe, and is really in the employment of the Anarchists, I shall sink her just as I would sink the Destroyer if we were fortunate enough to meet with her," replied Adams. "I will serve her crew as they have served the crews of the steamers they have robbed and sunk. You had better keep out of sight now. I am going to hail her."

"Very good," said Berthauld. "But let me caution you to be careful, for they are just as likely as not to reply to your hail with a volley."

"I will see to that," said Adams shortly. "Now you had better go to the gun-room."

As the Corsican left the conning-tower, Adams signalled to the gun-room, and ordered the forward and after shell guns and the four broadside Maxims to be trained on the steamer's deck as he went alongside; then the Volante ran forward to meet the steamer on whose bows the word Pilgrim could be distinctly seen. But just as she was slowing down, Adams, who had never taken his eyes off the Pilgrim's deck, saw half a dozen men tear the covering off a large boat which she carried on deck amidships, and in this boat he saw a short, mortar-like gun of large calibre mounted on what looked like a swivel-stand.



The "Volante" took a downward sweep.

There could be no mistaking the purpose of this weapon. The Volante was well within range, and the obvious object was to send a shell into her as she slowed down. Just as a couple of men jumped into the boat he sent the signal, "Full speed ahead," to the engine room, and the Volante sprang forward on an upward leap of a thousand feet as a puff of smoke rose from the boat and a heavy shell went whistling harmlessly away astern of her.

The next instant a couple of shells from the War-Hawk struck the water and exploded on either side of the steamer, deluging her decks with water. Then came two from the Volante, both of which struck the deck and exploded, tearing two great ragged holes in the planking. Two more from the War-Hawk followed in rapid succession. The Anarchists replied as well as they could with their one gun, but the air-ships were far beyond its range, and the fate of Leo Marcel and his crew was soon sealed.

Shell after shell burst on the torn-up deck of the Pilgrim, or else in her interior, and before the bombardment had continued a quarter of an hour two of the projectiles exploded together in her stoke-hole, and the next moment, in the midst of a vast cloud of steam and smoke, the Pilgrim broke in two and disappeared, taking with her Leo Marcel and sixty Anarchists to the fate to which they had consigned so many of their fellow creatures.

"Like cures like!" laughed Sir Harry grimly to Mr. Austen, who was standing with him in the conning-tower as the Pilgrim vanished. "That's the only sort of physic that's any good for the disease of Anarchy."

"Yes," said Mr. Austen, "it's a rather heroic remedy, as Dr. Roberts would say, but I don't think the disease would yield to any other. If she only had the materials for constructing a couple of air-ships on board we haven't done a very bad morning's work. Well, now I suppose it is a case of full speed ahead to the southward."

On the morning of the third day after the sinking of the Pilgrim the crews of the two air-ships saw the bare, gaunt rocks of Trinidad rising out of the water. The War-Hawk remained aloft as before, and the Volante descended to investigate. She found some huts on the desert shores of a bleak hidden bay, but, save for the huge land crabs crawling about them, the whole island appeared to be deserted. A shot was fired to call the attention of any inhabitants that might be there, but there was no response, and Adams decided that it was not worth while wasting time examining the place; so he rose and rejoined the War-Hawk, and the two air-ships resumed their journey, flying now in a south-eastward direction, so as to cross the Tropic of Capricorn into the unfrequented regions of the ocean in which they expected to find the Bremen and her consort.

When they reached what Berthauld had described as the Anarchists' cruising ground they separated, the War-Hawk going to the east and the Volante to the west, both flying in a zigzag course at an elevation of five thousand feet, so as to command the largest possible range of vision. It had been settled that whichever of them sighted the Bremen first was to return to the spot from which they had started, the latitude and longitude of which had been carefully noted, and then the two were to proceed to the scene of attack together.

It fell to the good fortune of the War Hawk to catch the first glimpse of her quarry, and the first eyes which saw her were the pretty brown orbs of Miss Dora. She was standing in the conning-tower—not an infrequent amusement with her now—with Sir Harry, soon after sunrise on the third day of the search, looking down at the water through his glasses, when he saw a quick flush rise to her cheeks, and she leant slightly forward, as though something had caught her attention. Then she took the glasses from her eyes, and handed them to him, saying as she did so:

"Sir Harry! I think I can see something that looks like a little cloud of thin smoke with a dark spot in the middle of it, far away down yonder. Will you have a look, please. Who knows but it might be the Bremen or the Destroyer."

"UNCLE CLAUDE, YOU'RE CRYING!"

A WILD and gusty night in March, with the sobbing, moaning wind rushing round corners and darting into dark entries and tearing madly out again, like some remorseful spirit searching blindly and restlessly for something it could not find. Overhead a sullen sky, with driving clouds; under foot the rain-splashed pavement, echoing now and then to a hurrying footfall.

Dr. Barton turned into the long and sombre street in which his house was situated, and bent his tall figure to the wind. The street was deserted, and he paused for a moment and glanced round, with a musing smile upon his lips.

"Just such a night—four years ago—I found the boy under my porch. Let me see, what is the date? The 15th—March 15. The very day! Strange that I should think of it now. I was coming home from old Lady Waller's—dead now, poor soul! Of course I was. Just such a night!"

He passed on, and into his own warmly lit hall.

As he removed his wraps a trim maidservant came into view.

"Has Master Jack—ah—retired yet, Mary?"

"Not yet, sir. He got Miss Ward to hear his lessons all over again to-night, purposely to stop up, sir. Master Jack said as he would stay up to-night, sir, to see you."

The ghost of a smile flitted over the grave face of the doctor, and he turned to the dining-room. The lamps on the table were turned very low, but a cheerful fire burned on the broad hearth, and threw flickering shadows over the old-fashioned furniture and on the long, full-length portraits which hung on the walls.

On the great bearskin before the fire lay a child—a boy of some seven years, with thick, fair hair tossed about his face. He was clad in a loosely fitting sailor suit of brown velvet. His cheek rested on one small hand, and the soft, childish face was turned towards the fire.

The doctor paused for a moment, with his hands clasped behind his back, his head bent, looking down at the child, with a smile on his face.

"Four years ago," he muttered. "If I had turned him into the streets then—had sent him to the workhouse, as my friends charitably suggested—how different it would all have been. He has made this dull old place a home, and life a purpose, not a mere striving, and striving, and ending in nothing, as some one says. And so the little chap has waited up for me—on his birthday night, too. I ought not to have forgotten it. I must get that pony to-morrow. I expect the young rascal will ride as well as he does everything else."

He dropped softly into a chair, still looking at the sleeping child.

The opening of the door and the entrance of a servant to turn up the lights woke the boy. He opened his eyes, and lay for a moment looking solemnly at the blazing fire before him.

The doctor spoke softly, almost caressingly.

"Well, Jack?"

The child started up and sprang towards him. The little firmly-knit figure slipped between the man's knees, and drew one velvet-covered arm round the doctor's black coat collar, turning up his smiling face towards the grave one above him.

"I didn't see you, Uncle Claude. Have you been here long? Miss Ward wanted me to go to bed, but I couldn't, you know, on my birthday without wishing you good-night."

"And so you fell asleep here instead, eh, Jack? Suppose I had gone off again and left you, what then?"

"But you wouldn't, you know," said the child softly, nestling more closely to him.

"Of course not," said the doctor, banteringly, in a tone which would have surprised some of his patients who only heard the professional voice. "And this is your birthday, is it, Jack? Seven years old, eh? Stand up here, sir, and let me look at you. Up straight, sir."

In truth it was a goodly little figure that stood before the doctor and looked laughingly and fearlessly into his face. The small, delicately and yet strongly modelled limbs, the refined face, with its touch of graceful pride, and the poise of the little curly head carried satisfaction to the heart of the man, who, while he passionately loved the child, viewed these things with a certain feeling of anatomical pride.

He sat quietly for a long time with his arm round the little figure, gazing at a portrait that hung over the mantelpiece—the portrait of a young girl. A fair, bright face, with a strange gravity in the dark, great eyes.

He drew the boy more closely to him with a sudden movement of his arm, and bent his head so that it touched the child's curls.

"If she had lived!" he murmured. "If she had lived! Perchance it's better as it is, and the child fills my life."

. . . . . .

"Mr. Kennedy, sir."

Dr. Barton roused himself from a brown study, into which he had fallen before the fire, and rose to greet his friend.

"Very good of you, Kennedy, to come in. You lawyers are not like the kill-or-cure gentry. We must always be at our posts; you can close your office at a certain time, and say 'good-bye' to it all for a few hours."

"And dream of coming litigations and obstinate clients, my friend," said the visitor, stepping forward and shaking the doctor's outstretched hand. "Well, every man to his trade, you know, Barton. I might throw in a little Latin, but I reserve that also for the office. What a night, to be sure! Thought I'd just step round and have a chat. The women folk have a musical evening, I think they call it, and I escaped. Amateur music is like injudicious flattery: it grates upon one's nerves. And we have nerves, even in the law."

Mr. Kennedy laughed cheerfully and passed his hand over his clean-shaven face.

They were seated by this time, with the cigars and a spirit stand between them.

"I've just sent that boy of mine off to bed," said the doctor, yawning; "it's his birthday, and the young rascal must, of course, wait up to see me."

"Ah, I know! They always remember their birthdays. I've five of them, and they never allow me to forget."

"Oh, the little chap didn't wait up for that. He knew I shouldn't forget him."

Mr. Kennedy winked solemnly, puffing at his cigar, and said nothing.

"Yes, time flies," went on the doctor, with a half sigh. "The boy's seven years old to-day."

"Counting from——?" said the lawyer, interrogatively.

"From the time he came—to me. That is, supposing him to have been about three years of age at the time. Speaking professionally, that was his age, as nearly as could be guessed."

"Ah! Well, he's a fine little chap—although you wouldn't take my advice about him, Barton."

"What, to send him to the workhouse?"

"Either that, or to endeavour to find out his people. You did neither."

"I tell you now, as I told you then, Kennedy, that he is no ordinary child—comes of no common stock. The people who placed him there did it with a purpose. The matter had, I should imagine, been carefully considered, and they knew to whom they were confiding him. I knew at once that he had gentle blood in his veins, and—and I was content to leave the rest. That boy, Kennedy, will turn out well, and I shall be proud of him. As proud of his manhood as I am of his present childhood."

"If he does," said the other, with a short laugh, "he'll have your training to thank for it. Place any child in such surroundings as these—in a refined home, with trained servants to anticipate his wants, and no discordant note to jar on his life—and he must be of very poor stuff indeed if he doesn't shape well. The little beggar couldn't help himself."

"That has little to do with it, Kennedy. My experience has been a large one, and young as he was when he first entered this house I know at once that he had been well and carefully trained, and from the very formation of his childish limbs—the very contour of his skull—that he had good blood in his veins. You know, Kennedy," pursued the doctor, more eagerly, leaning forward in his chair, with his hands on his knees, "I am a believer in these things—in—in fact—in heredity. I have good old blood in my veins, my father was a man whose ancestors had held their place—the place the old fellow was obliged to sell at last—for hundreds of years."

"Well, what of that? Is it any good to you? Has it been of any use to you? Are you in any way a better man for it?"

"Yes, I hope so. There is an indefinable something in—in a man of breeding, which necessarily is of material assistance to him in his intercourse with his fellows—to say nothing of his natural pride in his family name."

"You know that you and I never agree on that, doctor. You have no acres to be proud of, and your birth was a question of fate—the kindly fate which led your father to cast sheep's eyes at his future wife. The blood which tells in this world of ours is the blood which runs in the veins of a genius—that grander species of creature that rises superior to birth and circumstances, and cares nothing for the conventional fluid which flows within him, be it as 'old' as William the Conqueror, or as 'new' as the equally necessary fluid which animates the heavy carcase of a Chicago millionaire. Blood is nothing to him, he knows what he is, and he sings his songs, or otherwise makes his fiery mark on the roll of fame, and goes out again in some erratic fashion not usually approved by the aristocracy. You ought to be prouder of the fact that your ancestors played fast and loose with this country during the Wars of the Roses."

Dr. Barton shrugged his shoulders and laughed.

"It's useless to try and convince you, Kennedy. So far as the boy is concerned, I am well satisfied in regard to my first judgment. As you know, we could make nothing of his name when he first came to us—some pet name apparently—and I gave him my old father's name, John—John Barton. It is an old and honoured name, Kennedy, and my boy will be worthy of it. He has the right stuff in him. Mark you this, Kennedy. So certain am I—and so jealous am I of the name my ancestors bore, that I would cast the child off to-morrow, hard blow though it would be—if I discovered that his parentage had not—not been what I believe it to be. But I have no fear in regard to that."

"That would be a frightful injustice to the child!" exclaimed the lawyer, hotly.

"Well, well," said the doctor, waving his hand and smiling gravely, "it is a matter we need not discuss. The possibility is so very remote."

Both men were silent for a time, and the driving rain sounded distinctly on the windows, and the wind still sobbed round the houses like a lost thing.

"Four years ago, is it?" said the lawyer at last, musingly. "And just such a night. Do you remember? I came in and found you here with the child, and a bonny little chap he certainly looked. Ah! Barton," he added, laughingly, shaking his head at the other, "why the dickens don't you marry, as you ought to have done, and take these sort of responsibilities in a legitimate fashion? You've had enough of them, probably."

"Thanks, this is about as much as I desire in that way," said Barton, quietly, with a glance on the portrait.

"By the way, you found something on the child, didn't you—an amulet, or something of the kind?"

"Yes," said the doctor, slowly: "the half of a ring of peculiar pattern, such as I sometimes remember to have seen in Eastern bazaars during my wanderings in earlier days. They are generally in the form of a rope, of a peculiar dark metal, and of two or three strands, the strands laid side by side. This had evidently been a two-strand ring (they are rarely seen in Europe—considered almost valueless, you know) and the metal between the strands being thin and soft the two halves had evidently been separated, leaving two perfect rings. One was hung, by a ribbon, round the baby's neck."

"Queer!" ejaculated Mr. Kennedy. "However, he's a fine little chap and talks like a young prince. That ought to be enough for any one." He pulled out his watch and glanced at it. "I must be going, Barton. Even musical evenings don't last for ever, and I dare say the worst of the business is over now. Don't you trouble to come out."

"I shall walk with you as far as the end of the street," said the doctor, as they passed into the hall.

"But, my dear fellow, it's raining like———"

"That doesn't matter," interrupted the doctor, "I'm used to it. Besides I feel restless to-night, and a stroll—even in the rain—is the very thing I want."

They put on their overcoats and passed out. The rain had almost ceased, but the wind howled mournfully. At the end of the street the lawyer paused and held out his hand.

"Good-night, Barton. This is my way, you know. I suppose you'll turn back now."

"Y—yes—I think so."

"Good-night!"

"Good-night!"

Dr. Barton stood alone at the corner of the street, watching his friend's retreating figure, but he did not turn back. He paused irresolutely for a moment, and then slowly crossed the road and turned out towards the busier, more fully lighted streets. A little crowd of people brushing hurriedly in front of him caused him to stop for a moment with his hands thrust into his pockets, looking after them. They were following a woman—a jeering, staggering creature, dressed in tawdry finery. Even as he looked there was a warning shout from the crowd, a shriek from the woman, a hansom cabman standing up in his "dickey," with the reins drawn tightly up against his breast and the horse almost on its haunches, and the woman under the horse's feet, silent enough now. They pulled her out, and Dr. Barton pushed his way to the front.

"Stand back, there; I'm a doctor. Stand back, I say."

He looked at her closely. Blood was trickling from an ugly wound in her head. By his directions a dozen willing hands raised her up and lifted her into the cab, and the doctor directed the driver to go to the nearest hospital, getting in himself with her.

"They'll know me there, although I don't think I've brought in a case myself before," he muttered, with a smile.

"Here, get these things off, nurse," said Dr. Barton, as the woman lay, still unconscious, on a table. "You didn't expect to see me here again to-night, eh? Stumbled across a patient for you. Ah, that's better! Now we can see what the damage is. Ah," he said, after a longer pause, "ribs. Thought so, and some concussion. What an awful state the creature's in, to be sure. Been drinking for weeks, I should think. Get these things off and get her to bed, and——"

Dr. Barton had stopped like one shot. In passing his hand over the unconscious form he had touched a frayed and soiled piece of ribbon fastened round the neck and threaded through the half of an Eastern ring of peculiar dark metal.

. . . . . .

The cold dawn was breaking over the still deserted streets when Dr. Barton passed through the hall of his house, and walked slowly, like one in a dream, up the broad staircase. He entered his study and closed and locked the door. He turned up the gas and walked across the room to a little cabinet which stood in a corner, unlocked it with a key from the bunch he took from his pocket, and threw open the doors. Within, on two shelves, lay some childish garments, thrown in carelessly, it was easy to see, by a man's hand.

The doctor thrust his hand among the garments and drew out a little wash-leather bag. With this in his hand he turned to his writing-table and seated himself, and laid the little bag before him. For a long time he sat, his hand grasping his chin, lost in a reverie. At last he roused himself with a start, pulled the string that held the bag closed, and shook out its contents on the blotting paper before him. Then he took from his waistcoat a piece of soiled and faded ribbon. with a narrow ring attached.

"I need not have troubled to compare them," he murmured at last, huskily. "Exactly alike. The halves joined after all. Were not her raving, blasphemous words enough, before she died? His mother! My God!"

The doctor's head fell forward on his clasped hands.

He raised his head at last and gazed straight before him, with his hard, set face white and haggard.

"I might have known. I might have known. No high-born child would be left on a doorstep to the mercy of another's varying charity. Kennedy was right. A pretty babe, reared in such refinement, would look well enough and pass muster. But afterwards"—he shuddered—"when he mixes with his fellows—when his evil blood tells—when he bears my father's honoured name and drags it in the dust. What a blind fool I have been! I will end it. The name is not his. He shall not keep it. I will not send him to the workhouse, but he shall be put to some good middle-class school, and later on I—I will apprentice him to some useful trade."

All the weary hours, until the household was astir, Dr. Barton paced the floor of his study. All the weary hours of the next day he carefully avoided the child and came home at night so very late that the little fellow was in bed.

When seated before the fire in the dining-room—perchance with a wistful recollection of the little velvet-clad figure of the evening before—a sudden thought struck him and he rang the bell.

"Send me the nurse."

The nurse entered. She was a kindly-faced substantial-looking woman.

The doctor did not look at her, but kept his eyes fixed upon the fire.

"How—how is—Master Jack, nurse?"

"He seems very well, sir, but I told him as you were busy, sir. To-night he wanted to wait up again, but I said as I was sure you wouldn't like it, sir, and Miss Ward said so, too, sir."

"Quite right, nurse, quite right."

"He's a dear little man, sir, that he is. There ain't a boy like him in the three kingdoms—I'm sure there ain't, sir."

"Yes—yes—nurse, that'll do, thank you."

The woman retired from the room and the doctor resumed his musing attitude before the fire.

"Four years ago. And he is a fine boy, as she says. But that woman! No, no! he can be nothing to me."

. . . . . .

Dr. Barton was seated at breakfast, and was gazing down a long expanse of white tablecloth at Master Jack.

The doctor had not yet summoned up courage to give the order as he had intended, that Master Jack should be separated entirely from him, and should take his meals in the nursery. The little figure had become so much a part of his life—he seemed to watch so eagerly, even now, for its coming. But he had tried to infuse a certain coldness into his tones, and the child had looked at him more than once with a wondering reproach that had gone to the grave man's heart.

In truth, the little figure looked so lonely now and its eyes were so pathetic, that the doctor said quickly:

"Come up here, Jack. I want to talk to you."

The boy slipped from his chair with a flushed face, and climbed into a seat beside the doctor. For all his stern resolutions the man could not help putting his arm round the child.

The little face cleared in an instant and nestled close to the doctor.

"Jack—did—did—" the doctor paused and coughed. "Do you remember anything about anybody—before you remember me and nurse?"

"I remember sometimes at night," began the child, softly, "when I am nearly asleep. It comes back—a little at a time."

"What comes back?" asked the doctor, hoarsely, without looking at him, and speaking almost in a whisper.

"A big figure, in a very bright dress, who used to hold me on his shoulder. I know I used to play with the bright buttons on his coat. And he had a moustache—I know it must have been a moustache—it used to tickle me when he kissed me."

"And your mother? Do you remember her?"

"No, Uncle Claude. I can't remember any one else. Did you know her? But, of course, you must have done. How silly I am. Was she pretty?"

Still with his arm round the little figure the doctor said, quietly:

"Very pretty, when she knew you, my boy. She is dead, you know. I was with her when—when she died."

"How good you are. I had a dream last night, Uncle Claude," went on the child, in his soft, low tones. "I dreamt that I was away, far away somewhere in the cold—and the dark, and—and you were gone. And when I stopped and cried out, I heard some one say, quite a long way off, out of sight, that text of mine the nurse gave me the other morning and I mixed up so. You remember that one about 'visiteth the sins of the fathers on the'—why, Uncle Claude, you're crying——"

But the doctor, with a passionate gesture, had caught the little figure to his breast, and covered the childish mouth with his hand.

"Barton's not a bad sort of fellow, you know, but he's very illogical at times, and even rude," said Lawyer Kennedy to a mutual friend the other day. "I was talking to him the other night and happened to touch on heredity—always a strong point with him. What do you think he said?"

"Don't know, I'm sure."

"He was awfully abrupt. Snapped me up in a moment. Simply said:

"'Heredity be hanged!'"

N the residence of the Count de Lavelle d'Auge in the Avenue Hoche a thousand lights diffused a golden glory.

At the head of the staircase, where the double flights of wide white steps met, stood the young Countess de Lavelle d'Auge, with her eyes shining brighter than the clustered lights above her fair head, and her heart beating high with gratified ambition beneath the load of jewels which literally covered her bosom and pale blue bodice.

Her ball, the first she had given since her marriage, was quite a success. No rival hostess would be able to point to such a list of guests as would appear in to-morrow's papers—an English Prince, a score of German barons, a crowned head from Asia, and three Russian grand dukes, the entire Cabinet, and every intellectual celebrity of the day. And, to crown all, her only brother's engagement to Miss Caroline Westchester, the richest and prettiest English girl who ever visited Paris, had been announced that afternoon, so that the little Countess was in the seventh heaven of delight.

"Dear Countess, you look radiant—and no wonder, your party is charming."

It was a new arrival who spoke, as she held out a slim ungloved hand, and smiling down the while from her grand height to her hostess.

The Countess smiled up into the great slumbrous eyes of the Princess Katinka Vladoff.

"How good of you to come, Princess. Are you any better to-night? You look lovely, you know, in those big rubies."

Tall, and pale as a fading lily, Princess Katinka passed among the throng. Her soft white gown was swathed about a form that was too thin for perfect beauty; but the faulty lines of throat and arms were veiled in priceless laces, and made a fitting background to the huge gleaming rubies.

Standing beneath the broad fan-leaves of a palm she listened, with her grave smile, to the gossip, which a few days of illness rendered fresh to her ears.

"Have you seen the Countess's sister-in-law-elect?"

To all the tittle-tattle around her Princess Katinka had replied with her slow smile. Only the last question roused her a little.

"I didn't know the Countess had a brother to be married," she said in her low voice.

"Oh, yes, she has. He's a good-looking fellow, but quite poor. I expect it's only his connection by marriage with the Count de Lavelle d'Auge that has given him a chance with Caroline Westchester, who is quite pretty and nice."

It was the Princess Caquet-Boubec who spoke, while her little grey eyes wandered over the crowd.

"There's Noel Chantry and Miss Westchester. I really must go and congratulate them."

"Noel Chantry!" "Noel Chantry!" The words surged and roared in the Princess's ears like the rolling waters of an everlasting sea.

For a moment—an hour—she did not know which, a mighty blackness blotted out the sparkle of jewels and the flash of light.

Then the veil lifted, and amid the ever-moving faces one fair insouciant, with laughing blue eyes and a full red mouth that a golden moustache scarcely hid, stood out. He was standing in a loggia of rose-coloured marble which overhung the white staircase and hall. His head was bent down to a girl, pretty and slight, with the fragile clear beauty of English women.

Some force within her took her to the Countess's side and spoke, with her voice:

"Dear Countess, I have just heard that you are owed a double congratulation. Your brother——"

"Ah! Noel, you mean!" cried the Countess in sparkling tones. "We're delighted. She's quite the catch of the season, and such a sweet girl, too. May I introduce them both to you?"

"Noel! I want to present you to Princess Katinka Vladoff. My brother has travelled in Poland, Princess, and may know your part of the world."

"Will you come?" said Noel, offering his arm to the tall, pale woman at his side.

"No, I want to talk to you."

"I have been hoping to see you for years, Monsieur Chantry. Now I've found you I cannot release you so soon."

"Yes, it's quite ages since we met. But I've never forgotten my delightful visit to your most interesting country," he said, airily.

"Neither have I," was her grave reply.

"And I suppose the dear old castle is just the same, and the quaint village——. But won't you really have supper?"

"The old castle is there and the quaint village, Noel Chantry. Why don't you ask about the ruined mill where we first met? Would you like to hear news of the inn parlour where, on the day of the great snowstorm, you took my hand and swore you loved me—and where I gave you my first maiden's kiss?"

"Have you finished?" he muttered.

"Finished! Would that you had finished there! Can you not picture the winding stair on which we kissed 'Good-bye,' or recall that weather-worn mountain at the foot of which you struck my brother down——."

"For mercy's sake, be silent!"

"Surely you remember!" Involuntarily he turned his eyes from the poor thin figure, wasted and ravaged by consumption.

His action infuriated her, and she sprang at him, striking him across the mouth with her heavily-jewelled hands.

"Murderer! You think you are going to rise to honour through your sister—to wealth through your bride; but I am your wife, Noel Chantry. Before God you married me. And I will tell the world what you are."

Suddenly Katinka caught sight of Caroline Westchester. The pretty English girl was smiling and curtseying to some Royalties who were congratulating her upon her engagement.

Above, in the rose marble loggia, Katinka rushed forward to the low balustrade, but Noel was at her heels.

Those below and on the staircase saw as in a flash a white-faced woman lean out over the hall. Then the great house of Newlands was rent with an awful cry—the cry of a woman gone untimely to a fearful death.

Quickly they covered it up, as it lay a crushed and shapeless mass upon the snowy marble floor. Men and women fled from the house, and the brilliant lights faded into darkness.

But it was grey dawn when the Countess crept up the wide marble stair, and slipped ghost-like along the gallery till she reached the loggia of rose marble.

A dark figure was huddled on the low seat. She could not repress a low cry at the sight of the livid face raised to hers.

"How did you know I was here? Does anyone——" came from the drawn lips.

"Hush! I saw your face for one moment behind her shoulder. Tell me, Noel, was it an accident—or—suicide?"

"It was—suicide," he said, presently, after careful thought.

"I thought so," she said, slowly and incisively. "You tried, did you not, Noel, to prevent the awful deed?"

He bowed in answer.

"I thought so. Now go and get some rest. You must go early in the morning to inquire after Miss Westchester. She was a great deal upset by the occurrence."

A

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic troubles which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, take a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—Extract from The Million.

Delicate Children become Bonny, Chubby, and Strong.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

A Beautiful Anarchist

THE damp, mouldy atmosphere of the place was due to its being partly under the river. It was a long, narrow apartment, with a low ceiling, whose rafters were black with age and glistening with moisture. Some half a dozen cheap lamps, set in niches in the wall, shed forth a dim, rather ghastly light, by which the twelve or fourteen men that were seated about a long table of rough pine boards were enabled to gaze into one another's faces as they conducted their deliberations.

The men were of various ages, and their faces depicted different degrees of determination and ferocity. And yet, for men in the habit of meeting here and calmly condemning this or that personage or official to death, none of them looked so very terrible. This was due, possibly, to the one common motive by which all were actuated—that, as one might say, of a patriotism run mad, and in which cruelty had no part. To decide upon the death of a fellow-creature by the knife, the pistol, or the bomb was considered by them a solemn, if disagreeable, duty; and if none flinched in its performance it was because of the fidelity of every member of the group to his conscience and his oath.

A venerable-looking old man, in coarse fustian garments, and with a long white beard flowing over his broad chest, sat at one end of the long table, and appeared to act in the capacity of a sort of chairman or president. "Fédor," he said, slowly, addressing a slender young man with a face of extraordinary, though somewhat effeminate, beauty, "we have not yet had your report upon the movements of the Prince."

"It is brief," said the young man, simply. "Prince Miristoff is totally unaware of the danger that menaces him. I have secured employment in his house as an assistant to his butler, and he makes no movement that escapes me. I have skeleton keys that give me access to all his private papers. I could have struck him down a dozen times within the week, but preferred to await your orders. Next Friday the Prince goes to the ball at the Italian Embassy. It might be arranged that night."

There were murmurs of approval from the others. Presently a man of superb proportions, with jet black hair and eyes, and great eloquence of dress and manner, spoke. "I do not quite like the idea of these sudden removals," he said, simply, "unless there is very strong reason for them. Besides, Prince Miristoff happens to be a very warm personal friend of mine. May I ask if there is no hope for him?"

The patriarchal chairman bestowed a cold glance on the speaker. "Prince Escolaivitch," he said, sarcastically, "friendship is hardly a word to use when speaking of a common enemy. Permit me to say that you should learn to disguise your feelings. Prince Miristoff has already been sentenced. The date of his removal has been left over for the present, that is all."

The broad, white brow of Prince Nicolas Escolaivitch, who presented the astonishing example of a nobleman of almost Royal descent figuring as the sworn foe of his own class, clouded for a moment, and then brightened as the sound of a peculiar knock was heard at the door. "It is she—Nera!" he exclaimed, and as he rushed to open it every man present rose to his feet, and stood in an attitude of deferential expectancy as Nera Norisdorff, the most beautiful woman in Russia, walked into the room, and smilingly greeted her fellow-anarchists.

She had come straight from some gorgeous fête, and her superb costume of pale blue silk heightened the glories of her magnificent figure. She was very tall, with broad shoulders. Her hair was a bright bronze, that matched the clear topaz of her great, tigress eyes; the mouth was somewhat large, but ripe and dewy as a cleft rose. In every line of the pure white face and of the delicately-veined hands and wrists there was evidence of race. In the firm, open glance of the eyes there was latent passion, but no cruelty, only inflexible resolution and loyalty to the cause to which she was devoting her life.

It was easy to see that these men worshipped her. She was given the seat of honour, and for an hour presided over their deliberations, listening to reports and making new assignments to duty. When she talked, the beautiful but womanish face of the young man that had been addressed as Fédor was a study. He devoured her with his eyes, and the lines about his rather sensual mouth curled themselves into a satisfied and proprietary smile. Prince Nicolas Escolaivitch also gazed at her as though he would have liked to devour her piecemeal. Occasionally, too, he exchanged glances with Fédor, and these glances were not pleasant to see.

This woman, by whom these men swore as by a deity, was one of the strange products of modern civilisation, or of the lack of it. She had no religion save that of the cause to which she was consecrating her fortune and her life. Assassination was to her a just and holy means of working towards a desired political end. She would connive at a murder and applaud its successful performance without a flutter of heart or tremor of conscience. No wonder these desperate men idolised her. No queen ever enjoyed more ardent homage than she received from them.

"Traitor! Traitor!"

"It is late, my friends," she presently said, rising. "Come, Fédor, it is you that shall have the good fortune to see me safe to my humble roof to-night."

The young man's smooth cheek paled with joy, and his eyes rested gloatingly upon the marble neck and shoulders. One by one the group dispersed. Nera's brougham was in waiting two squares away. They had no sooner entered it than she gave a sort of queer little bark of delight, and, seizing the young man in an embrace that almost hurt him, so heartily and healthily athletic was it, poured passionate kisses upon his face, murmuring swift, broken expressions of tenderness the while.

"I adore you! I adore you!"

"I adore you! I adore you!" she whispered. "Why it is I know not, but I love you better than life or death, Fédor. Dearest, since I gave myself to you life hasn't been the same. Even the grand cause itself seems a little and puny thing beside my love for you. Ah!" and she commenced her kisses afresh, going even so far as to take large, swift bites at the youth's effeminate cheeks and throat.

As for him, he smiled to himself in the darkness, a satisfied smile of one that is quite confident he is beloved, and is rather proud of it.

The ball at the Italian Embassy was no less brilliant than such affairs usually are. Nera Norisdorff was a dream of loveliness that enchanted nobles and commoners alike, irrespective of age, race, or anything else. She was resting in a corner of the conservatory after a dance when Prince Nicolas Escolaivitch, looking superbly handsome in his uniform, approached her. He was very pale. She motioned him to a seat beside her, and murmured, "I am tired; tell me something that is interesting."

"I know nothing," he answered, sullenly, "except that I would die for you."

"So would they all, if one were to believe them," she answered merrily. "Come, be original; say that you do not love me."

"You mock me," he whispered, hoarsely. "Listen, Nera. I love you so that I am sick with the thought of the peril you run. For myself I care nothing; but the thought of your constant danger is madness."

She smiled a little contemptuously, and replied, "Do I seem like a coward?"

"It is not that," he went on; "but I cannot live without you. Come away with me for a while to France—to England. You are pale and ill. It will do you good. Come with me as my sister, if you wish it. Nera, dearest, will you not come?"

His pleadings, and the sight of his dark masculine beauty, touched her, although she had not the faintest idea of listening to his suggestions seriously. She leaned forward and placed her two hands in his. Intoxicated by his passion, the Prince bent towards her, and, before she could prevent him, had seized her in his arms and kissed her.

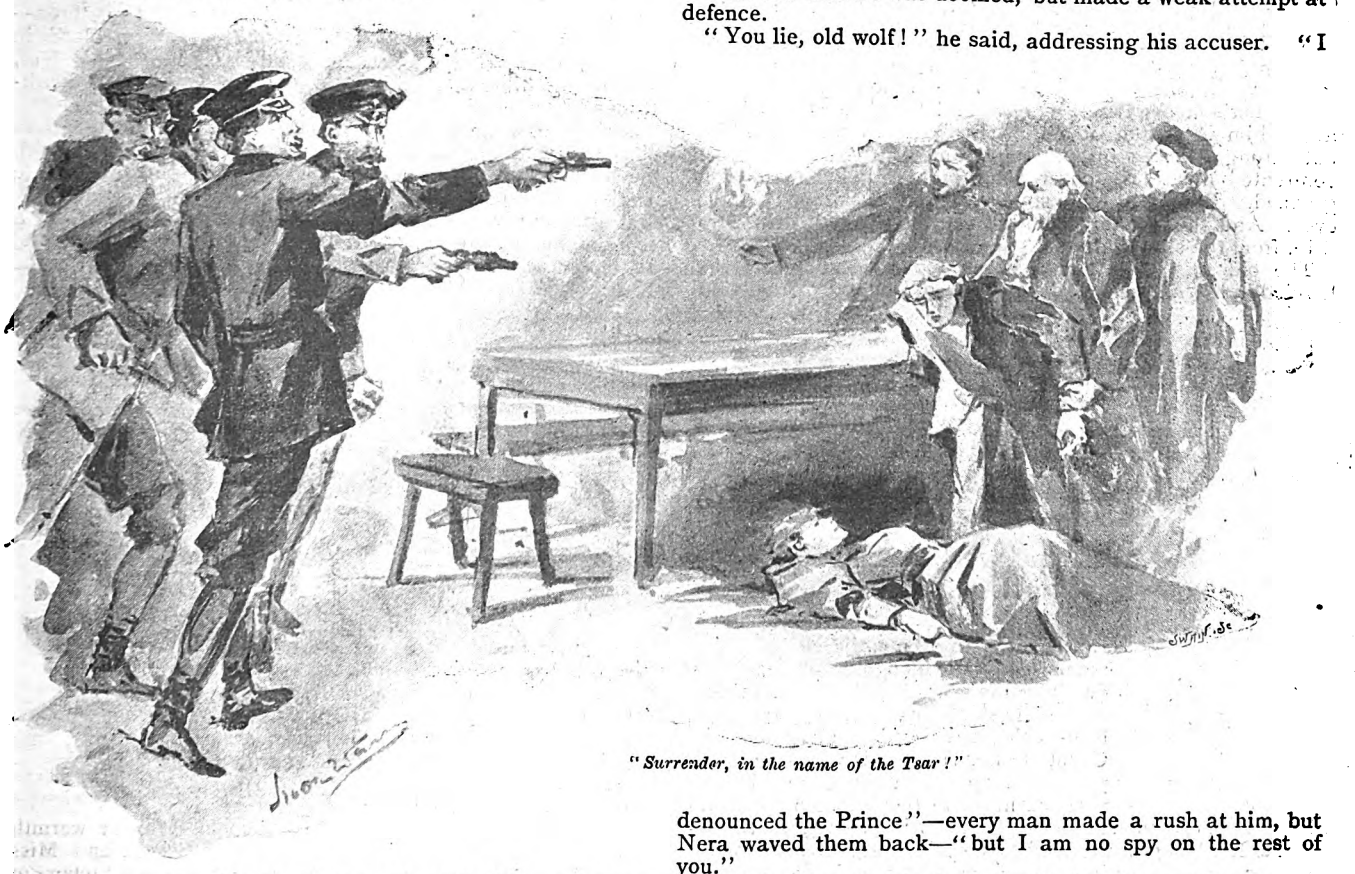
Fédor Ispanoff had known that Nera and the Prince were going to the ball. He decided to go himself, and he did so—in the capacity of a waiter. He was passing through the conservatory, bearing a tray of little punch goblets at the moment of the embrace and the kiss. He was not perceived, and he kept his own counsel.

. . . . . .

During the week that followed Nera abandoned herself wholly and utterly to her passion for Fédor Ispanoff. It was a curious attraction that existed between these two—the woman so big and splendid and the man so slender and effeminate. Seeing the two together, one could easily imagine Nera crushing the object of her attachment to powder if she chose. Yet that she loved him a good deal better than her own life was perfectly easy to discover.



"Surrender, in the name of the Tsar!"

So they were together morning, noon, and night, and were presumably very happy until the day upon which it became known that Prince Nicolas Escolaivitch, on the day after the ball at the Italian Embassy, had been arrested, and, on the strength of private papers discovered in his house, sent promptly to Siberia, whither he was even now on his way.

In the usual mysterious manner notices were sent out, and that evening the council met again in the queer little den-like place, where the darkness could be felt, and the moisture trickled from the rafters. There was gloom in that little circle; yes, and mighty wrath, too, for the Prince had been a popular fellow, spending his money like water, and just as earnest and sincere in his devotion to the cause of Nihilism as any penniless moujik. The talk was all of vengeance and reprisal. Even the beautiful Nera frowned and bit her lip as she sat in her place at the head of the table. Soon they fell to discussing the possible means by which the police had been led to suspect the Prince.

There was a sudden tumult at the door, and in rushed the white-haired old man that had presided at the last meeting until Nera came. His face was livid with excitement and rage, and his eyes rolled. As he entered he gave one furious glance at Ispanoff, who half rose to his feet. But the old man had fastened the door like a flash, and stood with his back against it, pointing one bony, trembling finger at him, and shrieking "Traitor! traitor!"

Every man was on his feet in an instant. Nera, ghastly white, demanded of the furious old man an explanation of his charge. Fédor Ispanoff, livid and trembling, essayed to speak. "You lie!" he managed to stammer.

"Lie? I lie, do I, pig and descendant of a thousand generation of pigs? Who sent that notification to the police that resulted in the Prince's capture? Who stands ready at this minute to deliver us all up? I believe that that is all you joined our circle for—a professional spy!"

Hoarse mutterings of direct rage arose. Ispanoff in an instant saw that he was doomed, but made a weak attempt at defence.

"You lie, old wolf!" he said, addressing his accuser. "I denounced the Prince"—every man made a rush at him, but Nera waved them back—"but I am no spy on the rest of you."

All this time Nera's face remained frozen and transfixed in the first expression of horror that had come there at the moment of the fatal accusation. In her breast a fearful war was raging. Her love seemed to be rending her asunder. On the other hand, her patriotism, her faith, her honour cried out against this man's perfidy, and demanded his instant punishment. "Can I be true to myself?" her heart was saying, "or am I nothing, after all, but a woman and a fool?"

She commanded silence with a wave of one of her slender hands. She gazed straight into the beautiful, delicate face of the traitor with a long, hopeless stare. Ispanoff returned the look feverishly. He knew that in this woman lay his only chance of life, and for an instant, as he saw the great tears well into her eyes and her lips tremble, he flattered himself with a hope. When she spoke, her voice sounded soft and far away.

"Did you denounce Prince Escolaivitch?" she asked, dully.

"Yes!" muttered the doomed man.

"Why?" The question sounded almost childish.

He gazed at her long and steadfastly, but he had sufficient manhood to spare her the recital of the cause that led to his act. "For private reasons," he said. "I hated him. But what does it all matter? I have forfeited my life. I am ready to pay it."

An ashen pallor swept over the face of the miserable woman. How gladly she would have died in his place to have seen the shameful accusation disproved. And yet, so strong was her fidelity to her chosen cause, that, amid all her horror and grief, she actually found herself desiring the man's life with the rest, so bitterly did she loathe his crime.

The men were already fingering the knives and pistols concealed about their persons, and discussing the propriety of casting lots for an executioner. Ispanoff instinctively recognised these grim preparations, and a fearful terror swept across his soul. With a bound he was at Nera's side, whispering frantically, "I love you! Save me!"

A mighty scorn came into the great eyes. "You might have spared me that, coward!" she hissed, and then added, softly, "you must die, and I wish I could die for you!"

Ispanoff's face was ashen now, and he glanced hopelessly about him in search of a friendly face. In vain. Nothing but strong glances of contempt and murderous intention confronted him. He covered his face with his hands and groaned. Two great tears stole into Nera Norisdorff's topaz eyes. And the moisture from the river above went drip, drip, drip, from the slimy rafters.

The old man that had accused Ispanoff advanced, and handed him a dagger. "It is a rule of our order," he said, "that a man condemned to die as you, you beast, are about to die, may choose his own manner of death. You may choose your executioner, or else become your own."

Ispanoff took the knife and glanced about him. His eyes fell on the blanched, averted face of Nera. He smiled grimly, and then walked over to where she stood and handed her the weapon. "I will die by her hand," he said firmly, "or none."

There was a roar of dissent, but the bewildered old man checked it. "He has that right," he said; "the coward doubtless hopes to escape so. But you must be brave, my daughter," addressing Nera. "Remember your duty and your oath. I will hold the wretch for you. Strike!"

He grasped Ispanoff's arms and held them to his sides in a grip of iron. The young man made no struggle. He was watching the face of the woman. A glare of wrath had come over it as the traitor had placed this unjust ordeal upon her. But she did not flinch. She advanced with the weapon uplifted, and Ispanoff closed his eyes.

The instant he did so he felt kisses—one, two, three—swiftly on his lips, and then a spurt of warm blood in his very face. Nera Norisdorff, self-slain, lay at his feet, murmuring his name and caressing his feet in her death-throes.

Shrieks of rage rang through the room. "Tear him to pieces," was the cry. A rush was made for the traitor with the beautiful delicate face, and he again closed his eyes to await a death-blow.

It was not given. The door burst open with a crash, and a score of men in uniform covered the inmates with their pistols, as the hoarse voice of their captain cried: "Surrender, in the Name of the Tsar!"

A SYLVAN GODDESS

HE was born in Rome, the city of grand memories. The daughter of the Duke de Somenita, she had been an orphan from earliest infancy. Her education had been delegated by her guardians, the Count de Sestri and his wife—who were prominent figures in the gay world, and received much in their Roman palace in winter, and in summer at their villa at Quisisana—to Miss Smithson, her English governess, who chose the best professors to give her an education worthy of the future queen of Roman society.

For Donna Stefana was a very beautiful girl. Though only sixteen, she already had a dignity beyond her years; her large eyes, like those of the Isis in the Vatican, were frank and brilliant; her cameo-like profile, her scarlet lips, the shape and poise of her head, her lithe figure, suggested an antique statue. By constant association with the masterpieces of art one takes on, in some measure, their characteristics; and Donna Stefana preferred to worldly distractions long walks in the Vatican galleries, moonlit evenings in the Colosseum, and excursions to Tivoli and Frascati.

While Donna Stefana was still a young girl she was allowed to devote herself to her artistic tastes. She painted, she sang, she recited, and her professors were delighted with her talents. But when she attained her eighteenth year she was obliged to appear at the countess's drawing-rooms. "Donna Stefana," as the countess's intimates called her, had to maintain her share in fashionable chatter, to dress, to confer with milliners, to pass her nights at balls dancing with the young men, who seemed to her either importunate or wearisome. She was like a goddess strayed among mortals.

One evening at Quisisana Miss Smithson and her pupil were lingering in that delightful forest, whose beauties are too little known to strangers. The great jet of the fountain fell in silvery spray under the moon's beams and lent a refreshing coolness to the warmth of an Italian July night. The air was delicious, and Miss Smithson did not, as was her custom, urge Donna Stefana to hasten back to the villa and dress for the countess's reception.

The nightingales were singing in the midst of the green forest, when suddenly they stopped, interrupted by a stronger song, accompanied by a guitar swept by a practised hand. It was the song of Rhadames from the first act of "Aida." Then several voices intoned the chorus of the priests of Osiris, but as there were only male voices the song of the priests was, perforce, taken by the guitar. Moved by the artist's impulse, Donna Stefana, when it came to the song again, took it up with a fulness of voice made only the greater by the sonorousness of the forest; then the singers continued, and Rhadames ended the scene.

After a moment of silence, Donna Stefana and Miss Smithson saw a group of singers, dressed as tourists, emerge from the forest, evidently in search of the fair singer. At their head walked a dark young man, who wore a Tyrolean hat, such as the Milanese wear when they travel. He was dark, with an aquiline profile, a pointed beard, his moustaches turning up, and deep-set black eyes.

Donna Stefana, not yet recovered from her emotion, stood erect near the basin, dressed as usual in white.

"It is Isis herself," exclaimed the singer. "Goddess or mortal, tell me, I conjure you," he continued, uncovering and sinking on one knee before her, "who you are?"

"I am Donna Stefana," involuntarily replied the fascinated girl.

"Duchess de Somenita," added Miss Smithson. "Pray do not forget that, sir, and let us pass."

The singer rose, gave a signal at which his suite opened to give free passage to the ladies, and bowed gracefully before them.

"I am Don Enrique de Britta, known on the stage as 'Juanito,'" he said. "It is to be regretted that the signora is a duchess. What an Aida she would make at the Teatro San Carlo!"

Donna Stefana did not reply. Miss Smithson murmured a dry "Thank you, sir," and, taking her pupil's arm, drew her to the drive, where a carriage awaited them. A moment later the mysterious Isis disappeared from the dazzled eyes of Juanito and his companions.

"What an adventure!" cried one of the young fellows, who were French artists from the Medicis Villa, in Rome, now on their summer vacation.

"She is the Duchess de Somenita, the great heiress," murmured Juanito, "and the Count de Sestri is her guardian."

"You are dreaming, Juanito," laughed Sartige, a Parisian painter and a great friend of the tenor. "Has the Goddess Isis fascinated you? Take care, she is only a young girl. She is not the Countess X. or the Princess Z. She will not send you a little note with a thousand sweet nothings in it."

"No, she will not write to me, but——"

"But——" repeated Sartige. "Come, confess your thoughts."

"I think she already loves me," Juanito said, in a low tone, "and quite as much as I love her."

"Indeed!" Sartige replied; but he said nothing more, for, knowing Juanito's romantic life, he knew that he was of the race of charmers.

"Come, Juanito," said one of the band, "let us continue our stroll. We should make the most of such a night."

"Let us serenade Count Sestri's villa," said Juanito. "There is a reception there this evening, and they will be delighted with the surprise; each signora will imagine it is in her especial honour," and the young fellows slung their guitars over their shoulders and set forth with springing tread.

They soon emerged from the forest, and finally stood before the high wall, surmounted by a terraced walk, that belonged to the Sestri Villa.

After a brief prelude on the guitars, they intoned the serenade of Flotow's "Indra," and then Juanito sang the inimitable and classic serenade of Almaviva in "Il Barbiere."

At the first notes the guests in the villa streamed out upon the terrace. Donna Stefana, with a light veil thrown over her head, seated herself on the parapet just opposite to Juanito, who devoured her with his eyes as he sang. At the end of the serenade she let fall a spray of jessamine, which Juanito caught up and pressed to his lips.

The ladies took the cue, and covered the ground with flowers, the men applauding madly.

"Come in, gentlemen," said the Count de Sestri; "you are welcome to my house."

Juanito, followed by the delighted French artists, ascended the marble steps that gave access to the gardens of the villa. The count and his guests came to meet the merry troupe, and conducted them to the other side of the villa, on that famous lawn whence one sees Vesuvius and Naples framed, as it were, by the immense trees of the garden. Juanito sang untiringly, stopping only to let his friends sing the choruses of the most famous operas.

Meanwhile, footmen spread a table on the lawn, and the company supped there under the stars, laughing and singing. The ladies were delighted to meet thus intimately artists who were such good company, so full of wit and jollity.

Juanito managed to be placed at table near Donna Stefana, who, under the influence of his glances, fell more and more under his charm. She looked only at him, and with a depth of emotion entirely foreign to her usual character. She wished that the whole universe might disappear from her sight, and that she might be left to adore her idol, like a heathen kneeling before her god.

At the end of the supper young Prince Andreo Benito, an enthusiastic lover of music, proposed the health of Juanito: "To Don Juanito, king of tenors," he said; "to his glory and his triumph!"

Juanito thanked him with a graceful gesture, "I drink to our Amphitryon," he said: "and to the goddess of the forests of Quisisana, who directed my steps, hither," he added, looking fixedly at Donna Stefana, "to the goddess whom I adore, and who is ever in my thoughts."

Donna Stefana paled under this bold declaration, which was comprehensible to her alone.

Dawn was breaking over the Apennines when the party broke up, tinting the snow-clad peaks with a rosy glow. Juanito and his friends descended to Castellamare di Stabia, where they took lodgings at the hotel. The next day it was arranged they were to visit Salerno and Amalfi, but Juanito made pretext of business at Naples to let his companions leave without him.

"You are staying at Quisisana," declared Sartige, who knew him of old, "to see that young girl, and I assure you you are making a mistake. She is not one of the whimsical and passionate creatures you are used to greeting. Believe me, you will do well to let her forget you."

"Forget me!" said Juanito. "Do you think her capable of it? If I thought she could I would not take the trouble to see her again."

"True," sighed Sartige, "you are unforgetable. Fate has given you the form of a hero of romance, with a voice more than seductive. You combine with Mephisto's adroitness the gentleness of a Romeo. Poor Goddess Isis. Poor Donna Stefana! I pity her."

"And why—since I love her?" replied Juanito, with such naïve simplicity that Sartige made no reply, but shrugged his shoulders and followed his companions.

That very evening, Juanito, guided by that instinct innate in the born gallant, posted himself near the fountain in the forest. He was sure that Donna Stefana would go there, involuntarily attracted by the remembrance of the night before. And, in fact, scarcely had he thrown himself on the moss at the foot of a grand old oak when he saw the young girl appear alone, followed by a great Russian hound, her favourite dog. She passed round the basin, and, stopping at the very place where she had stood on the previous evening, heaved a deep sigh. Juanito rose, and, approaching her, stepped into the path of light thrown by the moon. She saw him, and seemed petrified with surprise. He profited by this to approach, and sank down on one knee beside her.

"Do not be frightened," he said; "I have stayed here because I love you." The man seemed to grant a favour in declaring that he deigned to love her, and he was disingenuously frank.

In her innocence Donna Stefana did not comprehend this trick. She let her hand slip into his, and sunk in inexpressible ecstasy, drank in the sweet words he murmured in her ear. It was he—he, the man who had so completely fascinated her being—who was there on his knees before her. Seeing her trembling with emotion Juanito slipped his arm about her waist.

Many young men had held their arms about her in dancing, and Donna Stefana had felt no emotion. Juanito's arm seemed to be a circle of flame that burned her. Frightened, she gently pushed him from her.

At that moment Miss Smithson, who had been detained at the villa, rejoined her pupil.

"Sir," she cried, "what are you doing? Do not touch Donna Stefana!"

"Donna Stefana felt ill," Juanito replied, "and I was supporting her. Moreover, my intentions are perfectly honourable; if Donna Stefana will deign to give me her hand I will accept it on my knees."

"You should make such a request of Count Sestri," Miss Smithson replied. "Permit us to retire," and the governess led Donna Stefana away, with a gesture forbidding Juanito to follow them.

The next day Count Sestri received a letter from Juanito. On reading it he burst out laughing, and went to the Countess's apartments to share his hilarity with her. There he found Donna Stefana and Miss Smithson.

He gave Juanito's letter to the Countess, and then turned to Donna Stefana.

"My dear child," he said, "you have made a conquest. This fool of a Juanito wants to abandon his career of conquests and triumphs in two continents to marry you. What can have got into his head? The idea of his marrying the daughter of a noble house and dragging her from city to city, living such a Bohemian existence as his! He is a rich Bohemian, to be sure, but he is a singer, a mountebank, look at it as you will. It is such preposterous folly that I shall not take the trouble to reply to his ridiculous proposal."

The Countess disdainfully tossed the letter into a basket.

"He is mad!" she commented, calmly. "But it is luncheon time. Give me your arm, and forget his impertinence. And do not tell any one of it; such an adventure cannot fail to tarnish the reputation of a young girl of our world."

Donna Stefana said nothing, but in a flash she measured the gulf that the world put between her and the tenor.

After luncheon she went down to Castellamare and took the train. She knew that Juanito was staying with Sartige, whose studio was well known in Chiatamonte. She inquired her way thither, and, leaving Miss Smithson in the carriage, mounted the stairs alone. As a milliner also lived in the house she gave as a pretext certain directions about trimming a hat that she must give personally. She entered the studio, softly opening the door, and found herself confronted by a curtain that served as a screen before the door. Frightened at her own audacity she stopped, and then she heard her name spoken.

"Donna Stefana," Sartige was saying, "is a well-born young girl, and the count would never give her to you willingly. And what would you do with her in your nomadic life!—she would only be a drag on you. I cannot picture you as a staid father, in slippers and dressing gown? And then you know that, once married, a tenor loses all prestige in the eyes of the public. You will be irritated by it, you will want to prove that you are still the hero of all your romances. Poor Donna Stefana, I pity her," and Sartige continued, as he spoke, to paint from his model, a pretty Transteverine girl disguised for the nonce as Summer. "Don't move, Bianca, you are posed perfectly," he said to the girl; "that is unless you want to go and kiss my friend Juanito, to make him forget his matrimonial projects."

"That's a suggestion not to be refused," laughed Bianca, and she bounded on Juanito's knees, pressing her lips to his—an attention to which Juanito did not fail to respond in kind.

At that moment there was a knock at the door at the further end of the room, and a servant entered and handed a letter to Juanito. As the tenor tore open the envelope, several thousand franc bank notes fluttered to the floor.

"Twenty-five thousand francs!" exclaimed Sartige, as he gathered them up. "Where does such a windfall drop from?"

"Read for yourself," replied Juanito, and he handed the letter to Sartige and impressed a kiss on Bianca's dimpled cheek.

Sartige read the letter:—

"Dear Signor Juanito:—Enclosed please find twenty-five thousand francs, which I beg you will accept for the delightful serenade you were good enough to give us the other evening. Believe me, the Countess and I am greatly obliged to you. Pray accept my excuses for the trifling amount of the inclosure, and permit me to sign myself always your grateful

"SESTRI."

"Bravo!" cried Sartige. "A pretty reply truly, and from a true grand seigneur! Well, what are you going to do now?"

"Oh, well, I shall skip off to Rome and Paris. I shall be able to have a good time now before I sail for America."

Donna Stefana descended the stairs with tottering steps, and fell into the arms of the astonished and terrified Miss Smithson. Arrived at Quisisana she was carried to her room, and it was two months before she rose from her bed, very pale, but more beautiful than ever. She had acquired that sphinx-like beauty that is possessed only by women who have been torn by suffering.

Two years later she married the young Duke de Welzio, Prince de Bertini. Proud and calm, covered with diamonds, her little duchess crown upon the rare lace that had veiled her beautiful head, she stepped forth on her husband's arm from the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, where the ceremony had just taken place.

In the midst of the crowd before her she saw Juanito, his eyes fixed on her as if in mute supplication. Not a muscle, not a fibre moved; she did not even turn away to avoid his look, which shone upon her as a ray of sunshine might rest on an icicle without melting it.

THE ROMANCE OF FIR TOP.

UP a long, rock-walled, Colorado mountain road crept a swaying, yellow-painted stage-coach. On the box with the driver sat a youthful person, with an oldish face, surmounted by a pocket hat. Something in his manner denoted an acquaintance with the vicissitudes of life in all its aspects. The driver looked at him curiously and cracked his whip.

"Ever in a hold-up, pardner?"

"Yes."

"Tho't so. Ever helt up by a woman?"

"No."

"Tho't not. I wuz onct. Want ter hear 'bout it?"

The passenger looked sharply up, and said:

"Pitch in, if it's a true story."

"'Tis. See that bend up thar whar th' road slips 'round behin' th' mount'n?"

"Yes."

"That ar's th' place."

"What were the circumstances?"

"They wuz a pile 'r circumstances. Dick Brand was a wunner. Kep' th' hotel 'n Fir Top. Could drink mo' whiskey than any other man in th' county. Well, Dick gambled an' drunk, drunk an' gambled his time away. Never los' much stuff by it, tho', 'tel Doc Martin came ter town, fer th' boys all liked Linda an' Bet, so whenever Dick wuz losing, they'd make the squeezes run his way a while.

"When Doc Martin struck th' diggin's he put on lots of side 'ith his stove-pipe hat an' yaller gloves. First time 'e seen Linda 'e smirked a lot, and purty soon 'twuz going' th' roun's that th' Doc wuz loving Brand's gal. Linda wanted none 'r his love, an' she tole 'im so. Bin a white man, he'd 'r let her be then. But 'e wa'nt. He got playin' poker 'ith Dick Brand. Martin wuz a dandy 'ith th' cards, an' won all 'r pore fool's dust.

"Dick wuz wild ter git 'is money back, of co'se, an ast Martin ter wait tel 'e could go out an' borry some stuff from somer th' boys. Martin then up an' smiled a Chinee smile

"Then th' cards wuz dealt. Martin discarded three, Dick jest tuck one. An', by gum, pardner, I'll eat th' off leader ef Dick didn't lose. Soon as Doc Martin had pore Dick floored, 'e showed what 'e was leadin' fer. Plunked th' cash down an' th' morgedge an' offered Dick both fer his gal Linda. In case Brand refused, 'e wuz ter be sol outen house an' home.

"Dick wus clean white an' true ter his gals, even 'f 'e did play fool at gamblin'. Tole Martin ter go somers down 'bout Mexico—that ain't th' place he said, but it's in th' neighbourhood. Shuck 'is fist in th' schemey doctor's face, an' tole 'm he'd rather see Linda marry a Hong Kong washerwoman than pair off 'ith him. Martin jest turned chalky 'roun' th' gills an' went out 'thout sayin' a word. Tuck mitey good keer ter pocket th' morgedge an' cash, tho', befo' 'e went. An' 'e didn't stop 'tel 'e wuz outer the Rockies, nother.

"By gum, sir, that ar feller never showed 'is face in Fir Top agen fer a year. Yes, 'twuz mor'n a year. Brand knowed 'e'd come back tho', an' th' pore feller tried ever' way under th' sun ter git up that morgedge money. 'Twa'n't no use tho', an' th' mis'ry of thinkin' on it turned 'im sick.

"Jest befo' his time run out, 'e called Linda an' Bet ter 'is bunk, an' tole 'em th' whole story 'bout that ar poker game an' th' morgedge.

"'Bout thirteen months later on—Brand had bin buried ten months, an' wuz mitey nigh forgot—I carried in th' mail-bag one day, an' ole man Jinks, th' postmaster, went ter work sortin' out th' mail. Arter while 'e hefted one letter ter th' light, an' looked at it kinder grim through 'is specs. I wuz zettin' on a sugar bar'l, eaten crackers an' cheese. Th' ole man spoke up an' sed:

"'Yere's a letter fer Dick Brand. I d'no whuther or no ter sen' it back or give it ter Linda.' (In speakin' 'r th' gals, folks allers used Linda's name, 'cause she kinder helt th' lines.)

"Jest then Linda came in. She pushed back 'er gingham bonnet, an' sed: 'Is thar ennything fer me, Mister Jinks?'

"'Well, Miss Linda, I jest got a letter yere fer yer paw, but bein' as he ain't present ter receive it, mebbe I'd better give it ter you, seein' as how you air his darter.'

"'Yes, lemme take it,' sed Linda. The ole man poked it out, an' Linda tuck it. She turned th' envelope over ever' which a way, jest as if she could read it 'thout openin' it, like th' trick feller in th' circus. Then she tore it open an' begun ter read. I watched, an' seed her growin' pale an' skeered like. Then she give a sort of quick gasp an' tore th' letter all ter pieces. At that time I didn't know th' ins an' outs of th' game, but I had a glimmerin'. Linda turned ter me an' sed, in a sorter jerky tone of voice:

"'Phil, what 'ud you do if a man wuz goin' ter sell yer outer house an' home?'

"'I'd kill th' skunk, Miss Linda,' sed I, short off.

"'Well, looky yere now, Phil,' put in ole man Jinks, speakin' slow an' lookin' wise, 'don't yer think that ar 'ud be agoin' contrary ter th' statoots?'

"'Spec' it would,' sed I, lookin' in Linda's purty eyes; 'but when th' statoots makes a sweet little gal look like she wuz pluggin' up th' weeps, I sez consarn th' statoots.'

"Linda looked at me 'ith a soft little creepin' outer th' mist in her eyes, and went out.

"Now, who d'ye s'pose I tuck over ter Fir Top second trip arter Linda got th' letter? Don't know, eh? Well, yer oughter. 'Twuz Doc Martin. Yes, sir, when I pulled up 'longside 'r th' train, down thar at Sunset, the Doc come walkin' out, big as Ike, an' got in 'thout so much as sayin' 'howdy.' Two other fellers got in likewise. One wuz a miner an' t'other wuz some sorter science crank—minrologist, I think they called 'im.

"'Twuz th' middle of th' month, and skacely enny express money goin' over.

"Well, ter come down ter fine p'ints, as we nighed that ar bend in th' road that I showed you, th' hosses got skeered at somethin' they smelt in the wind. I give 'm th' lash, an' away they went. Jest as we rounded th' turn—me holdin' 'em in then, you know—I hear'd a shrill, boyish-soundin' voice yell out, 'Halt!' an' halt I did.

"Gosh, how well I knowed them tones! Rite in front of th' leaders stood a slim young feller, 'ith a mask over 'is eyes. Ther' wa'n't no whiskers or mistash on 'is face, nuther. Stickin' outer th' firs, 'longside 'r th' road, wuz four or five gunbar'ls. Mor'n likely th' wa'n't no men behind 'em, tho'. Jest then, out steps another slim-dandy kid, 'ith 'is forty-four cocked.

"'My fr'en's,' said he ter th' folks in th' coach, ''tain't no use fer you ter show fight. Them thickets is full of my men. Step out, an' cash up, please.'

"They got out, an' he went through 'em. Lef' the'r watches, but tuck the'r cash. Tuck all the'r papers, too, an' was specially keerful in 'is 'tentions ter Doc Martin. When ther play wuz over, th' robbers 'loped back inter th' firs, an' I druv on. Th' miner 'lowed as how they must be green stock, fer they never looked at the express box.

"Purty soon arter that, we got ter th' hotel. Them fellers didn't know whuther or not ter go in bein' as they had no cash, but I 'spicioned how things 'ud turn out, an' tole 'em I'd stan fer th' gang. They went in at that, an' Sally Jinks fixed things fer 'em, bein' as th' gals wa'n't at home. 'Bout a nour arter that they come in, tho', an' th' dinner bell rung. Th' strangers' lookin' purty doleful, walked out ter dinner, an' set down. Before they got through eatin', Big Wallace—him that runs th' faro bank—came hustlin' in an' sed:

"'Is them ar gents that come in th' stage here?'

"'Yes,' they all hollered at onct.

"'Well, ther vig'lunce c'mitty's done tuck them fellers that robbed th' stage, an' strung 'em up. Yere's all th' plunder. You gent's just name th' 'mounts you had in stuff, an' if th' totul fits, you kin divide up 'mong ye. These yere dockyments, I'spose, kin be 'dentified.'

"Linda an Bet wuz a-settin' rite thar all th' time. Bet spoke up an' sed: 'Mister Wallace, wuz them robbers enny folks we knowed?'

"'No, Miss Bet; I guess they wuz new han's, jest struck th' trail. Boys' novel cranks, mebbe.'

"Twa'n't no time before them fellers had the'r stuff fixed proper, an' they wuz mighty jubilant, you kin bet, exceptin' ther Doc, who kep' touslin' his papers about, like he wuz huntin' fer somethin'.

"'What's th' matter, Doc,' sed I; 'ennything wrong?'

"'Why, yes,' sed he; 'they's a valubul paper yere that's missin'. It's morgedge fer a thousan' dollars, an' overdue, too.'

"He kep' lookin' an' lookin', but twa'n't thar. Then he kinder sighed, an' said, gentle-like: 'It don't make no difference, nohow, fer th' morgedge is recorded in New York.'

"Yer oughter jest seed them gals. Th'r faces looked as if the'r fr'en' had sent 'em an invite ter 'is fun'rull. Big Wallace wuz that sheepish he couldn't show 'is eyes, an' I felt sorter slack myself."

"Did he sell them out?"

"He woulder, but, you see, th' morgedge wuz paid. Linda wuz engaged ter th' foreman of th' Royal Flush, but she never had tole 'im 'bout th' poker game. When she foun' 'er road scheme wa'n't no go, she let down an' tole 'im th' whole story. Cried doing it, too, I surmise. Her feller had some stuff saved up, an' 'e jest paid Mister Doc, an' then kicked 'im outer camp. Linda named the day then, an' she lives 'ith her husband in a snug little shack up by th' Royal Flush Mill, an' Bet runs th' ole house. Thar she is now, stan'in' on th' po'ch an' peekin' out from under her bonnet at th' stage."

CHAPTER XLVII.

The End of the "Bremen."

"We won't tell any of them yet," said Sir Harry, after he had taken a long look through the glasses at the distant tinge of brown haze that blurred the western horizon. "I think we had better make sure first so as not to spoil the honour of the first discovery for you, if it turns out really to be the Bremen."

"Oh, I don't see any particular honour in it," said Dora, with just a perceptible shudder. "This is horrible, all this fighting and destruction. If you promise not to tell, I'll confess that I fainted right off when you sunk the yacht the other day. It seemed so awful to think of, these two ships flying up in the clouds out of reach, and blowing that unfortunate steamer to pieces, and sending her and everyone on board her to the bottom of the sea. I sometimes think the world must have gone half mad for such dreadful things to be possible—to say nothing about their being necessary, as I suppose that was."

"I quite agree with you," said Sir Harry. "The world is really much more of a mad-house than the conceit of humanity would care to admit. As a matter of fact, with all our boasted religion and civilisation, we are very little removed in some respects from mere beasts of prey. Indeed, where the predatory instincts are concerned we are rather below them than otherwise. They kill because they must kill, or else die of starvation; we kill when we have ample. No tiger ever killed an antelope or an ox just to show that he was the stronger beast of the two or to prove his exclusive right to a certain piece of jungle."

"I like to hear you say that, Sir Harry, because——"

"Now look here, Miss Dora, I have no doubt you were going to say something that it would be pleasant for me to hear," he said interrupting her; "but before you say it I wish you would explain how it is that a good Socialist like yourself can persist—well, I had almost said so obstinately—in using that most unsocialistic prefix to my name? You know what I mean."

"Yes," she said, with a faint flush on her cheek and just the suspicion of a roguish twinkle in her eyes, "I think I can quite understand what you mean, and perhaps I can answer you by reminding you that we Utopians don't call each other Miss and Mr. in our conversation."

"Oh, but then you know——. Hullo! yes, that must be the Bremen. A big steamer with no masts and two funnels, apparently going nowhere, just as Berthauld described her. If you'll pardon me, Dora—I mean, of course, Miss Dora—I'm afraid I shall have to postpone what bade fair to be a very interesting conversation, at any rate for me. If all goes well, we shall be back at Utopia in a few days, and then——"

"And then," said Dora, who meanwhile had opened the door of the conning-tower, "you will have had time to think out a suitably conventional apology for leaving out the 'Miss' just now. Good morning! I am going to see if Violet is awake."

"Yes, I think I can quite understand."

And with that she vanished and shut the door behind her, leaving Sir Harry with his attention for the moment perplexingly divided between thoughts of love and war.

The latter, however, imperatively demanded all his energies, for while they had been talking, the War-Hawk had been flying swiftly, and had brought him within plain view of the object which had attracted Dora's attention. A second look through his glasses convinced him that the object lying on the waters far below him was nothing else than the craft of which they were in search. He took its bearing carefully, and dotted its position down on a chart on which the latitude and longitude of the War-Hawk had already been marked at sunrise. Then he spun the steering wheel round until the dot lay dead astern of the air-ship, sent the signal for full speed to the engine-room, and the War-Hawk darted away westward in search of her consort.

The Volante, returning by arrangement to the rendezvous, was picked up after four hours' flight, and as soon as the plan of attack had been arranged between them, the two returned to the eastward, and a little before mid-day they were soaring at a height of eight thousand feet above a calm sea, on which was floating the mastless Bremen, steaming to the eastward at a leisurely speed of about ten knots. To their intense disappointment there was no sign of the Destroyer to be seen, and so they were forced to conclude that she was away on one of her raiding expeditions for coal and stores.

Great as was the height at which they were floating, their glasses enabled them to make out the shape of an air-ship lying upon the Bremen's decks. Unfortunately, too, for their hopes of a surprise, the sky was absolutely cloudless and so they would be visible from the Bremen's decks, if only as a couple of tiny specks drifting across the background of the intense blue above them.

"Confound it, they have seen us!" said Sir Harry to Mr. Austen, who had now come to take his accustomed place in the conning-tower. "Look, the air-ship is rising. I wish we could have got a shell into them before they spotted us."

"We couldn't have done that in this clear atmosphere, and I don't think it very much matters, because, as the Yankees would say, we have decidedly got the drop on them, and I don't think there is much chance of escape. There goes Adams down to cut him off. He'll keep the air-ship busy, and we'll sink the steamer and then go and help him if it's necessary."

"Yes, that's the plan," said Sir Harry. "So I'll leave you to your manœuvring and go and take a turn at the guns. Good-bye for the present."

"Good-bye. Shoot straight!" said Mr. Austen as he turned to leave the conning-tower.

"As straight as I can, you may depend upon it," laughed Sir Harry as he closed the door and went down to the gun-room.

According to the arrangements already made, the Volante dropped about four thousand feet in a slanting direction towards the steamer from whose deck the Anarchist air-ship had now risen about fifteen hundred feet. She was evidently managed by an experienced hand, for she shot away to the southward at full speed and on an upward course so as to gain the advantage of being pursued. But Adams had learned a good deal from the story of the War-Hawk's fight with the three vessels over Northumberland and lost no time in frustrating this manœuvre.

The Anarchist had about a mile start of him, but she had the worst of the elevation and the Volante, putting on full speed, rushed away after her, soaring two feet for her one, until the positions were reversed and Adams was able to give the order for the stern guns to open fire on him. He slowed down until the two ships were almost relatively stationary, and presently a couple of shells burst together about fifty feet above the red flag that was flying at the Anarchist's stern.

He saw her stop for an instant, and, as it were, shiver in the shaken atmosphere. Then she dropped two or three hundred feet, came to equilibrium, and swung round to fly northward again.

The moment that she wasted in turning was fatal, for one of the gunners had his gun loaded again, and just as she stopped for a second on the turn sent a lucky shell, which passed through one of her broad air-planes and exploded underneath it, blowing it into ribbons. The next instant she turned over like a winged bird, and with one awful plunge dropped like a stone into the sea four thousand feet below. They saw a little splash far away in the calm water, and that was all.

"That settled her affair," said Berthauld a few moments after, as he opened the door of the conning-tower and looked in. "I had the honour of firing that shot, Mr. Adams. I learnt my gunnery under Max Renault, on board the Vengeur. I hope now that if you had any doubts of my sincerity——"

"I never had any, M. Berthauld," replied Adams. "If I had had you would not be here now, but that was a splendid shot and I congratulate you, wherever you learnt to shoot. In future, if you care to take it, you shall have charge of one of the Volante's guns."

Dropped like a stone into the sea.

"It is an honour that I shall prize highly," said the Corsican.

"Yours are splendid guns, better both for range and accuracy than Renault's, and now I will go back and get ready to have a shot at the Bremen, if your consort has not already destroyed her."

As he closed the door of the conning-tower again, Adams swung the Volante round and headed her back to the northward, where, far away in the distance, he could see a dark speck on the water, with puffs of smoke breaking out every moment about it.

Ten minutes brought him within range, but by this time the War-Hawk's guns had already done terrible execution. She had sunk to within two thousand feet of the helpless and defenceless Bremen, and shell after shell was bursting upon the quondam liner's decks. As the Volante slowed up, her two bow guns came into action, and so well were they served that a perfect rain of shells was hurled upon the terrified and now despairing Anarchists.

The return of the Volante alone told them that their air-ship had been destroyed, and that they had now nothing to look for but swift and certain destruction. So far as they were concerned their reign of terror was over. The tables had been turned on them with a vengeance, and, maddened by panic and despair, dozens of them leapt overboard as though preferring death by drowning to being mangled and torn to pieces by the shells from the sky.

"Rats leaving a sinking ship!" said Sir Harry with a short savage laugh, as he trained his gun afresh upon the Bremen and sent another shell to its mark. "It is fearful work this fighting, but there is a horrible fascination about it that makes one absolutely enjoy it while you're at it."

"Especially when you are shooting at such vermin as these," said Markham, who was at the other gun, as he sent another shell on its errand of destruction. "Those fellows seem to have very little taste for their own kind of physic, but, after all, it is quite as good as the hanging they could only expect, if we were able to take them prisoners. There goes the last of the funnels. Now I think Mr. Austen might let us try a few bombs."

He had hardly spoken the words before a message came down the tube from the conning-tower telling them to cease firing and man the bomb-tubes.

"I thought so," said Markham, as he left his gun. "She is not much better than a wreck now, and a few minutes with the bombs will finish her."

The War-Hawk now forged ahead a little until she came to a standstill exactly over the doomed Brèmen. Meanwhile, the six bomb tubes had been charged, and at the signal, "Let go," the six bombs, each filled with twenty pounds of dynamite, were released simultaneously. A blaze of light flashed out almost from stem to stern of the Bremen; then came the roar of the combined explosions, and they saw the great ship literally split from end to end. A vast cloud of smoke and steam rolled up, and when this had drifted away under the light breeze from the northward, the floating dockyard of the Anarchists had vanished beneath the waters of the Atlantic.

"Horrible, but necessary!" said Sir Harry drily, as he saw the bomb tubes closed, and went to his sister's cabin to tell her and Dora that it was all over.

"It is a frightful fate, even for those wretches," said Violet, half pityingly, when he had told her the news. "But I suppose it had to be done, if the world was to be saved from them. And where are we going to now?"

"Utopia is the next port of call, I believe," replied Sir Harry. "You know I told you that some of the scoundrels had taken possession of it, and so we shall have to go and clear them out. In fact, from what Berthauld tells me, we are going to do exactly what Renault intended to do to us, if it hadn't been for that lucky shot of Peter Jackson's which laid him up for a month, and so gave us time to get out with whole skins.

"That's the irony of fate, you see. 'The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small,' as the Spanish proverb says. It seems a strange thing, and yet, as a matter of sober fact, the fate of the world probably turned on that one lucky, but entirely unjustifiable, shot which Peter Jackson fired. If it hadn't been for that, I don't suppose one of us would have got out of Utopia alive, and so Renault would have been the sole possessor of the secret, and would have had the world at his mercy."

"But fancy bloodshed in our beautiful Utopia!" said Dora, with a shudder. "Who of us would ever have thought that our paradise was going to be turned into a battlefield, or a slaughter-house, for I suppose it will be more like that than anything else? I won't see it. Violet, you and I will shut ourselves up here until it's over. I could never think Utopia the same again if I saw people being killed on it."

"Well, sweetheart."

"Yes, we will do that," said Violet. "I think I love Utopia now quite as much as you do, and I couldn't bear to see it desecrated by bloodshed any more than you could."

So it came to pass four days later that the two girls sat hand in hand silent and trembling in their darkened cabin listening to the crash of exploding shells and the fearful thudding roar of the machine guns which told them that the extermination of the Anarchists who had taken possession of Utopia was being carried out with pitiless thoroughness.

They felt the air-ship rising and sinking, shooting forward and stopping, and every now and then swinging swiftly round, and this went on for six hours incessantly. Then at last they felt her gently touch the ground and come to a standstill. As she did so the door of their cabin opened and Sir Harry came in in his shirt-sleeves, and with the perspiration running down his face.

"It is all over!" he said huskily. "You can come out now, for there isn't one of the scoundrels left alive on Utopia. It's been hot work, but we've done it. Look—doesn't it seem like being at home again?"

As he spoke he pulled the window-slide back and when Dora and Violet looked out they saw that the War-Hawk was resting on the plateau on which they had held their memorable New Year's Day picnic, and far away below them the lovely familiar landscape stretched away down to the bay and on from the white coral beach across the emerald water of the lagoon to the long white line of breakers tossing and foaming on the reef.

"How delightful it is to be able to breathe this glorious air again!" exclaimed Violet as her brother and Markham carried her chair out into the open. "If only poor Bertie were here now instead of being cooped up in a ship under water, I think I could get well altogether in a week. Why—what is the matter?" she continued, glancing anxiously from one to another of the little group about her chair. "What are you looking at each other like that for—has anything happened to Bertie? Tell me at once, please. Don't be afraid even if he is—if he is dead, for if he is I know that he will have died at his duty like a sailor and a gentleman."

There was silence for a moment and then Dr. Roberts, passing a slip of tissue paper to Sir Harry said:

"Tell her, Milton, you can do it better than I."

"What is it? Never mind telling me. Give it to me!" exclaimed Violet almost snatching the paper out of her brother's hand. She opened it with trembling fingers and read through a gathering mist of tears:

"Bull Point Station,
"July 17th, midnight.

"News just received that Nautilus was surprised and torpedoed by unknown vessel off Scillies soon after nightfall. Wyndham in command. None saved. "GARDNER."

"It is God's will and the fortune of war," murmured Violet in a weak, broken voice. "Oh, my poor brave Bertie, to think of you dying like that! Take me back, I——"

Then her head fell forward on her breast, and her hands dropped limply on her lap.

"It has killed her! I thought it would," cried Sir Harry, springing forward and taking hold of her hand. "Roberts how could you——"

"Dead—nonsense—she has only fainted. I'll have her round in three minutes," said the doctor, bustling off to the ship for his restoratives. "There's no harm done, don't be afraid."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

PLOT AND COUNTERPLOT.

"WELL, sweetheart, I think that danger is past for the present. I thought at one time they were going to break into open revolt, but I managed to convince them in the end of my good faith and devotion to the sacred cause of Anarchy. That compromise was not at all a bad idea. I am to take Hartog into my confidence, tell him the secret of the composition of the fuel, and whenever I go away from the camp, leave the formula for its preparation in a place known to him, so that if anything happens to me he can come back, find it and prepare the fuel as it's wanted. Very pretty, isn't it?"

"And are you going to do it?" asked Lea, looking up at Max with a smile of incredulity. They were alone together in their sitting-room in the bungalow on the afternoon of the day on which the Council of War had been held at the camp of Mount Pietra. Lea for some reason of her own, which she declined to give, had not been present, and Max had been explaining to her what had taken place.

"Do it?" he said with a short laugh at her question. "No, I see you don't take me seriously. You know me too well for that. I have been expecting this trouble ever since I brought the Vengeur away from Utopia. The command of the air is a magnificent thing; but, like every other priceless possession, it entails endless difficulties and dangers. You see, we are above and beyond all human laws now, and that cuts both ways. I am the master of these fellows just as long as I can keep them in hand by moral force, and remain the only possessor of the secret. Now they want the secret, and they mean to have it.

"If I don't find some means of outwitting them they will take it by force, or, anyhow, I don't suppose one of them would scruple to use the methods of the Holy Inquisition and torture me till they either killed me or wrung it out of me. Yet, on the other hand, if I tell them, every one of them is equal to me, all command is at an end, and therefore all concerted action. Then every one would be plotting against every body else to kill him, so as to remain the sole possessor of the command of the air.

"They might work together until we have smashed up those two or three ships that the Syndicate seems to have, but after that it would simply be a matter of mutual extermination until only one man was left in command of one ship, and he would be able to do as he pleased until one of his crew killed him or forced him to share the secret with him, and so on. That is Anarchy in command of the air, worked out to its logical conclusion. These idiots don't see how our conditions have changed since we left the earth for the air; and, as they won't submit to reasonable and necessary control, they shall pay for their folly and their want of confidence in a way that will considerably astonish them.

"What I mean to do is this, and I shall want your help in doing it. The only really dangerous man among them is Hartog, and he will have to be disposed of. He is coming with us in the Revanche to-morrow, because none of the other fellows will give up the command of their ship, and so he will have to wait for the new one that should be coming from the Atlantic in a few days now. Ostensibly, we are going out to meet her and hand her over to Franz. I shall write out the formula to-night, show it to Franz, and then hide it. I'll take care you know where it's hidden and you must manage to get hold of it, and destroy it before we start.

"Then, when once we get Franz on board the Revanche, over the Bay of Biscay, I'll denounce him as a traitor to the crew, who, I really believe, are devoted body and soul to me, and then I'll put a bullet through his ugly head and drop him into the Bay. When that's done we'll just get right out of the way and lie low for a month or two. Meanwhile, the other fellows will have used up their supply of fuel, and the air-ships will be lying waiting, useless and helpless, in the camp, and some fine morning we'll come back and wipe the lot out. Now, what do you think of that?"

"Excellent," replied Lea, with an admiring smile. "It couldn't be better, as far as it goes; but haven't you forgotten the Syndicate and its fleet? What are you going to do about them?"

"Mein Gott, it is gone."

"Oh, for that I shall have to trust, to a certain extent, to the chapter of accidents; but that danger is not by any means as great as it seems at first sight. When we have disappeared for a bit the odds are they'll think we've quarrelled among ourselves and wiped each other out, or something of that sort. They'll never find the fleet up here, and we can keep out of sight, and, whenever we get a chance, drop unexpectedly on one or two of their air-ships and blow them up until we've got rid of the lot in detail.

"It won't matter if it takes a year or two to do it. There'll be no hurry when these other fellows are disposed of; and then, when the Revanche is the only air-ship in existence, and we've killed, as we probably shall have done, Austen and Adams and the rest of them, we can begin a nice, pleasant little reign of terror on our own account."

"I see, I see!" said Lea. "That will be famous, if we can only do it; and, after all, I really don't see why we shouldn't. I suppose you won't mind Sophie Vronsky coming on board with us, will you, if only for Taxil's sake and mine? She is really the only girl in the world I can make a companion of, and I feel pretty certain that there would be difficulties with Raoul when he knew she was to be abandoned with the rest."

"Oh, yes; of course, she can come!" laughed Max in reply. "I've always thought she would make a capital sweetheart for Raoul, and I am quite glad to hear that they are likely to make a bargain of it. Now I must be off and see the Revanche got ready for her cruise to-morrow. It may be a rather long one; it would not do to have anything left out. Meanwhile, you and Sophie use your eyes and your ears, and learn everything you can that may be of use to us."

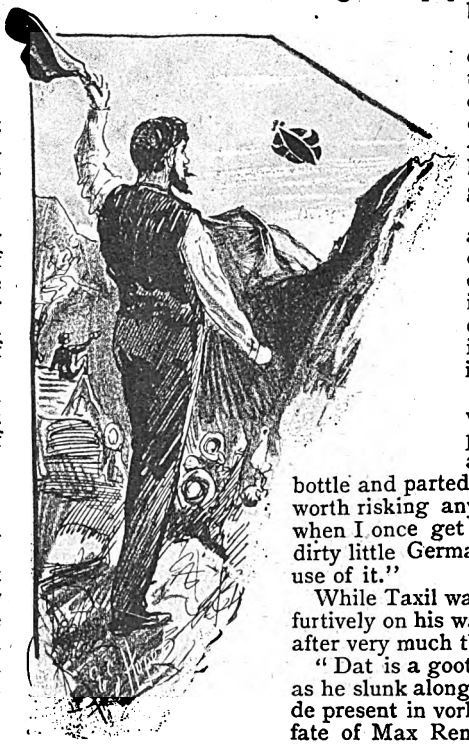
Later on that afternoon Max fulfilled his part of the bargain he had made with the captains of the fleet by writing out the formula, showing it to Hartog, and arranging with him where it was to be buried by them as soon as it was dark enough for them to do so unobserved by the others in the camp.

Of course, Max did not forget to tell Lea the spot fixed upon, and how he would mark it for her; and so adroitly did she follow his directions, that the priceless paper had not been lying underground, in the bottle in which they had inclosed it, for more than an hour before she had dug it up again with her own hands, taken it out of the bottle, and replaced it almost exactly as she had found it.

But nearly six hours later—that is to say, about a little before four o'clock in the morning—another visit was paid to the spot, this time by two men who had stolen out of the sleeping camp by different ways and met there, obviously not by accident.

"Now, my tear Taxil," said one of them in a hoarse, guttural whisper, "dis is de spot, and ve vill have it out in tree minutes. It is not buried fery deep. I did not tink it vas vorth vile, as I should vant it again so soon. You haf got your trowel, now dig avay. If ve only vorks our plans out right, dot little piece of paper vill mean de empire of de vorld to us; and you shall reign ofer it, mit de beautiful Lea, and I vill be your prime minister and chief engineer.

"Ve vill share de secret between us, and take tundering goot care dat no von else gets it so soon as ve haf got dat fool Renault out of de vay. Dat vas very lucky dat Sophie believes you so much in love mit her, and so faithful to Max, dat she told you vat a dangerous person I am, and how dey vas going to put me out of de vay. Now, if dey only knew dat it vas not Sophie at all, but the incomparable Lea, dat you haf been consuming your heart mit love for all de time in secret, I tinks de game vould haf been blayed a little differently, eh?"



Hats were waved.

"I suppose so," said Taxil, who meanwhile had been digging away with his trowel. "But, after all, it's Renault's own fault. He shouldn't have brought a girl like Lea into the Camp, or on board his ship. He must have queer ideas of Anarchy, after all, if he expected we should leave her to him, to say nothing of giving him the supreme command as well. Fancy us—Anarchists and enemies of all laws—setting up a king over us, and giving him absolute power of life and death, for that is what the possession of the secret means, after all's said and done! Ah, here we are; this is the bottle I suppose," he said, as the blade of his trowel struck with a clink on the glass.

"Jah, dot vill be it," whispered Franz, pulling a corkscrew out of his pocket as Taxil drew the bottle from the hole. "Gif it to me, and I vill open it."

Taxil handed him the bottle and he gently drew the cork, and then inverted the bottle over his hand and shook it. Of course nothing came out, for the tiny roll of paper had long ago been consumed to ashes in Lea's bedroom fire.

"Mein Gott, it is gone!" said Hartog in an agitated whisper. "By tam, dere are traitors in de camp! Now, vat is dat for a foul, dirty piece of treachery! No, dere is noding dere," he continued, shaking the bottle still more vigorously. "Now dot vill show you vat a scoundrel dat Renault is. No von else knew of de place but him, and he has come and stolen it avay. Taxil, my poy, dis is serious. Ve vill have to act sharp and prompt to-morrow or you vill never get your Lea, and I shall haf a bullet trough mine head. Are you sure you can trust de men?"

"Every one of them!" replied Taxil. "They can't stand Renault's discipline, and they hate him for it, especially since he shot Gaston that day for grumbling at the strictness of the rules. They say they might as well be sailor-slaves on board a man-of-war instead of free Anarchists, as they ought to be.

"No, there won't be any difficulty with them, especially as I've promised them plenty of plunder, and at least a village a week to sack and amuse themselves in. That's the sort of life they want. They're sick of just stopping up in the air and up here, and having all fighting and no fun. But we shall have to polish Renault off pretty quickly in the morning, now that he's got the paper back. By the way, I hope you've remembered what there was on it."

"Dere vas no fear of dat, my poy. You don't vant to show me figures twice for me to remember dem; and, besides, I wrote it out again—not completely, 'cause I had no chance, but enough to help me remember it—immediately after ve had buried it. Anyhow, it is impossible for dose oder fellows to get it, and dat is all ve vanted to take it for.

"Now, you had better bury de bottle again so dat some von else can find de choke out for demselves, for ven ve are gone dose chaps vill be hunting all ofer de valley for it. It is fery sad, but dere is not von of dem dat can keep faith mit de oder. Dat is de vorst of dese common sort of Anarchists.'

"And I don't suppose you'll keep faith with me much longer than it suits your purpose, you little pig," said Taxil to himself a few minutes later, when he had buried the bottle and parted from his fellow-conspirator. "Well, Lea is worth risking anything, even life itself for, and I'll do it; but when I once get hold of the secret I'll take care that that dirty little German doesn't have the chance to make much use of it."

While Taxil was indulging in this soliloquy Hartog, stealing furtively on his way back to bed, was communing with himself after very much the same style.

"Dat is a goot useful boy," he muttered under his breath as he slunk along. "And he vill be serviceable to me just for de present in vorking out vat de vorld vill soon call de tragic fate of Max Renault, de Anarchist. By tam, what a grim sort of joke dat vill be! I vill teach him to svindle me and lay plots for my life, to shoot me and sling me into de sea as if I vas von of dem Utopians instead of a goot Anarchist who got all de money for him and made his engines and air-ships.

"Ach Himmel, vat is dat for ingratitude! De man has no soul at all who could do dat to his friendt. But I vill show him who has de longest head in de long run. Ven he buys me for a fool he vill just lose his money. Dere is not going to be any king of de air but Franz Hartog, I can tell him. Dot vas a very nice little scheme vot he had to put me out of de vay so conveniently, but ve shall see, Monsieur Max, ve shall see!"

Despite the plots and counter-plots which were thus working underneath the surface of every-day life in the Anarchists' camp, so cunningly were all the parts played, that the company of the Revanche took their places as quietly, with just the same appearance of friendliness as ever; and as she rose into the air, shortly before daybreak, hats were waved and cheers followed her just as though, instead of a cargo of hate, and jealousy, and murderous designs, she carried the hearty goodwill of the whole Anarchist community.

A GREAT ACHIEVEMENT.

WHEN I went into the club the other night, I found Lightly turning over the pages of the Christmas number of The New World. His face would have afforded a fine study for a picture of contentment, and my first thought was that he must have an article or story in the magazine. For Lightly is something of a writer, and whenever he gets anything published—which is not very often—he bores us all for weeks afterwards telling how it happened.

As soon as he caught sight of me, he beckoned me to his table, and I thought that I was in for at least a half-hour's punishment. But it turned out for once that I was interested in his talk.

"Have you seen it?" he asked, tapping the cover of the magazine, and giving a little eager laugh as he spoke, which confirmed my impression that he must be in luck.

"No," I answered; "have you anything in it?"

"Anything?" he almost shouted—"why, man, I wrote the whole number."

At this I began to wonder if his brain—never too strong—had not suddenly given way. As you well know, The New World is one of the most conservative periodicals—as I will admit that I have found to my own sorrow in the past—and it was preposterous that it should make up a whole number, and a Christmas number at that, from the work of one man. And it was clear to my mind that Lightly would not have been that one man in any event.

While trying to think of something quieting to say, I took the magazine and glanced over the table of contents. It was one of Lightly's fancies—which did him no good in a literary way—to have a dozen or more pen names. He used these indiscriminately, as the humour moved him, and it happened that I knew most of them. So you may imagine my surprise when I tell you that every poem, story, article, and essay in the entire magazine was signed by some one of the many names that I knew he used.

The first was a Christmas poem, signed "G. O. Lightly." Then a Christmas story, signed "T. S. Weaver" (this, he had once explained to me, stood for The Story Weaver). Then an article on "Jerusalem, Nineteen Hundred Years Ago;" "Christmas Past and Present;" and the usual run of such material as editors have fallen into the habit of serving up for the holiday issue. None of the topics were new, nor, so far as I could discover in a hasty glance, were they treated with much brilliancy. The signatures were all composed upon the same puerile plan.

Poor as much of the stuff probably was, I still could not believe that Lightly had written it all, much less secured its publication in a single number of The New World. I turned to him for explanation.

"Draw up a chair," he said, with what I thought an air of some condescension. "I can afford to fly high to-night, so let us have a bird and a bottle quietly in this corner while I tell you all about it."

"Of course," he said, as soon as we were fairly settled, "this is all on the quiet. I should not tell even you if you were not one of my best friends, and if I did not mean presently to ask a great favour of you. You know," he continued, "how people have been talking about the science of hypnotism for months past?"

I nodded my assent, and he went on with an uninterrupted flow of words:

"Well," he said, "I chanced some time ago to be thrown in contact with an adept in this art, or science, or whatever you are minded to call it. I recognised at once the value that a knowledge of it might be to me in making fiction, and I asked the fellow to give me some insight into it. This he did, for a consideration, and to such good purpose that I was soon able to practise the science to some extent. I presently found that it was not difficult for me to gain a hypnotic influence over any man of less robust physique than myself; but I rarely attempted to use the power.

"When I finally did it was wholly without premeditation, and it happened in this way. A few weeks ago—in fact, just as they were making up the Christmas number—I strayed into the office of The New World, and while there offered Aldeson this poem." Lightly put his finger on the printed page as he spoke, but went on without pause:

"Aldeson put me off with some stock remark about being full of material, of having more than he could handle, and did not even look at the poem. This nettled me considerably, and it suddenly occurred to me that Aldeson was a smaller man than myself, and that I ought to give him a good thrashing for his impudence. Then it came to me all at once that I could hypnotise him and make him accept my poem. I asked him to send his assistant away, as I wanted to speak to him privately. When we were alone, I at once began the effort to make him subject to my will. In less time than I am telling you, I had him completely under my influence, and he had accepted the poem and promised it the initial place in the number.

"Then the thought came to me to try my power a little further. Calling a messenger, I sent to my rooms for a bundle of manuscript, and sorted out from it everything that would do for a Christmas number. You know," he added parenthetically, "that I always keep a stock of material on hand, ready for all needs and seasons. I took these Christmas things up; one by one, and brought them to his attention, and he accepted each one and made a place for it in this holiday number. Then he called his assistant in and gave instructions for making up the copy—and I took him away with me and gave him a royal good time for a week. When he got back to the office it was too late to make any changes, and so you see the number has come out, with nothing but my work. And a very good number it is, too," he concluded, complacently.

"But what do you expect to gain by it?" I asked; "the story will surely come out, and it will do you no good, but quite the reverse."

"You are all wrong," replied Lightly quietly; "the story will not come out. You can see that Aldeson must be the last man to tell it. And he could have no object in doing so, especially as the number has already made such a good impression."

With that he took from his pocket copies of half-a-dozen leading papers and reviews, and showed me comments that were not only favourable, but flattering in the extreme.

"Paid for?" said I, not a little disgusted with the whole business, and particularly at being made a confidant of.

"Yes," he laughed. "And now," he added, with a slight show of hesitancy, "for the other matter."

"Go ahead," I answered, not very graciously, considering that I was dining with him; "I might as well hear it all now."

"You asked me what I expected to gain by it. You know Lettie Underwood"—I started at the name, but nodded with what composure I could command. "That dear girl," said Lightly, "has promised to marry me as soon as I have won a place in literature; in fact, as soon as I have an established standing with any of the leading magazines. This settles that point." To emphasise his meaning, he tapped The New World triumphantly.

"But surely," said I, "you would not consider this fair? You would not be willing that she should know—— "

"All's fair in love, my boy. And I want you to be my best man."

I managed to get off with some half promise, and then, pleading an engagement, I got out of the club as quickly as possible and into a cab, and gave the driver the number of Lettie Underwood's house.

The dear girl—I could have choked Lightly for using the words; they were in my heart whenever I thought of her, which was all the time—was at home and received me with her usual welcome. But I held her at arm's length, and, with all the sternness that I could command, exclaimed:

"Letitia, you are a wretched trifler. Give me back my heart."

"What is the matter with the poor boy now?" she cooed softly.

"Matter enough. You have promised to marry Lightly."

"Yes," she laughed; "I remember. He proposed to me six months ago. I told him I would when he had made a success——"

"Your exact words," I said severely, were—"'when you have a standing with any of the leading magazines.'"

"Same thing," she answered airily; "he will never achieve either. It was my way of letting him down easily!"

"Letitia, listen to me," I said; "Lightly has written the entire Christmas number of The New World."

At this Letty looked at me reproachfully.

"Dick," she said, "where have you been dining?"

"No, it is not that," I protested; "I dined at the club, and Lightly told me himself, and he showed me the magazine and asked me to be his best man, and we only had one bottle between us."

"Well, this is a scrape!" she exclaimed ruefully; "I suppose I will have to keep my promise and marry him."

"And what about your promise to me?" I asked sarcastically.

"That was indefinite," she answered thoughtfully; "there was never any time set for that. So I shall have to marry him now; and if he should die, or anything happen, I could marry you afterwards."

"Thanks," I replied drily; "but that programme does not suit me. Now let me plan a little. You have been a wilful creature, never ready to name the day; but see the trouble you have got into. I suppose Lightly will be here early to-morrow to marry you. Now, I propose to marry you myself to-morrow at noon."

At this her eyes opened in wide protest.

"Yes," I continued, "I shall send a note to Lightly, telling him of your change, and asking him to be my best man."

"But, Dick, this is too sudden. What shall we live on?"

"Love, you practical girl," I cried, catching her in my arms; "besides, the publishers of The New World to-day offered me the editorship of the magazine, vice Aldeson, resigned. I suppose his resignation has some connection with this business of Lightly's. I am sorry for him, but I might as well have the place as another."

"And then you can print anything of your own that you want to, can't you, dear? I'm so glad you won't have to be rejected any more."

"Not even by you, sweetheart?"

"Not even by me—any more."

. . . . . .

Do you want the finis?

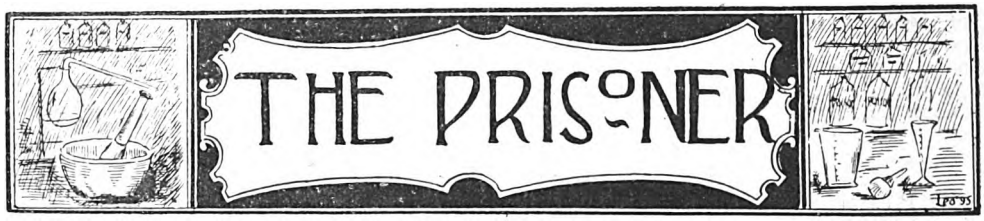
We were married on the morrow, and Lettie was as pretty a bride as ever was seen—as pretty as though she had been given months, instead of hours, for making ready. But on second thoughts, I am not sure that she had not been making ready all the time that I had been vainly asking her to name the day. I confess that I do not understand the sex.

There was but one thing to cloud our happiness. Lightly refused to be best man, or even to come to the wedding. And he has never offered any further contributions to The New World.

Perhaps this is because I am not like Aldeson, "of a less robust physique" than himself.



I HAD visited him on several occasions in my capacity of prison chaplain, and had endeavoured to entice him into conversation, but my efforts had not been attended by any success. This might perhaps have been due to a certain shrinking on my own part, for the man was awaiting his trial for murder, and the circumstances were particularly revolting.

He was a duly qualified medical practitioner whose name appeared on the register, and was, according to report, popular in the neighbourhood in which he resided. Yet he was charged with the deliberate and cold-blooded murder of his most intimate friend, and had achieved his end by the coward's resource—poison, administered, if suspicion proved correct, in the execution of his duty.

That a man whose mission was to heal, and in whom entire confidence was placed, should take advantage of his position, and, striking in the dark, destroy, appeared to me almost beyond credence. Yet the facts lay in a nutshell, and all London rang with them.

It was, therefore, not without doing violence to my feelings that I again sought the presence of the accused, and met the cold glance shot from beneath a pair of half-closed lids. He was a man of middle height, with a face from which the fresh colour had ebbed away, and keen, clear grey eyes—eyes that might have lent themselves willingly enough to the emphasising of some smart joke or epigram, but which now glittered strangely. As they rested upon me there lingered in their depths an expression of half-concealed disdain that caused my own to flash in involuntary self-defence.

"A parson, bound down by Thirty-nine Articles—a parson, set and sealed, but a man for all that," he said, smiling.

The smile, lighting up his face like sunshine, acted as a disguise; he looked another being. Or had he, perchance, thrown off a disfiguring mask to show himself in his true colours?

"Well," he continued, in a pleasant voice, "this is the fourth time you have come to inspect the caged animal. What is your opinion of me?"

Moved by a sudden impulse, I took the hand that lay so close to mine and grasped it. He returned the pressure warmly.

"You are no murderer," I said. "Of that I am certain."

The clasp of his fingers relaxed, and he allowed my hand to drop.

"Thanks," he said simply.

The monosyllable had a true ring, but his voice faltered. He rose, paced his cell, then, halting at my side, touched my shoulder.

"No, I am no murderer," he continued slowly, "but, for all that, I killed my friend; the best of friends; the noblest of men. Bah! What a fool I am!"

He brushed his hand across his eyes with an impatient gesture, and resumed his seat.

"If I am not trespassing on your time," he said courteously, "I should like to tell you how it happened."

"No, no," I interrupted hurriedly; "consider."

He laughed mockingly.

"You would bid me reserve my defence. Friend, I have none to make. Man is not my judge. Before my God I stand or fall. Listen."

I clasped my hands together, and, bending forward, fixed my eyes upon his face, losing neither glance nor word.

"The deceased and I were close friends," said he, "and had been so from boyhood, for we went to school together. What a bright little chap he was, to be sure. We boys used to call him 'Quicksilver'; and there never was such a fellow to run or leap, never. But what of that?"

He broke off suddenly, as if to recall his wandering spirit to the matter in hand, and continued with forced calmness.

"He was two years younger than I, and we were not at all of the same nature. He was of an intensely sensitive temperament in spite of all his cheerfulness—something of a poet folks said, though I don't know much of poets myself, so that I am but a poor judge. I chose to be a doctor, because I thought then, as I think now, that there is no finer profession on God's earth. Dick chose to be a doctor because he liked to be what I was. No better reason, upon my life! You see he was uncommonly fond of me."

Another pause, broken only by the buzzing of some flies and the quick sharp drawing of the speaker's breath. His face was flushed, his eyes soft and humid.

"Well, we were together as students, he and I. Where I went he went; my favourite study was his favourite study; my work his work, though in the dissecting room he would turn sick and faint, while I, for the love of science, conquered distaste. We are none of us born alike. Have you realised that, reverend sir?"

I nodded my head by way of answer to the sharp, cutting interrogation, and made a sign that he should continue.

"In spite of physical drawbacks, Dick got through his exams., and we two settled down as partners."

"I was not aware that the deceased was a medical man," I interrupted.

"Probably not. He did not long continue in the profession. That is the point I was just about to reach. It happened in this way. After we had been working together for about a year he was called upon to attend a serious case. A poor fellow in the next street was attacked by cancer. It was in his face. I will give you some of the details."

He did so in a dry, even professional manner, sparing no particular. Sickened by the account I laid my hand on his sleeve and bade him desist.

"No," he answered quietly, "it is necessary that you should hear this. It affects the dénoûment."

Yet his face was paler ere he had completed his narrative.

"Horrible!" I gasped. "Most horrible!"

"So my friend considered. He came home late one night, and as we two sat smoking together he looked into my eyes and said, 'Jack, I'm not fit to be a doctor.'

"'No, dear boy,' said I; 'I think not.' For he was as white as a sheet, and trembled like a woman. I talked to him a bit, and tried to make him look at things in a matter-of-fact way, but he could not.

"'I have known for so long that I am the wrong man in the wrong place,' said he; 'but this is the climax. You will have to get another partner, Jack.'

"He lit his candle thoughtfully, then blew it out again in an absent fashion.

"'Old man,' said he, 'I want you to make me a promise.'

"'Supposing,' he observed, in an odd, mechanical way, 'that this most frightful of all frightful diseases were to visit me, you must give me your word that you will put me out of my misery. You must promise that you will not stand by and see me die as that man is dying now.'

"The picture of the scene we two had witnessed a few hours since rose before me, and something of the horror that overcame him communicated itself to me.

"'Yes, I will promise,' I replied unhesitatingly; 'and you will do me the same good turn if——'

"'Hush!' he cried, lifting his troubled face. 'Swear!'

"So we swore; he still pale to the lips, I half-mocking, half-solemn. But I did not know. God help me, I did not know!"

The prisoner's head dropped upon his breast; the feverish light died out of his eyes; his lips worked convulsively. Gazing at him, I feared he would not find strength to finish his narrative, but suddenly, and by a strong effort, he gathered himself together, and went on speaking:

"That was five years ago; five years all told. Throughout that period our friendship deepened, and the ties that bound us together grew closer and closer. At last one day my friend sent for me. He had been looking out of sorts for some time past, and I had felt a little anxious about him, though, when we met, he had always appeared to be in excellent spirits. On this occasion, however, he made no attempt at cheerfulness, but told me his fears. Alas! they were only too true; the disease he had so dreaded was already far advanced. At first he hoped against hope, and I abetted him in his self-delusion, but the day came when even to his buoyant nature hope was no longer possible. It was when he lay in utter helplessness and direst agony that he reminded me of my promise.

"'When I exacted it from you,' he said, 'it was because I knew that this was a family complaint with us. And I can't stand it, that is all.'

"It was not all. Day by day he grew rapidly worse, and I was his sole medical attendant; day by day, racked by such pangs as you can scarcely conceive, he turned his piteous eyes on me, and bade me be true to my vow. I turned a deaf ear to his intreaties; I refused to listen. The words of the old commandment, 'Thou shalt do no murder,' stayed the hand of mercy—until one awful night when I sat beside him and could no longer bear to watch his torments. Then strength gave way, or came to me, I know not which, and—you know the rest."

I looked into his ashen face, my own pale as death.

"Now for your sermon, sir," he said abruptly. But I could not speak.

"Silent!" cried the prisoner; "and small blame to you. It is a hard enough riddle, but as for me I have no misgivings. The world and the world's opinion, your sapient judge and jury, what are they to me? I hear no voice save my friend's, with its feeble cry, 'God bless you, Jack.' I see no face save my friend's, no longer distorted by pain, but calm and peaceful, as that of a little child. For the rest what have I to fear? God alone shall be my judge."

The prisoner spoke truly. It was not given to him to stand arraigned before any human tribunal—that very night his troubled spirit passed away. They found him in the early morning lying dead, his hands crossed, and the faint rose hue of dawn colouring his marble face.

"YOU must know that at that time I was not as well off as I am now. Eliza and I were obliged to live in apartments.

"A Mrs. Marvin and her daughter occupied the first floor; I was to occupy the next floor, and a Mr. William Graham the back room on the top floor.

"It did not need a very sharp pair of eyes to discover that Mr. Will Graham was in love with Miss Emily Marvin. Eliza and I both understood it before many days.

"One day when I came home a little earlier than usual, Eliza said to me, 'Ted, I think there is something very mysterious about Miss Emily. I was going past their room to-day, and I happened to look in, and there sat Miss Emily at her writing desk. The tears were streaming down her cheeks, and her pen was going like wild-fire. She was talking to herself. When I got upstairs I lay down for a nap. Presently I heard a queer noise. First I couldn't think what it was, but it seemed to come from the gaspipe. I listened again, and then I made up my mind that somebody was playing on the bracket below as if it were a piano. I've always said her actions were very strange, and Mrs. Smith says so too. I tell you, Edward, that that beautiful young girl is crazy—stark, staring crazy!'

"As a matter of course I paid no further attention to what I felt certain was Eliza's nonsense about Miss Emily's mind being out of order. But one evening I went hurriedly up to my room. The moment I got into our room I heard a most peculiar noise. It sounded like 'Tick, tick, tick—tick, tick, tick,' and it came from the gaspipe.

"Now, I must tell you that among my earlier experiences in this life I was once a telegraph operator. I knew all the dots and dashes, just the horrid tick, and succession of ticks, and spaces between the ticks that are equivalent to the letters of the alphabet. And here I heard them again. I saw through the whole business at once, and as I did so I just lay down on the bed and laughed until I was afraid I'd have every button off my waistcoat.

"Someone had told me once that Will Graham was a telegraph operator. He had evidently taught Miss Emily the art, and here they were communicating with each other in the most satisfactory fashion, while everybody imagined that they were conducting themselves like perfect strangers. Then I waited patiently to hear what was being said. The conversation I had happened upon ran as follows:

"'How are you this evening?' 'Awfully tired. And you?' 'Tired too. Mamma has been particularly exasperating.' 'Has she? Am I never to have a talk with you again?' 'I don't know. Keep up your spirits.' 'I will, but it's dreadfully trying.' 'I think somebody's coming.' 'Oh, dear!'

"I heard a door open and shut, and I knew that somebody entered the room below.

"Well, matters were going along in this fashion when one day I began to think that the lovers were giving a new turn to their conversations. One day I heard Emily say to Will:

"'There's no use, I've got to do it.' 'What?' 'Kill her.' 'All right.' 'But I hate to; and I can't think how.' 'Shoot her.' 'Nonsense.'

"At this point Eliza came into the room, and she made such a noise that I couldn't hear anything more. But not long afterwards there were more serious communications:

"'Dear, dear Will?' 'What is it?' 'I won't love you if you won't help me.' 'I will help you—with all my might.' 'Then tell me what is a good way to kill an old woman.' 'Arsenic.' 'That won't do at all.' 'Blow her up with gunpowder.' 'Nonsense! You can't help me one bit.' 'I'll die for you.' 'I don't want you to die. I want her to die, and I don't know how to kill her.' 'Well, kill her somehow, or she'll be the death of both of us.'

"How could these two innocent-looking young people be depraved enough to plot the murder of a fellow-being in such a heartless manner? And who could the fellow-being be? Who but the poor old lady to whom Miss Emily owed her being?

"Well, at last matters came to a crisis. It was one summer's night. As I lay in bed I heard a noise.

"I listened intently. Whether it was a presentiment or not, I don't know, but I felt sure at once that something dreadful was coming. It did.

"'I've made up my mind, Will,' from below.

"'Well, to do what?'

"'Just as you said. Shooting's the best. She'll die instantly, you know, and I won't have any morbid farewells to go through. I don't feel up to such a thing—have never had any practice in just that line.'

"'Horrible!' I thought. 'People don't generally get any practice at murdering their mothers.'

"'I'm going to do it now, too. I've dallied over it a dreadful while, and I'm going to have it over by midnight. Then I'll breathe more freely. There'll be nothing left but the marriage, and after that I can rest.'

"'All right; go at it.' This from above. 'Do it up brown. I'll help you spend the money.'

"I could stand it no longer. 'Eliza!' I shrieked, 'there's murder going on in this house. Get up!'

"I simply flew up. In two seconds I had on a pair of trousers and a coat. Eliza tried to hold me, but I flung her off. I expected the sound of a pistol shot before I could get downstairs.

"I went down three steps at a time. On my way I met a party of people coming from the front room, where they had been playing whist.

"'Mr. Jones!' shrieked our landlady, seeing my excited face.

"'Madam,' I cried, 'there is murder going on in your house. Come at once—come! To the rescue, I command you!'

"With the whole house following, I rushed to the door of Miss Marvin's room. I flung my whole strength against the wood. A series of shrieks came from within.

"'It's locked! It's locked! It's locked!' I cried.

"By this time I had succeeded in convincing somebody that some foul deed was under way, for the servants came rushing up. One had the fire-tongs, the other had seized a decanter, which she evidently meant to use as a bludgeon.

"Bent on saving that poor old lady from a dreadful death at her daughter's hands, I threw my whole strength against that door. There was a straining of the wood, a bursting of the latch, the door gave way, and there we stood in the midst of the room. I gave one spring towards the murderess, and pinioned her in my arms.

"What happened next? Why, that miserable wretch, Will Graham, actually threatened to have me arrested for assaulting his promised wife. Think of it—when I knew I was stopping a terrible crime.

"The murder wasn't anything. Miss Emily was one of your precious literary people—writing a story with a murder in it. She and Will Graham had been engaged for three years. He usually helped her out with her plots. Just now there was a family row because Will wouldn't take the old lady's money to go into business with. Will said he would not risk impoverishing her. The old lady got provoked She was tired of seeing Will nothing but a telegraph clerk, so she said they shouldn't speak to each other until he came to his senses and went into something for himself."

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 322.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 2, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

CONSECRATED TO LOVE

THAT quaint little edifice half hidden in the over-hanging elms? It is a chapel, monsieur. Ah, it is indeed a strange place for a house of worship; but no one has knelt there these many, many years, and, in fact, only one person ever worshipped within the gloomy pile, and that one, stranger still, but once.

Yet, my friend, that person had most excellent reasons for building that little temple upon that very spot, of the sombre grey brick of the valley-kilns, even from the little that I know. Some there are who build chapels, actuated by a spirit of religious sentiment; some to expiate a crime; some to satisfy a species of egotism, perhaps; but never was temple consecrated in the manner of this one—no, not in all the chronicles of ages. It perpetuates the thrilling history of a most strange and tragic love.

I was a lad of sixteen when I entered the service of General Count de Barde, of the Third Battalion, on his vast estates which, in 1809, included almost the whole of the north valley of the Seine from the suburbs of Paris to the pretty Gothic village of Meaux yonder.

My father was a Corsican and a patriot, a worshipper of his countryman, the great Bonaparte, who had rendered the General life-long aid in his accumulation of power; and when, in 1807, he was killed by the falling of a tree, after having saved the General's life only to lose his own, it was understood that I was to be trained to assume control of at least a part of this perfect provincial system, and to manage exclusively the mammoth brick kiln which stood in the identical spot where now stands the consecrated chapel yonder, surrounded by the same hand-clasped and patriarchal trees.

Over the tree-tops beyond, monsieur, you notice the grand old ruin on the summit of the hill. It was the château of the General, and a marvel of beauty it was in those days to the thousands who came even from Paris to admire it, and to partake of sumptuous hospitality which ever resembled a sort of all-year fête. Ah, what stirring times were those, my friend! From that grand old ruin down to this solitary little chapel in the valley an invisible chain of history hangs, every link of which incloses a human passion, a deep and varied experience.

What an imposing figure to all this pageant of reminiscence. The Emperor admired, and the valley folk adored him. Perhaps it was the sterling integrity of his nature, and the deep sense of justice that actuated his deeds, and gave nobility to his patriotism.

Long and multiplying prosperity, too, gave the General courage, his great good heart instinct with the chivalry of a true soldier. Of his vast army of valley-folk workers, either in his vineyards, pottery works, or about the great brick kilns, not one but enjoyed his personal interest.

The firing of these kilns was a tri-yearly event of moment, and in this open clearing about the kilns the General would have his twenty long tables brought down from the château, loading them with viands, and every man, woman, or child that had the least hand in his enterprises was bidden to the feast. A cask of choice vintage was offered up in pleasant sacrifice, and at the July fête an ox was roasted whole. What a vivid memory of the valley monarch, we who knew him, retained!

I can see him yonder now—that tall, dark, human thunder-bolt, with heart as tender as a child's, with a voice that made women quaver, and children cry with fear, yet capable of softest modulation—stalking down the narrow aisles between the broad, laden and garlanded tables, lighted by a hundred torches, scanning the faces that not one of his great family be missing, not an impostor thrust into their midst.

It was in the late spring of 1808 that the General, returning from his annual visit to the home of his childhood, in the Hautes Pyrénées, brought back with him his young wife, some twenty years his junior, to rule with him the fortunes of "Halloc," the château yonder.

The valley went wild with joy, and for many days there was open feasting in the great halls of the mansion, and scenes of festivity followed, rivalling the splendours of the court of Hadrian. Paris was drunken with the success of her idol, over whom the Fates seemed to hover, showering bounty upon bounty and victory upon victory upon him

Like a child did she follow her mountain lord.

The General's young wife was like a wild gazelle brought from the forests to be the ruling spirit of this palace of luxury. She was the most perfect example of what the pure southern soils and clear mountain atmosphere, as well as the surroundings of tradition and romance, produce after generations of development.

She was not beautiful; she was more. One forgot mere beauty in the strange spell which her mere presence inspired in the northern heart; small of figure, yet so straight and commanding, that she gave the illusion of stature, with a cheek that shone with a mellow light like ripe fruit of the tropics, shoulders of classic modelling in the Oriental luxuriousness of the Empire gown, with a seeming transparency in their dimpled roundness, she bore the elegance of high birth and breeding, yet that eloquent simplicity of the peasant to whom tradition is more than history, poetry and song more than philosophy and fact.

The General adored her—as did all those who knew her. But, victim ever of that indomitable conceit which had hitherto conquered all, he had led himself into the belief that she in turn loved him, which, my friend, I deplore as a deep and deadly blunder into which snare no younger doting lover could have fallen. What sweet but fatal illusions will not possess the minds of men of five-and-fifty when they themselves are the captives of an all-encompassing passion?

It did not require the wisdom of prophets to perceive that though present in the flesh the soul was absent upon hourly long journeys back to the Franco-Spanish province, lighted by southern stars and swept by the soft perfumed winds of the semi-tropic land of rich dreams and rapturous love. As she sat before the spinet it would not take a spirit of magic to divine that those dreamful eyes looked quite over the head of the great General and found repose in the embrace of a wild dark spirit of some Spanish hero, the complement of her inner life.

But soon came matters of national moment requiring the General's presence in the ranks. Until the departure of the great valley-monarch we were inclined to treat the glories of Napoleon as affairs of an abstract nature which lay far beyond our orbit, as it were. But when the big soldier mounted his bay gelding, and, attended by his saluting aides, passed down the valley of the Seine towards Paris, followed by shouting hundreds on foot and on horse, the national strife was brought to our own doorsteps.

I remember well the parting between the General and his young wife on that memorable May evening, after they had watched the twilight fading from the terrace, promenading up and down in deepest consultation.

Ah, she was beautiful then in the flush of fear and the wonder of parting! A soft Persian shawl fell back from her white shoulders, and her head was crowned with a sort of classic garland—simplicity regaining favour again after the barbarian prodigality of the Creole queen had exhausted all human caprices.

And like a child did she follow her mounted lord down the hillside, clinging to the sword presented to him by the Emperor, and endeavouring loyally to cheer her chief; and between yonder crumbling monoliths, which were then the side-posts of an imperial gateway, the big soldier bent down and kissed her twice upon the forehead, whereupon in speechless eloquence of emotion the little sibyl turned and fled back to the terrace again.

With the General's going it seemed that a glory had passed from the earth leaving a sense of oppression and bondage behind. Driven into the fortress of the sensitive southern temperament, the beautiful mistress of the château upon the hill became a creature of sensations once more, living in the past and the dream-life of the present, which was all but perfect, all but happiness.

For days a melancholy possessed her, and her irritable temper brought us all into humble subjection; but the savage came to the surface, and solitude, that, following so closely upon these unremittent festivities, was once burdensome and ennuyeuse, now became a joy, and she felt the liberty of the solitary mountain bird, a creature of the upper air.

It was three months to a day that, as I was arranging the final preliminaries for lighting the great kiln—which momentous event was to follow the night after with the usual fête, a young man entered the open space yonder, like a wayfarer who had lost his way.

Alone, and not a little genial with the thought of the morrow, I hailed him. He said that he had come a long distance, and was making his way to the north, where he hoped to embark for America in search of new fortunes.

A forlorn blue coat was buttoned up closely to the bronze neck, and his trousers were tied about him with thongs, while his slime-oozing boots left a footprint like that of a panther upon the polished clay floor of the clearing before the kiln. But there was somewhat in the face that inspired interest, almost awe.

"You are from the south," said I, noting the clean-cut, mobile features, like a cameo of a troubadour cut in South Sea shell, and the peculiar accent which denotes the contiguous provinces to Spain.

"You are clever," said he, dropping his eyes; then recovering, "is yonder the château of Madame la Comtesse de Barde?"

"Yes. I am her aide during the absence of the General."

"Indeed!" The word was spoken almost with agitation. "You will take a message to her from me?" He was drawing forth a twisted handkerchief, which spilled out one or two pieces of gold as he untied it with trembling fingers.

"You insult me, monsieur," I said. "If Madame la Comtesse knows you I will take a message without hire, for I see that you are in need."

The stranger nodded as if the need were indeed more than matters of hunger and thirst; then wrote a few lines, intrusting them to me. "I will wait here till you return," he said.

As I reached the grand terrace Madame la Comtesse was just alighting from her black charger, and was rifling her pocket for a bon-bon to reward her faithful animal after her evening jaunt down the valley.

The reading of that simple message.

Digitized by Google

With the reading of that simple message—once, twice, thrice—and with a tumult of misgivings in her heart, the beautiful woman turned upon me, venturing a question which only broke into a faint choking cry.

For a moment the fluttering heart seemed solving a great problem; and turning her eyes in the direction of the sun that left great trains of gorgeous cloud right over the most favoured capital of the civilised world, as if to gather light into the darkness of a doubting, hesitating soul, a sort of prayer escaped the quivering lips; and then without a spoken word she remounted the black horse, and spurred him down the arch of overhanging lindens, in the direction of the kilns.

I stood still a moment in amazement, a feeling of guilt entered my heart, though my crime had been but the prompting of a pure thought. At last I perceived the hidden significance of that silent living drama acted with such tragic earnestness by one who was her sole audience all these weeks.

Suddenly a light touch at my side, and I looked up. The groom was standing with eyes fixed upon the distance, his hand pointing down the valley road beside the gleaming Seine, which threaded the dark green vale like a ribbon of silver through an altar-cloth. Three mounted figures were approaching, the sight of the forward one starting the blood to my temples. It was he General.

Instantly I turned, and fled down the narrow defile which was a short path to the kilns, so familiar to me. It seemed that some calamity impended, though I could not guess more than to realise the General's disappointment, on his sudden coming, at not finding the Countess to greet him.

As I neared the kilns I slackened my pace from mere exhaustion. I had crept close to the kiln-clearing on the opposite side from the road entrance, when the noise of the ponderous trappings, and the tread of the heavy charger coming down the hill, drove me to quick action. But the shadows deepened, and my way became more difficult; and as I stealthily approached the clearing I saw that I was too late.

Pausing an instant, there, I heard a whisper in the stillness, and, strange to say, the iron door of the great kiln close and latch, followed by the shuffle of feet, as of some one dancing on one foot with hasty mounting. Then I crept even to the edge just as the silhouette of the tall soldier appeared in the open space, and there met the wife seated imperiously, like an apparition in grey, against the sombre shadows.

With a faint cry of forced surprise, the little woman reined up, and greeted her lord; but with a kiss and a wave of the hand he sped past her, silencing her with a gleaming look. Then the warrior stopped, dismounted, drew his sword, and advanced towards the great kiln-door.

"Stop!" The cry was like the scream of a wounded animal.

The General turned: "You have someone locked in there," he said.

"How dare you?" A cut of the whip and the black charger dashed up broadside to the great door. The tall warrior stood still, folding his arms. There was a smile upon his lips as he said: "Dare you look me in the eyes and tell me that you did not just now conceal someone in there from me?"

"I dare!"

"Then——you lie! I will prove that you lie——"

"One moment!" The soldier halted.

"What are you going to do?"

"To prove that you have lied, and then kill the proof!" The utterance was calm—tragically calm.

"One moment!" and the little woman waved a glistening weapon into the air. Then, holding the weapon above her, she said calmly, "If you open that door and find no one there, before God, I shall plunge this into my heart—choose, Monsieur!"

Whether held by the fascination of those low-spoken words, or stopped by the realisation that be there a lover within or no lover, the fate of his happiness were the same, I can only wonder. But, acknowledging his defeat, the General drew his helmet and advanced to his conqueror. "My love," he said, "my life is yours. As I love you, so do I believe in you. Lay your hand upon this sword and swear that you are faithful to me!" The slender hand shot out, grasping the sword-hilt, while he clasped his palms around it. "Before God,

"You have someone locked in there."

I am true!" the voice betrayed no tremour of fear.

Then the great soldier reached forward, clasping his loved one to him with a thousand prayers for forgiveness, and a thousand pledges of confidence. "How could I have been so mad as to doubt you—you who are the light, the joy, the heaven of a soldier's life, for whom I hope, fight, and pray God to endure?"

But, alas, my friend, the sword went not back into the sheath as the dagger had done, nor in his ravings did once those restless eyes leave that iron door. "Ho! ho! my lads," he bellowed with wild laughter. "Mecklin! Burse! de Freynet! The firing was for to-morrow night; no—it shall be to-night in my honour. Halloo!"

Halloo! Halloo! rolled the echo down the valley, and at sound of that familiar call, like the trump of doom, came the tramp of feet from all directions, and a dozen astonished faces burst into the now moonlit space. "It is I—the General! go; call the men—their wives—their children. We shall have the crown fête of the year in honour of Napoleon and his braves! Quick—you, D'Acre! Go to the château, and tell them to bring the wine, the supper, the tables, the torches! Go! And you to the valley-folk, Martin! and let not one disappoint me, for I have but till daybreak when I am off for the Alps!"

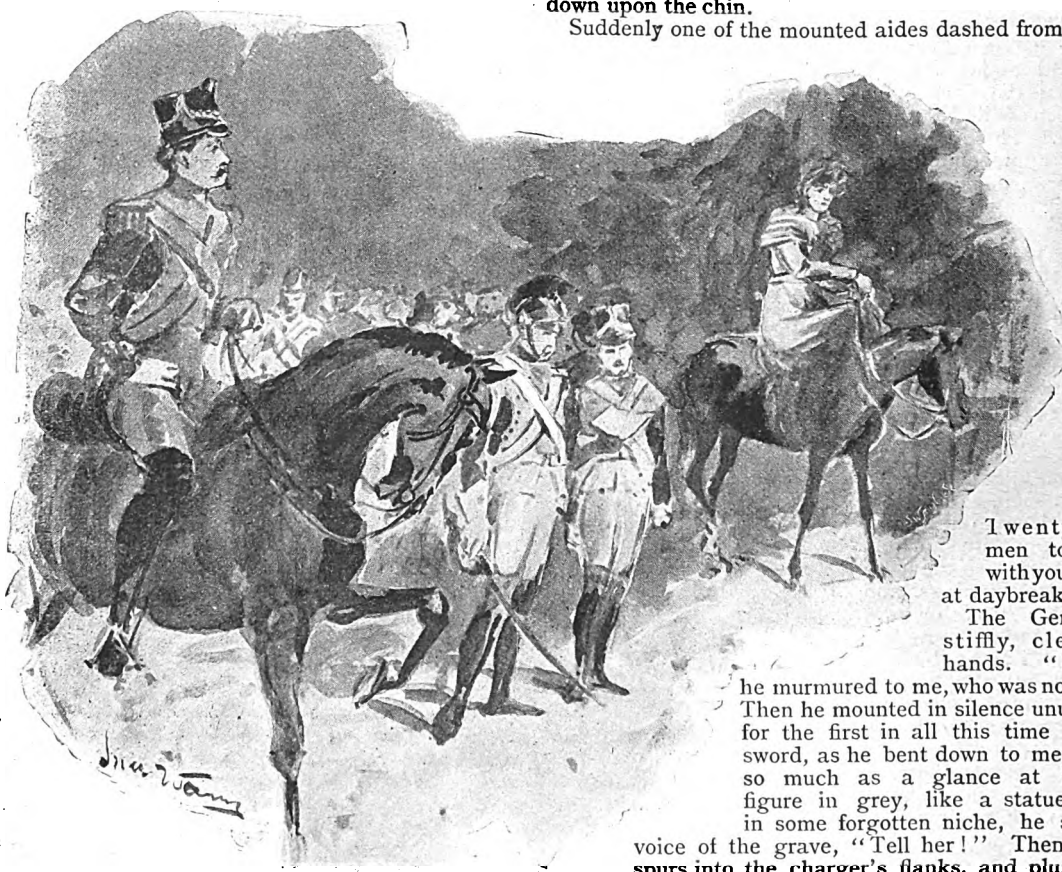
Then, leaping like a school-boy up to the silent figure upon the coal-black charger, "Mon Dieu! This is the happiest day of my life, my love! What a fool—a criminal, was I to suspect her whom I so love! But I repent—ah, I will prove to you how loyally I repent. Napoleon has taken Ratisbon, Vienna is bombarded, Rome is seized, the Archduke Charles a prisoner at Essling, Beauharnais and Marmont on the way to join the victor, themselves triumphant, to share the spoils of war, and we follow.

"You shall see how I prove my repentance, my love, you shall be the wife of one of the crowned pillars of the Empire. But first let us make merry. Halloo! Work, sluggards, work! I must be off at daybreak!"

It seemed less than a minute before the valley was alive with people. The rumble of laden waggons, the shouts of the heralds, the roll-beat of drums, seemed to madden the great commander, and his heavy raillery became unintelligible. Now it was a command to his regiment; now a wild camp-song; now an insane jargon trembling with pathos, but that sword—ah, monsieur, never once went it back for an instant at his side, nor those eyes for an instant wandering from that great kiln-door.



Only once did he forget himself, and in that sudden interval a hand darted forward from the watchful woman's bosom, and into the little peep-hole of the kiln the sheathed dagger sped, and then like one who leaves a place of martyrdom she spurred to the edge of the clearing, turned about and waited.

For the next half-hour poured in from every direction whole families, crowds of shouting boys and girls, bands of music, and the General leaped about like a clumsy bear drunken on grapes.

For an hour it seemed, though it was not so long, the tumult of the fête ran riot; the children had made wreaths of oak and beech, and taking advantage of the monarch's unbending, had climbed to his shoulders, crowning him with garlands of green. Then suddenly, in the midst of these shoutings and commands, these songs drowned in a roar of merriment, the shrill pipe of peasant flutes and the roar of drums, the crowned symposiarch ordered oil to be poured into the fuel of the kiln, and snatching a firebrand, he advanced.

A wild shout went up, and every one stood on tiptoe. Without even a glance at the marble statue upon her living pedestal of sleek black, with his sword in his right and the torch in his left hand lighting up his face with a halo of demonry, he thrust the brand into the fuel and drew back with his hands raised to heaven.

A white tongue of flame shot into the air, lighting the furrowed faces of the peasant toilers with a ghastly pallor, throwing into hard relief against the shadows that mounted apparition at the clearing's edge, poised like a lioness at bay, from whose bitten lips two little drops of blood had trickled down upon the chin.

Suddenly one of the mounted aides dashed from the thicket, his horse rearing, blinded, with the sudden light. With a salute, he thrust a message into his chief's hand. "The rumour was not sustained," he said. "Napoleon was routed at Aspern, and is driven to the Isle of Loban. Twenty thousand men to the front, with you in command, at daybreak!"

The General turned stiffly, clenching his hands. "My horse!" he murmured to me, who was now at his side. Then he mounted in silence unutterable, and for the first in all this time sheathed his sword, as he bent down to me, and without so much as a glance at the imperial figure in grey, like a statue of a saint in some forgotten niche, he spoke in the voice of the grave, "Tell her!" Then he dug the spurs into the charger's flanks, and plunged into the darkness.

I turned to her. That head, so long up-poised like the heroic martyr, had fallen slightly forward, and the hands were lifting heavenward; then, ere I could reach her side, the white figure toppled headlong to the ground with a strange sound. Twenty-one days from that eventful night, my friend, General Comte de Barde, lay upon the field of Wagram, with a bullet in his heart!

It was quite a month after the fall of my hero that I saw his widow again, and then it was here in this very spot. As she dismounted from the same faithful gelding, I noticed that her raven hair was streaked with grey; but there was that same calm, impenetrable glance, that firm mouth, and the chin of a tigress, with eyes so eloquent of that nameless power which we know not whether to ascribe to angels or demons. An architect was at her side, obsequious in his deference. "You will build it of these bricks," she said calmly, "neither adding nor taking away a single one; and, moreover, build it upon the identical spot where the kiln now stands."

And so, day after day, she watched the building of this chapel dedicated to a poet's God, and, with the help of a priest from a distant city, as if she feared any nearer, knelt within and blessed it. A lamp was hung over the altar, and for thirty years it has been replenished by the church, for when the troublous times came for the little Corsican, monsieur, my lady gave her all to the faith, entered a convent, where she died a year after Waterloo, and was brought here for rest.

Ah, a strange history, monsieur. But a stranger fact has yet to be told; for in 1818, having saved from the wreck enough for my little tavern, where you tasted my red wine and cheese to-day, a dapper little stranger saluted me in my arbour. There was a frivolous smirk upon his countenance, and he was dressed in the fashion of the foreign parvenue whom we plain men hate.

"You do not know me," he said. I nearly reeled from my chair, "It is you? Mon Dieu! We have a chapel dedicated to you down the valley here." The conceited creature laughed in a vain, empty chuckle, and said, "Bring me some of your best wine, and then tell me about it!" After recovering from the shock, I told him. "But you, monsieur," I cried, "how did you escape?"

He drank deeply, then said: "When she threw me that dagger I realised that hope was gone; and to save her I must play the martyr. I looked up through the chimney of that hell and saw two stars. They gave me courage. I was younger then. We Pyrénése climb mountains where every unfeathered beast fails. It was a choice between a dagger for me or dishonour for her, with this slight hope.

"V'la! though nearer dead than alive, I watched my funeral-pyre from yonder hill-top, then fled to the coast, and thence to America. Drink again, monsieur. Ah, what fools we are when we are young! What risks we run to be sentimental."

And this, my friend, from the man who had blotted out two noble lives, and had brought our little kingdom here to the dust! Well, I suppose that is what the little Corsican would call "making history," but it seems to me sad travail for the living historians. Is it not true?

Go and look, monsieur. You will find the altar lamp still burning. The slab which marks her sleep you will know by the rude image of an arrowed heart upon it. She carved it there with her own hand.

In the summer of 1869 I had occasion to visit a well-known asylum for the insane. The institution is, I believe, reckoned among the best of its kind in this country. The distinguishing feature in this system of treatment is that of according to patients all reasonable freedom—a system, I am informed, which has been followed with the most encouraging results. So far as practicable, the inmates of the asylum are treated like sane men and women; instead of being constantly reminded of their infirmity, they are led to forget it, if the power to forget it remains.

On the day of my visit I had purchased a case of medicines for one of the assistant physicians, who was an intimate friend. This I had done at his request, and it was to deliver these medicines that I made the journey to the asylum.

Ascending the massive stone steps, I was conducted by one of the attendants into the reception-room. Here I was left to wait until my presence could be announced to my friend, Dr. Balcom. It so happened that I was the only occupant of the room, and to engage my mind while I waited, I picked up a copy of De Quincey's "Confessions" and began to read. While thus occupied a voice accosted me, saying, "Did you wish to see anyone, sir?"

Looking up, I saw the speaker was a small, neatly dressed man, who had entered unobserved, and who had evidently addressed me in order to make his presence known.

"I was waiting," I replied, "to see Dr. Balcom."

"The doctor is engaged just at present on a very important case. Would you like to make a tour of the building?"

I answered that I should be pleased to do so, and thereupon my friend conducted me out into the hall. I discovered that he was one of the attendants in the asylum; and he also informed me that he studied insanity for a number of years, with a view to fitting himself for a physician.

Under so excellent a guide I was conducted through the building, and shown the numerous points of interest. Those patients whose cases possessed particular interest were also pointed out to me, and their idiosyncrasies fully explained.

"The man whom we just passed," said my companion, referring to a large, fresh-faced, mild-eyed patient, "is one of the most dangerous patients we ever had."

"Indeed!" I replied; "one would not think so from looking at him."

"No; but the appearance of all insane people is deceptive. There was a woman here some time ago—a pale, sweet-faced, delicate creature—whom we all thought a saint, and who acted as one until she succeeded in getting hold of a carving knife, and then she cut the throats of two of her fellow patients."

"Is there not danger," I asked, "in granting so much liberty to the inmates?"

"Well, it is our peculiar system. We find in some instances, of course, that the freedom is abused, but in the majority of cases it works well."

This and much more conversation took place between the attendant and myself as we passed through the halls.

"I observe," he said, "that you carry a medicine chest, and I infer that you are a physician."

"No," I rejoined; "although I have the equipments of a doctor, I should make but sorry work at using them. They belong to Dr. Balcom, and I called to deliver them." Then, looking at my watch, I added, "I fear that I am keeping the doctor waiting by my long absence."

"I think he is not yet disengaged," returned my companion; "we shall have time to go out on the roof of the building, from which the views are really magnificent."

Accordingly my guide led the way up the spiral staircase, which connected the topmost storey with the roof, I following at his heels. As we emerged through the broad skylight the scene which presented itself to the eye was really magnificent. To the right lay the river, winding like a silver thread through the pleasant valley; in front could be seen the distant spires of the neighbouring town glistening like the sunlight; and afar off rose the hills, their summits lost in the blue of the heavens. The carefully kept grounds of the asylum beneath us looked like a map, gorgeous with its many hues of flowers.

"This certainly is a splendid view," I said.

"It is still better from the opposite side of the building," returned my guide. "Let us go over there."

Accordingly we walked along the flat roof, the attendant taking the precaution to close the skylight behind us, lest any of the patients should be tempted to follow us. The asylum is some two hundred and fifty feet in length, and as we emerged from the westerly end of the roof we had this considerable distance to walk.

Suddenly, when we had reached a point midway in the building, my companion stopped and turning upon me abruptly, said: "Have you a large brain?"

I looked at him a little wonderingly, and then laughed as I replied: "Well, if I have, the world has not discovered it."

"Don't jest, sir," he said petulantly, and with a seriousness that flashed an unpleasant suspicion across my mind. "I wish to know, distinctly, whether or not you have a large brain?"

He was looking me full in the face, with a peculiar expression in his dark eyes which I had not before observed. There was not the slightest betrayal of levity in his manner. He was terribly in earnest. His thin white fingers worked convulsively, and there was a twitching about the muscles of the mouth, such as I have seen in persons suffering intense pain. The horrible truth flashed upon me as I returned his steadfast gaze. This man was a maniac.

I am possessed, I fancy, of an average amount of courage, but at that moment I felt it oozing out of the very pores of my skin. I know I turned deathly pale, and for a moment was utterly unable to think. Then I grew calmer. Doubtless this man had brought me on the roof of the building with the idea of pushing me off. As I have already said, he was a small man. Physically, I was his superior. But I was without weapon of defence. Suppose that he was armed!

"My good sir," I said, endeavouring to speak in a natural tone, "I can assure you that my brain is not a large one, and as my time is limited I think we had better go down now."

I made a movement as if to retrace my steps to the skylight. Quick as thought the madman sprang in front of me, and, with his eyes glaring wildly, albeit he spoke in a low, unexcited voice, he said:

"I think your brain is large enough for my purpose, sir. You must understand that I have a great mission in this world to fulfil—a mission which I have not as yet begun. The strain upon my own mental faculties will be too great. I therefore intend to take your brain and insert it in my own head."

Here he drew from the breast pocket of his coat a large-sized clasp dagger, which he opened, and began to run the blade up and down the palm of his hand.

"I have given years of thought to this subject," he continued, "and I am convinced that I shall succeed. With a double brain power I shall be enabled to accomplish a double amount of brain work. I have been waiting a long time for a subject, but not until I saw you did I find one suited to my purpose. You are the man—the brain for which I have been watching."

"I fear, sir," I said, "that you are sadly mistaken. Your idea is a grand one—an original one. But I am not fit to aid you in carrying it out. You should select a strong, active healthy brain. Mine, on the contrary, is weak and diseased. Why, sir, up to the age of fourteen I was considered an idiot. Since then my friends do not permit me to have control of my own affairs. I am actually little better than a lunatic. I can neither read nor write, I——"

"Nevertheless," he interrupted, "you will answer my purpose, and I am about to take out your brain with this dagger, and insert it in my own head. I have brought you out on the roof that we may be free from interruptions. You will oblige me by now lying down."

If my mind had been stunned by the first discovery of the man's madness it was active enough now. A thousand schemes rushed through my mind; I took in the situation fully. I was alone with a madman armed with an ugly weapon, and he bent upon my destruction. To cry out would be useless; nobody could hear me. The chances of any aid from those within the asylum were small indeed. I could not run away. If I attempted to gain the skylight I should certainly be killed. The medicine case in my hand suggested the thought which saved my life.

"If you are determined to make use of such an unworthy subject as I," I said, "well and good: I shall offer no further resistance. But I ask that you will grant me five minutes while I address a brief farewell to all my friends. I will give it to you to deliver to them,"

"Very well," he replied, "if you know how to write, proceed. I will not wait five minutes."

He took up his position a foot from me, watching every movement I made with a horrible eagerness. I knelt down with my back towards him, took from the medicine case a bottle of chloroform (which I knew it contained), and saturated my handkerchief with the liquid. This I succeeded in doing without his knowledge. Then, rising to my feet, I scribbled some unintelligible words upon the back of an envelope, and said:

"You will do me the honour of reading what I have written here."

He came towards me, and while I held the envelope in my hand, stood by my side and looked at the writing. I had the handkerchief in my right hand and the envelope in the left. As he bent forward to decipher the words, I suddenly clutched his hand which held the dagger, and at the same instant clapped the handkerchief over his mouth and face. He struggled fiercely for a moment or two, and then the fumes of the drug began to tell upon him. His efforts to release himself grew weaker, and he finally fell to the floor insensible.

With all haste I made my way to the skylight, down the spiral staircase, and into the hall below. There I recounted what had happened, and two of the assistants were sent to bring down the murderous maniac. He recovered from the effects of the chloroform, and when last I heard of him he was still looking for a subject to furnish him with an extra brain.

A DIAMOND TIARA

SHE stood before a water-colour of Ranger's, and wished with all her heart she were far up in the deep quiet of the shade by the river; then she turned her queenly face to her aunt. She held her head high in such proud fashion, did this rare beauty, Madeline.

"If I seem impatient with you," said the elder lady, half pettishly, "it is because you are never impressed. You were always a puzzle to me. Last night at dinner you were more splendid than any beauty there, and that diamond tiara burned like fire in your hair, but you remained the same passive girl you always are. I often wonder, dear, whether anything ever could stir you!

"Don't think for a moment I am so entirely devoid of my senses as to fancy you are going to marry that antiquated millionaire for love. But I often wonder if you could have cared for any man as women sometimes do to the end of their lives. I am going to tell you about one——. That bell means that the carriage is ready."

"Oh, there they are now, just as I speak of them, riding by in that glistening equipage! How darkly he smiles upon me, and he's staring almost rudely at you! He was ill yesterday at the dinner, became faint at the drawing-room door. Wrap the furs well about you, my dear, these December days are nowhere so chill as here in this bleak country.

"Yes, that sad-eyed young girl by his side is his wife. We shall meet them again on the Boulevard up at the fountain, for there is a circular curve there, and everybody drives round it and comes back. You could hardly have seen her, they passed so quickly, and yesterday she was obliged to leave us without having met you, on account of her husband, you know.

"She came from Ireland, dear, damp Ireland, and brought with her a heart full of freshness and hope; and her face, oh, one rarely meets such a face in the wise, thoughtful girls of to-day!

"It was in London he met her, at her first ball, and he led her through the dance and made love to her, and all the time his thoughts were given to another woman—yes, Madeline, so faithless are the hearts of men.

"Then, later on, he offered her his heart—his traitor heart—marred by a longing for that other sweet face. And yet he wrote to his mother that he had found the rarest of jewels, deep in an old-fashioned setting.

"Soon he claimed her dear, noble heart for his own. He told her bright love-tales, and pictured their future with joy and contentment, and never a shadow of care. They would dwell in a modern fairyland where love reigned supreme—long, sweet, happy days.

"And he brought her over here to his Parisian home of broad, echoing halls, and stately, carved pillars, and great winding staircases going up under huge, massive arches. And so, for one short, happy year, she reigned queen of his home and his heart.

"But a day, heavy laden with sorrow, came upon her life, and darkened for ever the sweetness and glow of the future. It happened on the day of some election. An important paper which was in his possession was missing, and she helped him to hunt for it. Somehow, in her searching, a secret drawer in his desk suddenly opened, in consequence of a spring she had unconsciously touched.

"It disclosed to her wondering eyes an exquisite miniature, carved in ivory enamel, and on it was the face of a beautiful girl; but, Madeline, dear, you are cold! Are even these furs insufficient? And I really believe you are not listening to me. Well, then, to return to my poor hurt dove. She quieted the beating of her doubting heart, and looked to her husband for protection against the dreadful doubts, which would present themselves to her. And she was sadly in need of that protection promised in their solemn marriage vow, and of the life-long love that had seemed to be stretching out before her.

"But, Madeline, he could not tell her an untruth; he told her all; and his tone and his words chanted the requiem of a young heart that was dying, and only revived when he said that not a spark of affection remained in his heart for the cold, proud girl of the picture, and that his wife was his love.

"That miniature, he told her, had been wrought by himself, even the silky gold waves, and the star of the diamond tiara that crowned her fair brow.

"Madeline, dear, I fear for you in this climate; you are actually shivering! Raise your collarette. There! that will be warmer. But the picture, as she held it up, lo! a tiny card dropped out on the rug where she stood, and, Madeline, to be quick with my story, for we are nearly at home, and you are as white as the snow—on that card, in a few words, was written the story of that other woman's love. My poor Norma read it aloud to her husband—the love of that cold, proud girl's life.

"And there, if you will believe me, he, strong man that he is, actually fainted away when he heard it! Just think of it, Madeline, swooned like a woman at her feet—at the feet of his bride, the sweet, lovely girl he had won for his wife—fainted for the love of another woman.

"But she did not swoon, though, God help her! Far better had she died then, for the heart that was tender before turned to stone at the sight of him there, and the knowledge of his sorrow and remorse.

"Afterwards, he told her the story of how he had received the picture as a final answer to his letter, when he sought to win her for his wife. The card had slipped through the opening at the back of the miniature, and, until that fatal moment, he never knew it meant acceptance. Madeline, dear, your cheeks are pale, and your eyes so sad! I will burden your light heart with no more such stories.

"Ah! here they are now! Don't draw down your veil so! Not that side, right here at the turn! Quick! Pshaw! They have passed us and you have not seen them. But, to-night she is hostess, and you may dwell on her beauty and his nobleness, and remark, as society does, upon the excellence of the match.

"No, dear, I have never looked upon that miniature. I never shall, but sometimes I feel a world of pity for that beautiful girl who believes her lover to be false.

"Here we are at home, dear; I fear you are not well. Your cheeks have lost their colour, but a week here will do you a world of good."

. . . . . .

"My niece was unable to come, dear, this evening," said Madeline's aunt to her young hostess. "She received word to-day to return home at once. She would not think of remaining, although I urged her as much as I dared. I regret you two did not meet her. She is really like you, dear, except that her hair is deep gold, and she is taller; but her eyes are the saddest eyes in the world, although her life is the brightest."

Before the dance had begun that evening, Madeline was flying back to England, away from her aunt and this story to which she had listened that day. Stowed away in a corner of her huge portmanteau was a jewel case and glistening and colouring, deep in its bed of soft crimson velvet, reposed the star of that diamond tiara.

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Mutiny.

The deceptive peace that reigned on board the Revanche was maintained unbroken, as though by common consent, until a couple of hours after sun-rise, when the air-ship was flying northwards at a speed of eighty miles an hour, some three thousand feet over the Bay of Biscay.

Renault, Hartog, Taxil, and the two girls had breakfasted together in perfect apparent cordiality, discussing the plans of the immediate future, as though they honestly meant to act together for the rest of their lives, instead of being resolved each upon the other's destruction, or captivity and wholesale treachery to their followers. Anarchy, as Renault had said to Lea, was about to produce its logical and only possible result. Armed with the means, if not of conquering, at least of terrorising the whole earth, the inherent viciousness of their principles, by making it impossible for the Anarchists to trust each other with authority and confidence, was about to turn their weapons against each other and save society by their mutual destruction.

The dream which the Arch-Anarchist had dreamt while crossing the Pacific in the stolen Vengeur had been fulfilled almost to the letter. His name was a word of terror from one end of Europe to the other, and also, in a lesser degree, over those other areas of civilisation which had learned of his exploits and waited in fear and trembling to see which of them he would attack first. And now, at the very flood-tide of his power and success, he saw himself confronted, as he had foreseen, by treachery and mutiny in his own camp, and on board his own flag-ship.

The desperate resolve that he had taken was really the only reply that he could make to the threat. To save himself and the crew that he believed faithful to his fortunes it was necessary to sacrifice every one else in the camp, and perhaps to destroy with his own guns, the fleet on which so much labour and so much treasure, bought with the blood of thousands of ruthlessly slaughtered victims, had been spent. But to all this he scarcely gave a thought. He had decided on his course of action, and he was one of those men who never make two decisions. Characteristically, too, he depended solely upon himself to execute his own unspoken sentence upon Hartog. As he rose from the breakfast table in the saloon, he said:

"Taxil, will you go and relieve François in the conning-tower and leave Duprez in charge of the engines; then come back and bring the other fellows with you? I want to tell them something that I think it will interest them to hear. I believe there have been some complaints lately about our not taking our comrades sufficiently into our confidence, and it won't do to have any misunderstandings of that sort in work like ours. We'd better get this one cleared up as soon as possible."

"Very well," said Taxil. "I'll have them here in a minute." And with that he left the saloon.

"I tink dat is a very wise measure on your part, Monsieur Max," said Hartog, beaming at him through his spectacles with an expression of the most absolutely unsuspecting innocence. "Dere is noding so dangerous as misunderstandings among people like us, aldough I really can't see vy dese fellows cannot follow mit perfect confidence—especially ven dey haf been led as perfectly as you haf led dem."

"With your very able assistance, friend Franz," interrupted Renault with a smile as Taxil re-entered the saloon, followed by six of the crew.

Whipped a silk handkerchief round Renault's throat.

Taxil and a stalwart Frenchman named Louis André, who acted as second officer, came and stood beside Renault, while the others remained in a group behind Hartog's chair. Then Renault continued, still with a smile on his lips:

"As you say, however, to people engaged in the desperate work that we have got to do there is nothing so dangerous as misunderstandings, and it was to clear up one of them which might have had very serious consequences that I have thought fit to call this informal little meeting, and, to begin with, I am going to accuse you, Franz Hartog, before the officers and crew of the Revanche, of treachery to the cause of Anarchy and attempted mutiny in the camp. If it had not been for the very great, and, indeed, indispensable services that you rendered to us at the beginning, I tell you frankly I would have shot you as I shot Berthauld—on suspicion. As it is, you shall have the opportunity of defending yourself, and if you can clear yourself, why——."

Renault's speech was never finished, for it ended in a choking, gurgling gasp, and the sound of his body falling heavily to the floor of the saloon. Hartog had heard his indictment without moving a muscle of his face, until he saw Renault's hand moving toward the hilt of a pistol that rested in an open case at his belt. Then he had nodded to Taxil and André.

Quick as thought André, with all the skill of a practised garotter, had whipped a silk handkerchief round Renault's throat, drawn it tight, and then, forcing his knee into the small of his back, flung him to the floor.

Taxil was on him in an instant, turned him over on his face, and tied his elbows behind his back before André loosed the suffocating pressure upon his windpipe. Meanwhile, Franz had pulled out a pistol, and covered the two girls, saying as he did so:

"Sit still, my tear young ladies, dere is no von vants to hurt you; but it might be dangerous for you to move just now. Here, Leon, Mascoll, come and take care of Madame Lea and Miss Sophie, but don't hurt dem unless it is necessary. Now friendts, Taxil and André, if you have got our late captain safely secured you may let him up to hear me finish his speech for him."

Everything had happened with such paralysing rapidity that Max had not been able to make a single movement in self-defence, and the two girls were sitting motionless with fear, each with the barrel of a pistol against the back of her head, before either of them had very well realised what had happened.

As for Max, even after he had regained his breath, he still seemed too stupefied by the utterly unexpected attack to grasp the astounding fact that the crew, upon whose fidelity he would have staked his existence had, without the slightest warning, turned traitors to a man, and that the little German had so completely outwitted him that, instead of being his victim, he was now his master.

Hartog sat quietly grinning and enjoying his bewilderment; but by the time he found his voice again he had recovered both his senses and his courage, and casting a glance of unutterable contempt about him—under which more than one of the crew lowered his eyes in something like shame—he said as quietly as if he had been issuing an order in working the ship:

"You miserable curs! And so it's for this that I made you masters of the air, and put the world at your mercy? And it was for this," he went on, with a glance of scornful hate at Hartog, "that I rescued you and your crew from the bourgeois at Newcastle when I might have left you to be hanged like the dogs that you are. Well, I suppose I might have expected that from a German, but I didn't think it of you, Taxil. Did you rescue me from Newgate only to turn traitor just when we had the world at our mercy? You might just as well have left me to hang as that."

"You had better hear what Hartog has to say before I answer that," said Taxil, in a somewhat forced tone, and with a faint flush as if of shame on his face.

"Jah, I vill do de talking," said Hartog, folding his arms on the table in front of him and blinking angrily at Max through his spectacles. "Treachery, my late friendt Renault, seems to pe a game dat two can play at, and it is because you haf turned twice and trice traitor to der cause of Anarchy and your own comrades dat dis little accident has happened to you. You had nodings but your own suspicions of me, but I haf proofs against you.

"First you stole de paper mit der formula of der fuel vich you had agreed to leave so dat if you got killed I could make more fuel for de oder ships. You did dat so as to leave all de rest mit no fuel ven dey haf used up vat dey haf, so den dey vould be helpless vile you took de Revanche away, and left dem to be captured and killed by our enemies.

"After dat you invited me to come mit you on board dis ship, so dat you could trow me overboard and keep de secret in your possession. Is not dat de case, Taxil, and did not Sophie Vronsky tell you dat? And did ve not tell de oder captains, and did ve not all resolve dat Max Renault had ceased to be a goot Anarchist, and had become a traitor and a tyrant?"

"Yes," said Taxil, who by this time had recovered his self-possession. "Sophie told me of the plot against you, and I warned you because I would not be a party to such treachery for anyone's sake. Then I went with you to secure the paper, and we found it stolen. We agreed with the other captains that this was plain proof of treachery, and we decided that, as Max Renault had always treated traitors, so he should be treated himself."

"And are you all agreed to dat?" said Hartog, looking round at the others. "Vill you haf freedom of action according to de goot principles of Anarchy, or vill you haf a tyrant for your master who has already turned traitor?"

The men glanced at each other for a moment and then at Max, who still stood defiantly facing them between Taxil and André. Then one of them stepped forward and spoke for the rest.

"We will have neither tyrants nor traitors," he said, with a scowl at Max. "Comrade Renault has led us well, but we are satisfied that he has used his ability to make us his servants instead of his free and equal comrades. That is contrary to the principles of Anarchy, and we will not have it."

The rest nodded, and then Max broke out, with a short, bitter laugh:

"Just so! You are too simple and too greedy to see that in work like ours one must lead and the rest follow. Well, do as you like. I am not going to ask my life of a lot of curs like you. The game's up, I suppose, as far as I'm concerned, and it serves me right because I trusted a woman with my secret, and she, of course, trusted another.

"Cherchez la femme, as usual," he continued, with a half-scornful, half-reproachful glance at Lea and Sophie, who sat and heard him with downcast heads and burning cheeks. "I am not the first man who has trusted a woman to his ruin, and I don't suppose I shall be the last. Well, you others, what are you going to do with me? You may as well get it over quickly, and then go to perdition your own way."

"Dere vill be blenty of time for us to get dere ven ve haf decided vich road to take, Monsieur Max, and dere is no particular hurry about disposing of you. Dere are a great many people in London who vill be glad to see you again, and I haf been tinking dat you shall pay dem a visit to-night, out of consideration for all you haf done—as you vere goot enough to say of me just before you meant to pitch me into de Bay of Biscay. Ve vill not kill you ourselves; you shall haf von chance for your life, and if you do not make de best of it, vell den dat is your look out. Now you vill go to your cabin and be taken goot care of. Take dose two girls avay too, and see dat dey don't get up to any mischief. Keep dem in separate cabins for de present."

Neither Max nor either of the girls made the slightest resistance to what they saw was inevitable. For the present, at any rate, they were entirely at the mercy of Hartog and Taxil, and to resist now would merely be to subject themselves to violence.

When Max was taken to his cabin, he was tied hand and foot, and then tied again into the hammock in which he always slept while on board the Revanche. André remained on guard over him, and at his first attempt to begin a conversation curtly told him to hold his tongue if he didn't want to be gagged, so forced him to content himself with silence and his own bitter reflections on the fearfully sudden change in his fortune, and the unknown fate that was awaiting him in London. Lea and Sophie were simply locked in their cabins, and there left—likewise to their reflections, while Hartog, Taxil, and the rest arranged their plans for the immediate present.

Strange as it may seem, neither of the girls had difficulty in recovering their equanimity, in spite of the shock that the scene in the saloon had been to both of them. Mentally and morally they were not women in the best and commonly-accepted sense of the word. To begin with, they were criminals pitiless and unscrupulous, and, therefore, necessarily of a low moral caste, and this was especially true of Lea.

Despite her extraordinary physical charms and a highly developed intellect, she was little better than a beautiful animal, who used her beauty and the power it gave her as the means of attainment to the given ends of the moment. Of heart in the womanly sense of the word she had literally none. She had not, and never had had, any real love for Max such as a true woman gives to her lover or her husband. She had given herself to him simply because she admired him physically and mentally, and because she saw, or believed she saw, in him a man who would enable her to satisfy at once her ambition and her genuine hatred of organised society.

But now she saw him defeated in his aims and helpless at the mercy of his enemies with very much the same feelings that a tigress might have seen her lord and master lying mangled and dying under the claws of a stronger than he. She would realise him if she could, but more for the sake of continuing to reign with him and of placing him under an obligation to her than of doing him a purely personal service, and in one event and one only would she avenge him if he was killed.

She had firmly resolved that any attempt to make her the slave or plaything of any of the others whom he had ruled, and she had ruled through him, should be fatal to the Revanche and her crew if she could make it so. Taxil she believed to be in love with Sophie, so she feared nothing from him. Hartog she looked upon with utter contempt, now not unmixed with dread and loathing, and as for André and the rest of the crew she regarded them as animals who might make good servants when held properly in control. As masters any one of them would have been unendurable, and if the worst came to the worst she was quite prepared to kill herself rather than be made the sport of their brutal passions.

She was still deep in such thoughts as these, and still vainly seeking for some possible path out of the miserable position in which the last sudden turn of fickle fortune had placed her, when she heard the bolt of the lock shoot back. She looked up as the door opened, and saw Taxil come into the cabin and shut the door behind him.

CHAPTER L.

HARTOG'S REVENGE.

"WELL, M. Taxil, so you have at last deigned to visit one of your captives," she said with just a suspicion of mockery in her tone, but still smiling not unpleasantly as he entered. "May I ask to what I am indebted for the honour—for I suppose I am to consider it an honour—of your visit? Have you come to tell me what decision the victors have come to with regard to the disposition of the spoils?"

She looked up as the door opened.

She was perfectly cool and collected now. Like all women of ready wit and self-confidence she had seen in his entrance a call to arms, to a battle of wits, in which the victory would be not to physical strength or the advantage of position, but rather to the arts of subtlety and persuasion. Taxil looked at her as she spoke, flushed slightly, and hesitated for a moment before he replied.

In that moment Lea saw that she had gained half the victory already. Taxil was a younger man than Renault and infinitely less skilled in those wiles of her sex of which she was such a perfect mistress. He might be master of the air-ship and Renault's fate, but in her eyes he was a boy, and at a glance she saw that as such she could humour him. She waited for his answer, leaning back on the sofa on which she was seated, and toying with a little bunch of trinkets that hung from the watch chain fastened to her belt.

As for Taxil all his courage and the assurance of triumph seemed to have deserted him the instant that he found himself alone with her. He had come prepared if necessary to use threats and even to proceed to violent measures to reduce her to submission in case she objected to the change of command in which the mutiny had resulted. He had been quite prepared, should she prove refractory, to try the effects of imprisonment, if necessary accompanied by short commons, to bring her to look favourably upon his suit; but now that he actually stood in her presence he felt that in some mysterious fashion their positions had been reversed—that he had become the suitor and she the mistress to accept or reject as seemed best to her.

There was no time for him to argue with himself in order to convince himself of the absurdity of this view. She sat there placidly waiting his reply to her question just as though he had been paying an afternoon call at her house in Paris, rather than visiting one who was virtually his prisoner of war. He had to say something, and that with the best grace he could.

"I have not come to tell you anything," he said at last in an awkward, constrained voice. "But rather to ask something of you."

"And that is?" She lifted her eyebrows for a moment, looked at him inquiringly, and then dropped them again.

"That is—well, that is, of course, you must understand, Ma'm'zelle Lea, that matters are now altogether changed on board the Revanche, and I at present have the honour to stand where Max Renault stood before the discovery of his treachery——"

"Through the treachery of others and those whom he trusted most!" she interrupted with the mocking note in her voice a little more pronounced. "That is what you were going on to say, I presume. Well, granted that, and what then?"

"What then? Why this," he exclaimed taking a couple of quick strides across the cabin and throwing himself on one knee beside the sofa. "There was no treachery on my part, whatever it may have seemed to you. It was only fidelity to the Cause, for we had proved him traitor first; but, even if there had been treachery, surely you do not need to be told what would have made me turn traitor if that had been possible."

"I?" she said, half lifting her eye-lids and looking steadily at him from under the dark long lashes. "I? What have I to understand? I should have thought that that was a question you should have addressed to Sophie rather than to me. Didn't you know that Max was perfectly agreeable to your making a match of it?"

"Sophie! Bah!" he exclaimed, taking hold of her hand and pressing it passionately to his lips. "Do you think I would have done this for Sophie's sake? No, Lea, whatever you may think of my temerity I have been flying at higher game than her. It is you that I want, that I have always wanted, and loved and hungered for ever since my eyes were first blessed with the vision of your loveliness. It is you that I would ask to share with me the empire which, for your sake, I would dare anything and do anything to conquer. Grant me my prayer, and there is nothing on earth that you shall desire and not obtain if I can give it you. Give me yourself and, in exchange, I will give you the empire of the world."

She had heard him to the end in silence. She had not even taken her hand away, but suffered him to hold it and kiss it, as he had done, between his passionately uttered sentences. Instinctively she contrasted this boyish courtship of his with Max's masterful wooing in her boudoir in the Rue Vernet. She saw at a glance how, if at all, she would be able to save herself from becoming the victim of the violence which he certainly could use if he chose, and possibly also of saving Max, who had by no means suffered by the momentary comparison she had made between them.

"Ah, I see!" she said with a lazy, indulgent smile. "It is a case of le roi est mort, vive le roi, is it? You have dethroned Max and you wish me to share the throne with you as I did with him. But that is very cruel to poor Sophie, you know, and not altogether flattering to me. You come to woo me as a conqueror to a captive, and I may as well tell you that in such a guise your suit is hopeless.

"Of course, I know that you have strength on your side, but I also know that I have it in my power to put myself far beyond your reach if I even thought you were going to use it. You see that ring on the hand you have been kissing with such fervour? Well, that is such a ring as Lucrezia Borgia used to wear. Ah, so you let go already, do you! Perhaps you are wise, but I could have killed you with it some time ago if I had wanted to, and you must understand that I can kill myself with it at any moment that I choose, and further that I will do so the instant that you attempt to take any unfair advantage.

"No, don't say anything now, please, let me finish, and let us understand one another clearly. I am not to be taken by assault, understand that once for all. To what you have said I reply neither 'yes' nor 'no' for the present, because I will give no answer except in perfect freedom. There is no reason that I can see why I should not like you as well as Max, unless, of course, you take deliberate steps to make me dislike you, but before you can expect any answer you must give me my freedom back—perfect freedom, mind, so far as the ship is concerned. I must be free to come and go as I like, unwatched and uncontrolled, and you must set Sophie free too, so that I may be with her if I choose."

"It is you that I want—that I have always wanted."

"But, Max," he objected, rising to his feet again; "you do not mean——"

"No," she said. "I see what you are going to say. I will promise not to interfere with him. I see that it would be useless even if he did not deserve to be treated as a traitor. And, for the matter of that, I don't mind confessing that he won me rather by force than persuasion, for I believe he would have killed me if I had refused to come with him to the Camp. Perhaps you may win me more worthily; who knows? If you can, why, then you will, and there's an end of it; but you will never do it while you are the master and I am the captive."

"And I will never try to do so," he said, stepping backwards to the door and throwing it open. "There, your door is open and you are free, and here is the key of Sophie's cabin. Now I have accepted your terms. You will keep faith with me, won't you?"

"Yes, I will," she said, getting up from the sofa and holding out her hand to him. He took it as a courtier might have taken the hand of a queen, and, as he bent over it and kissed it, she said: "As you keep faith with me, so will I keep it with you. As for the future—well, you know what the English say in their proverb, 'Faint heart ne'er won fair lady yet.' And now, before you go, I have a favour to ask you."

"It is granted before you ask it," he replied, looking up at her with a light in his eyes and an expression on his face which told her how complete her victory over him had been.

"Well, it is only this," she said, "I want you to put Max somewhere else and let me share his cabin with Sophie. It is the biggest in the ship, you know, and we shall be more comfortable there. You see, she is the only other woman on board, and you can understand that I should like to be with her."

"Of course," he said. "There can be no objection to that. I will have him moved at once, and in a few moments you can take possession. Au revoir!" And with that he bowed himself out of the cabin, leaving the door open behind him.

The first use she made of her freedom was to go to Sophie's room and lock herself in there. A quarter of an hour later Taxil knocked at the door and told her that Max's cabin was ready for them. She unlocked the door and went out followed by Sophie, who seemed to be crying bitterly, and went straight to her new quarters.

"Now," she said to Sophie, as she locked the door behind her. "I will show you how we can turn the tables on these traitors, and how you shall have all the revenge that even a woman scorned can want. I am afraid there is no chance of saving Max, for they will watch him closely, and the first attempt we made they would kill him, but we can avenge him and ourselves too. They won't watch us, for that fool Taxil—I suppose you won't mind me calling him that now?—has been pleased to fall in love with me, and when a man's in love a woman can do what she likes with him. He has promised me perfect freedom on board the ship, and this is the first use I am going to make of it."

As she spoke she took a little key from the bunch of trinkets at her belt and knelt down before a little triangular cabinet fixed to the wall in one corner of the cabin. She opened it, pulled out a drawer, and took a small bunch of keys from it. Then she pulled up the thick rug which covered the floor of the cabin and disclosed half-a-dozen slides in the floor, each of which had a key-hole at the end. She unlocked one and pulled the slide back, disclosing a cavity filled with a light reddish-grey powder.

"That," she said, "is one of the reservoirs for the reserve of the motor fuel, and this is the fuel itself. Now watch."

She thrust her hand down through the powder at the end of the compartment at which she had unlocked it, groped about for a moment, and then took hold of something and pulled. "The powder immediately began to flow down through a hole, and as it disappeared she raked more and more of it over the hole with her hand until at last the compartment was empty.

"There goes a thousand miles of travelling power," she said. "Scattered uselessly in the air! Now you must help me, Sophie, and we will get rid of the lot before they suspect anything. I'll unlock the slides and you open them. We'll have them all empty in ten minutes."

"I see," said Sophie, with a savage snap of her teeth, "you mean that if they do give Max up to the English, as I suppose they mean to do, they shan't be able to fly very far afterwards, and so they'll be in just the same plight as the ships they have left behind at the Camp."

"Exactly," said Lea, as she went on unlocking the slides and pulling them open. "Max intrusted this secret to me so that I could do this if anything ever happened to him. Hartog can't make any more of the fuel without getting fresh materials, and to get them he must either meet with the Pilgrim or go back to the Camp, and I don't think he'll dare to do that, for he has turned traitor to both parties. Besides, he knows there's a large reserve on board somewhere, though I don't think either he or Taxil knows that it's here, and if they did they'll come to look for it too late now."

"This is the fuel itself. Now watch."

While they talked both girls worked hard shovelling the priceless powder out through the holes at the bottoms of the reservoirs. At the speed at which the air-ship was flying it was drawn out by the strong draught and scattered instantly and invisibly astern, and in less than half-an-hour all the six reservoirs had been emptied, and the Revanche had been deprived of motive power which would have carried her over a voyage of six thousand miles.

Then the slides were drawn over and locked again, and everything in the cabin replaced in order. At mid-day their lunch was brought to them by the man whose turn it was to act for the day as steward, and just as they had finished there came a knock at the door. It opened, and Hartog came in smiling and bowing, with a ludicrous attempt at mock politeness.

"My tear young ladies," he said, stopping just inside the cabin and rubbing his hands together with an air of intense satisfaction, "if you vill look out of de vindow you vill see dat ve are just coming ofer London, and if you vant to see de last of our late captain, Max, you had better come up on deck, and you shall see him. Dis vay, please, and don't loose any time, because ve are in a hurry."

"Thanks, M. Hartog; but, if it is all the same to you, we would rather stop here, I think," said Lea. "I suppose you mean to throw the poor fellow overboard, and neither of us——"

"Oh, no; I can assure you ve shall do noding of de kind," replied the German, bowing again, and still rubbing his hands together. "Ve could not tink of asking young ladies to look upon such a painful spectacle as dat. Ve are only going to put him in a place of safety and say 'goot-bye' to him politely. I can assure you you shall not see one hair of his head hurt, and I vould much rader you come dan dat I should haf to send an escort for you."

"That means, I suppose," said Lea, "that if we don't come you will fetch us by force in spite of what Taxil promised me?"

"Jah, dat is even so," said Hartog shortly, as he turned away and walked out of the door.

"I suppose we must go, Sophie," said Lea. "It will be better than being dragged out by that little brute and his men. Poor Max, I wonder what they are going to do with him! It will be a miserable end for him, whatever it is, and I'd give ten years of my life now to save him if I could; for, at any rate, he is a man, and these others are only fools or brutes."

Her voice broke as she ceased speaking, her face was ashy pale, and her limbs were trembling with apprehension and excitement now that the supreme moment in the fate of the man who had been her lover had come. Sophie, as pale and trembling as she was, nodded in reply, and put her arm through hers, and together the two girls went on deck.

Their first glance round showed them that they were floating over Trafalgar Square at a height of about eight hundred feet, the second showed them Max standing bound, gagged, and blindfolded, and with a noose of a rope round his body under his arm-pits, by the low rail that ran round the deck. Two men stood on either side of him and two others stood behind him holding the rope, and Hartog was close beside him with an open knife in his hand. As they reached the deck Lea had made a sudden motion as though to run to Max, but Taxil stopped her, whispering:—

"No, for heaven's sake don't go near him! If you do you'll only get hurt and do him no good. You'd have known nothing about it if it hadn't have been for that brute Hartog, but he would have you up to see what he is going to do. If you don't want to look shut your eyes and trust to me to settle with him afterwards."

But do what they would there was a horrible fascination about the scene which forced them to look whether they would or no. The air-ship sank slowly down towards the Square, from which they could see the people hurrying as fast as their legs could carry them, evidently in dread of a repetition of what had happened after Max's rescue from Newgate. When she reached the level of the capital of Nelson's column she stopped and swung slowly towards it, then she rose a little, and hung exactly over it.

Hartog now cut the cords which bound Renault's hands and feet, saying as he did so:

"Now, M. Max, it is time to say 'goot-bye.' Ven you touch ground holdt on in case you fall. You vill find yourself in a nice airy situation mit a goot extensive view. Here are some cigars and a box of matches vich I vill put into your pocket in case you vant to smoke ven you haf got dat gag out of your mouf. Now over mit him boys, and if he kicks knock him on de head to keep him quiet, or else he might fall and hurt himself."

As he gave the word Max was lifted bodily from the deck and the next moment hung suspended just over the flat surface of the capital of the column. In an agony and fear and horror Lea leant over the side and saw him lowered until his feet touched the stone and his outspread arms caught the base of the figure. Then the rope was cut. Hartog threw a piece of iron rod, round which was tied a piece of paper, down into the square and shouted once more:

"Goot-bye, M. Max. Take care of yourself and give our compliments to the goot people of London. Goot-bye!"

Then he stamped on the deck, and as the air-ship rose into the air and darted away to the eastward a mist floated before Lea's eyes, and with a faint cry of "Max! Max!" she fell fainting into Taxil's arms.

A PROTESTED VERDICT.

"DEAR JACK,—I am so sorry about last night. I know I said hateful things to you, and I am so very, very sorry. Please forgive me, Jack. And please let our friendship stand as it used to. We have been such good friends for so long.

"It never can be changed as you wish it to be, so please let it go on in the old way.

'Write and tell me what day you want me to keep for you.

"Yours sincerely,

"EDITH."

He read the letter over, and then he read it again. His face flushed as he bit his lips. Forgive her? If there had been anything to forgive, of course he would. But there wasn't. It was his own fault; and yet she hadn't been—— She simply had refused him any hope of gaining from her more than friendship. Like a fool he had begged at least for the reason of her refusal. He had got it, and still he was dissatisfied. She had said that her ideal man was stronger than he.

She said it haltingly, but he could not change her views. He had asked her why she thought him weak, but she had not been able to quote any particular evidence of such characteristic. He had compared himself to other friends without suffering by the comparison; he had reminded her of instances where he had shown strength of character; his unswerving devotion to her was not a weak man's love.

Finally, she had been driven to bay, and had cried out, "Oh, I know you are! You're so careless and all. Why, Jack, it's your face, Not a strong line in it. Oh, dear——" and then she had cried.

There was an oath in his throat as he thought it all over, and it felt like a lump that he couldn't swallow, and that made his eyes smart. "Why should she have an idea like that? I suppose I've been sloppy about some things, but I didn't deserve that.

"Well, nobody will be able to accuse me of being weakly, good-natured in the future, that's all. And I won't let people do as they want with me now. But it wasn't fair to judge me like that. Oh, I'm not good enough for her! She was right. Dear Edith, I don't know how I can get on without you!"

For several days he stayed by himself. He answered her letter and appointed an afternoon a week later. He longed to see her again, but he knew how it would hurt. The old friendship could not come back, for a long time at least, and love was denied him. Neither one thing nor the other. If he went probably other men would be there, other men with whom he would always have to divide her, until one day one of them would take away even his little share.

After a few days of this moody, desolate idling he made an effort to get back into the old rut.

The old rut would generally have been considered to run through pleasant places. He had inherited an estate that left him free to follow his own inclinations in disposing of his time; and, as his tendencies leaned strongly towards painting, he had favoured them, and met with considerable success.

But that morning nothing in his studio could hold his attention. Presently he decided to abandon his endeavours in the direction of art and to try the more engrossing interest of business. An old lawyer, a bosom friend of his late father's, and who had been trustee, also, of Jack's estate before he attained his majority, looked after the management of his affairs, and him Jack decided to visit.

After a little genial talk the old gentleman said: "Now, in regard to that plot of ground that is leased to the St. Simon Mission Room, Jack; the lease expires shortly."

"Well?"

"An agent estate man said the other day that he could offer five times as much as that property is paying. It's a good charity, though, and I presume you would not wish to make a change?"

"Well—please see what the chap would offer. I think I'll let him have it."

"Why, my dear boy, you spend only a third of your income, and really those people——"

"Oh, I daresay. But please see him again."

The old lawyer looked curiously at him. Well, that sort of thing was in the air nowadays, and yet this was very unlike the boy.

After a little further talk Jack left the office. He had made resolves of which this was the first fruit. No; he couldn't have people riding over him continually. He got no credit for the good things he did, and unlimited credit for the bad things he never did. He was going to live better. And he was going out of his way no more than did his neighbours.

This new rôle irritated him, however; and so, too, did the few acquaintances he encountered.

He decided to go away for a few days—to go to some place where he could have a horse and a boat. Then for a while, at least, he could keep too tired to think. Why, that morning he had sincerely congratulated himself on discovering that five consecutive minutes had elapsed during which he had not been brooding on the old subject.

He went away, and without even his pipe. The trifling comforts of past days were of little satisfaction to him now. But he smiled bitterly as he thought of the absurdity of a weak man thus throwing off that most autocratic of habits.

He spent a miserable half-week according to his programme; then he returned to town.

One week gone, but he thought of all the other weeks that were to come. There was no reason why he should wish time to hurry, for it had nothing to bring him. Thus he reflected over his pipe. To-morrow he was to call on her. He told himself that if it were not for fear of hurting her a little he would never see her again; and then he heard the postman's knock, and trembled lest a letter should come from her postponing the engagement.

The morrow had brought no letter, and the time for his ordeal had come. He pressed the bell nervously. It was odd that everything in the drawing-room should be the same as when he had seen it before. There were some roses somebody had sent—she was coming. He heard the faint rustle of her skirt on the staircase.

"My dear Jack, I am glad to see you! But you're not looking well at all, Jack." His heart leaped. How sweetly pretty she was! But why in the world did she want to talk to him like that.

"I'm not? I'm sorry. I thought these clothes were so nice." But his tones were not as blithe as his words.

Then she asked some more questions, and he returned her gentleness by little speeches for which he blushed. She was forbearing, and presently she burst out with "Oh, Jack, I've just heard of the most heartless, contemptible thing?"

"Yes. Somebody jilted a man?"

"Lately I've been trying to do a little for some people in the East End. They're all so poor and miserable, you know. One of them has just written that the mission room in Addition Street, that does so much for them, is to be torn down to make room for horrid tenements. Oh, it's cruel! Just think of anybody doing that, Jack!"

Several expressions had flitted over his face as she spoke, but he did not answer her speech until she again asked his opinion of the landlord; then he blushed and said:

"Oh, I suppose he had too much strength of character to be a public purse."

She looked at him in surprise as she said: "Why, Jack, how nasty you are!"

"Well, it does require strength to resist their appeals and all that, doesn't it?"

"Perhaps it may, but——"

Jack leaned suddenly forward, and his eyes sparkled. "Look here, Edith! Do you want me to help you?"

"Oh, I'd give anything——"

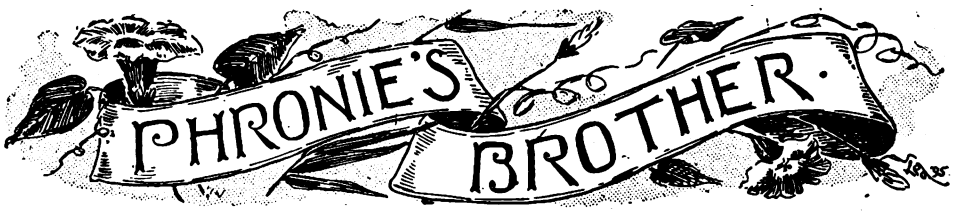
"Nothing is anything to me except—you know what. You remember what you said the other night. Well, I know that man. Now, if I show strength enough to win that miserly skinflint from his plans, will you reconsider? No threats; no money; upon my honour. Just my will against his. Please give me just that chance. Edith, you know how much I love you. Edith, please. Speed! Then I'll write to-night," and he caught her hand and kissed it and rushed away.

All that night he argued with the other man, and he praised him and patted him on the back, and smiled upon him. And he talked to his pipe and his pictures, and smiled on them too.

Then he wrote to the lawyer and told him to kick the agent, and to renew the old lease.

"MY DARLING GIRL,—I have seen the dog of a miser and won you both. I told him a good deal about you, and he was so interested in you that he gave me his picture to send. Here it is. I am coming to-morrow. God bless you, dearest.

"JACK."



THE Rev. Dr. Britton and myself sat in a cosy room in the Bachelors' Club. He was an ecclesiastic of the century end, a man whose ministrations had endeared him to many a household, but not averse to the gifts of the gods. So, as the last flame of the cognac died away, and we lighted our first cigars, he pointed out of the window to an unpretentious row of flats diagonally across the street.

"Notice the middle flat of the third house from the corner," he said.

I saw that it was just like the others, rather plain and unassuming, but with a suggestion of cosy curtains at the windows, said cosy appearance enhanced by the firelight that shone from within. "I don't see anything remarkable about it," I answered.

"Well, I dined there last Christmas under the most peculiar circumstances."

The minister smiled a little sadly as he said this, and resumed:

"Among my charges was a little blind boy who lives in that flat over there. He was wonderfully precocious. The blindness was not congenital, and he had learned to read and write like other boys until the great affliction had come upon him. Then he had mastered the language of the blind, and had read all that has been translated into those wonderful raised letters.

"They called him 'Phronie's brother.' Phronie was his sister, his constant companion and helper. So he had announced himself as Phronie's brother, in curious self-abnegation, and the name had clung to him.

"He was little, and pale, and thin, and his hair was as red as sunset. He knew all the neighbours and the neighbours' wives and children, but no one had ever heard him utter a word that was harsh, or not all good and pure. Then the history of the blind. He knew Milton's sonnet on his blindness by heart. He knew the stories of Homer's lack of sight. He knew all about the sad history of the sightless from the time the world began. And he had the words for blind in every language looked up, and stored up in his memory.

"But, thus shrouded in everlasting and impenetrable darkness, across his vision flashed many a glorious spectacle, and the dreams he had would astonish you or me. Often he used to come to me with his fancies, and I encouraged him in them, for I saw what pleasure they gave him.

"So he was not unhappy until, as he grew to be fourteen or fifteen years old, the boys of his acquaintance began to leave school and go to work to help in the support of their respective households. This made him miserable. Not that there was any real need of his assistance; his mother had a little property which was sufficient for their maintenance, with economy. But the thought that he could not do anything useful worried the poor little fellow. Of course his condition aggravated this, until finally it came to be the passion of his life to find something that he could do for his own support.

"One day he came to me in tears, telling me that one of the boys in the neighbourhood, who had just gone to work in a shop, had taunted him with his helpless condition, and had contrasted his strength with the blind lad's weakness. I was rather surprised at this, for every one was usually kind enough to the poor boy.

"But seeing his abject misery, and wishing to give him employment of some kind, I suggested that he should try to put some of his fancies into verse. He caught at the suggestion eagerly.

"'But will it bring me in any money?' he asked.

"I was unwilling to encourage him with any hopes that were likely to be dashed to the ground, but I reflected that his precocity was such that he might be able to produce something that would sell. So, improbable as it seemed, I answered:

"'Papers and magazines sometimes pay for such works. Of course, you will have to try very hard, and not be easily satisfied with your own efforts. And even if you fail many times you must not be discouraged.'

"It was not long before I perceived that I had made a great mistake. He threw his whole soul into the labour of composition. In spite of the protestations, and even direct commands, of his mother and sister, he would work all day sometimes, and far into the night. As I have said, he had learned to write, but, of course, his sister copied it all for him with loving pains.

"It happened that I was away for nearly a month at this time, and about the first visitors I had upon my return were Phronie and Phronie's brother. The boy was positively aglow with happiness, but there was a curious sadness in the girl's face that I did not comprehend. The poor little fellow said he had come to leave his manuscript with me for my criticism.

"It was a very long poem, some 8,000 words, I think. It was a sort of romance, or legend, having its scene in South America. Where in the world he got the idea of it I am sure I cannot think. Some of the verses were smooth, but no more, and there were several pleasant fancies in it, but I plainly saw that it would stand no chance in the world of ever getting into print.

"It was in the evening of the following day, while I was deliberating whether or not I should tell the poor boy that his work could not be used, that Phronie was announced. She was shown into my study, and her first question was about the poem. I told her what I thought.

"'It is just what I was sure of,' she replied sadly. 'I have felt as I copied it for him that it would never do. But how can I tell him? I am sure it will be the death of the poor boy. He has put his whole life into it, and he talks and thinks of nothing else.'

"'There is no use,' I replied, 'of sending it to any publication, for it is certain to be rejected.'

"'I have been thinking,' the girl replied, 'that it might be possible to make him think it had been published.'

"I did not comprehend at first all that she meant by this, nor did I understand the look of strange agony with which the words were accompanied.

"'I don't see how you are going to do that,' I answered. 'Would you tell him a deliberate falsehood?'

"A look as though of physical suffering passed over her face. She raised one hand to her forehead and lowered her eyes.

"'I would do that even,' she said, 'to save him such suffering. I have thought over it a long time, and I must do it. I will tell him that it has been printed.'

"'But do you understand what this means?' I cried. 'You will have to live up to the lie you have told. He will demand the paper, and will make you read it to him. He will ask how much he has been paid for it. Do you not realise that one such falsehood will involve you in a tissue of lies?'

"'I realise all that,' she replied, calmly now, and even smiling a little. 'I have thought of all the method of procedure, and I think I can live up to it.'

"After she was gone I sat in wonder and amazement for some time. I knew—who better than I, her pastor?—how much she loved truth, and hated even the appearance of a lie. And thus to voluntarily enter into a series of falsehoods for the sake of saving her brother pain was a sacrifice I could scarcely imagine. I suppose it was my duty to advise her to tell him the truth, but for the life of me I could not.

"It was four or five weeks before I saw either of them again. One day I stopped at the house. The sister was away from home, but the blind boy rushed to meet me with an expression of most perfect joy on his face.

"'You know my poem has been accepted,' he cried. 'We received the letter this morning. Phronie read it to me. They are going to pay me 30s. for it. That isn't much, but you know Milton only got £30 for "Paradise Lost."'

"My heart was very sad at the little fellow's eagerness, and even more as I thought what the falsehood must have cost his sister. Yet I pretended to be glad at his good fortune, and asked him what he would do with the money.

"'Oh, if it is published before Christmas I am going to spend some for a present for Phronie, and the rest shall go for a great Christmas dinner, and you must come and eat it with us.'

"I assured him that I would be present, and hurried away. About two weeks later he came to my rooms, accompanied by his devoted sister. He held a copy of a well-known weekly paper in his hand, which he flourished triumphantly.

"'It's published!' he almost shrieked. 'Here it is! Look at it! But no, you shall not see it. Phronie shall read it to you.'

"Then the martyr sister took the paper. She cast an appealing glance at me, and commenced in a voice that did not tremble or falter in the least, to read, or pretend to read, that long poem. I stared at her in amazement. Was it possible that she had induced a publisher to accept that childish poem? Not at all. She had learned it by heart and was pretending to read it aloud.

"To see the eager attention with which Phronie's brother drank in every word was touching in the extreme. He sat well forward in the chair, keeping time with his little body to the measure of the voice, and every now and then nodding his head as some familiar and beloved passage fell from the lips of his sister. Then as she finished he cried:

"'Only one thing is lacking to my happiness now. Oh, if I could only see how it looks in print.'

"At these words the overwrought feelings of the sister could stand it no longer, and she burst into a passion of tears.

"'Phronie, dear Phronie,' the boy said, going to her and putting his arms about her neck. 'Do not cry for me. I did not mean to complain, indeed I did not. I am perfectly happy as it is.'

"Little by little she controlled herself, and as they went away I gave them my promise to be present at their Christmas dinner. On the afternoon of that day I went to the middle flat of the third house from the corner. There were wreaths of evergreen and holly berries in the windows, and the bright fire shone merrily in the little front parlour. The blind boy was almost deliriously happy, and even the sister's face reflected some of his joy. I believe she had become so used to the deception that she had almost begun to believe in it herself. Then when we went to the table! 'Do you see the big turkey?' Phronie's brother cried. 'Isn't he a monster, and doesn't he smell appetising, though! And to think that I bought him with the money that I earned! Could I do more, even if I could see to work in the iron foundry?'

"I looked at the sister's face. It was calm, serene, even happy. I thought then, and think now, that there are lies and lies."

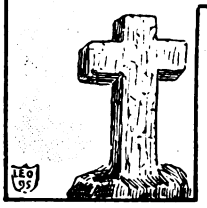
THE STONECUTTER



HERE was once in Japan—at a time so remote that wise men hardly dare to speak of it—a poor little stonebreaker, who was employed upon the highways.

"Oh, how I would thank heaven," said he, "if I could one day be but rich enough to sleep the whole morning through and eat and drink my fill. It is said there exist people, blessed by fortune, who thus live in ease and comfort. Stretched upon thick mats before my door, my back covered with soft vestments of silk, I would make a siesta to be broken every quarter of an hour by a servitor, who should continually remind me that I had nothing to do, and that I could sleep without remorse."

An angel, passing, heard these words and smiled. "Thy prayer be granted, poor man," said he.

And suddenly the stonebreaker, enveloped in sumptuous vestments of silk, found himself stretched upon some thick mats, before the door of a splendid dwelling. He was no longer hungry or thirsty, no longer tired, and all this appeared to him as agreeable as it was surprising.

He tasted during a half hour unknown happiness, when the Mikado chanced to pass. The Mikado! That was no small matter—no! The Mikado is the Emperor of Japan, and the Emperor of Japan was, at that time above all, the most powerful of the emperors of the Orient.

The Mikado reposed upon eider-down in a palanquin of fine gold, studded with precious stones. His prime minister had the unparalleled honour of holding above his head a great tinkling parasol all fringed with little bells.

The enriched stonebreaker followed with an envious eye the imperial cortège.

"I haven't gained much," he said to himself. "I am not much happier for the few paltry pleasures I am enabled to give myself. Oh, that I were the Mikado! I would travel in grand state, lolling in a golden palanquin blazing with precious stones, attended by my prime minister holding a great glittering parasol over me, while my second minister would cool my face with a fan made of peacock's feathers. Oh, that I could be the Mikado!"

"Thy wish is granted," said the angel.

And immediately he saw himself stretched in the palanquin of fine gold, starred with precious stones, and surrounded by his ministers, his warriors, his women, and his slaves, who said to him:

"Mikado, thou art superior to the sun; thou art eternal; thou art invincible. All that the spirit of man can conceive thou canst execute. Justice itself is subordinate to thy will; and the gods, trembling, await thy counsels."

And the stonebreaker said to himself, "Ah! happy day! now here are people who know my value."

The sun, which had been very fierce for some days, had parched the country. The route was dusty, and his glare fatigued the eyes of the newly made Mikado.

Addressing his minister who carried the parasol, he said:

"Make known to the sun that he troubles me. His familiarities displease me. Say to him that the grand Emperor of Japan commands him to retire. Go!"

The prime minister confided to a chamberlain the honour of carrying the tinkling parasol and went away.

He returned presently with the greatest consternation written in his face.

"Great Emperor! sovereign of the gods and of men! It is past comprehension—the sun pretends not to hear, and continues to shine on the road."

"Let him be punished."

"Certainly! His insolence merits it—but how shall I get at him to administer the punishment?"

"I am the equal of the gods—is it not so?"

"Assuredly, great Mikado—the equal to say the least."

"You told me but a moment since that nothing was impossible to me. You have lied to me—you have disobeyed me, or you have badly executed my orders. I give you five minutes in which to put out the sun. Go!"

The prime minister went away, but did not return.

The imperial stonebreaker was purple with rage.

"Upon my word! This is a fine position—this of emperor, when one is obliged to submit to the familiarities, the caprices, the brutalities of a moving planet. It is no use to deny it, the sun is more powerful than I. I would like to be the sun."

"Thou art the sun," said the angel.

And the little stonebreaker shone in the high heavens, all radiant, all flaming. He took pleasure in scorching up the trees, in drying up the rivers and the springs, and in covering with sweat the august visages of emperors, no less than the dusty noses of the stonebreakers, his colleagues of the morning.

But a cloud came between the earth and him, and said:

"Halt there, my dear. No one can pass."

"By the moon! this is a little too much. A cloud, a poor little cloud without form, calls me 'my dear,' and bars the way! Clouds are more powerful than I. I will be a cloud or I shall burst with jealousy."

"Do not burst for so little," said the angel, always in attendance, "be a cloud, since thou wishest it." And the new cloud rested proudly, in his turn, between the earth and the resplendent sun.

Never in the memory of man had there fallen such showers. The transformed stonebreaker took pleasure in pouring hail and rain upon the earth in a fashion so terrible that trees fell down, finding only mud in which to fasten their roots.

A rock meanwhile held up his head in the storm. In face of all he remained impassive.

"I am at my wits' end!" said the cloud. "This rock ignores my power. He resists me and I envy him."

Said the angel, "Take his place, and let us see if thou wilt at last be satisfied."

The transformed cloud at length felt at ease. Impervious, inaccessible, impassive, under the burning caresses of the sun and under the fury of the thunder he believed himself master of the world.

But, lo! at his feet a little soft hammering drew his attention. He leaned over, and saw a poor creature covered with rags—thin and pale as he himself had been in the time of his greatest misery—who, with a mallet in hand, chipped the granite into pieces to repair the neighbouring roadway.

"What is this?" said the superb rock. "A poor wretch—miserable among the most miserable—mutilates me, and I cannot defend myself! I am profoundly humiliated. I am reduced to envying the state of this creature."

"Take his place," said the angel smiling.

And the insatiable personage became that which he was before—a poor little breaker of stones.

He was always half dead from hunger, and three quarters dead from fatigue—all of which did not hinder him from being perfectly contented with his lot.

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic troubles which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, take a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—Extract from The Million.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

"PUT YOUR SPARE TIME IN THE BANK."

DID you ever hear of the Australian Time Bank (Limited)? No? Well, then, you must know about it, and right away, too.

Mr. Anstey describes it. The idea is this. You don't use all your time to advantage. Most of it in fact runs to waste. You often have the time, but no chance to invest it profitably. So the time slides out of your possession just as spilled water soaks into the ground and is lost. Suppose you could put your useless time into a bank, as you do money, and draw it out on cheques as you want it. Do you see? Wouldn't that be what the Americans call "A big thing"?

"Bosh! Stuff! Humbug!" you say. "It is impossible. If we could do that we might bank time enough to turn us into boys and girls again."

True, so we might, but as you say, it can't be done. Yet, isn't there a moral in the idea? Open your eyes and read. The moral is plain as the trunk on an elephant. If you can't get back your waste time, then don't waste it.

Now, isn't a man wasting time when he gets ill? "Oh," you say, "but he can't help it." That's worse nonsense than the Time Bank. Yes, he can help it, nine times out of ten.

Look, for a second. Here's a man who goes on to talk like this: "There was never," he says, "a stronger man in England than I was up to December, 1884. I am a game-keeper, and about this time we had a deal of trouble with a gang of poachers. I had to keep watch all night long, and was scarcely ever in bed, and often slept in my damp clothes. At last we nabbed the poachers and landed them in jail. Shortly after this I was taken bad. At first I merely felt tired and dull, I had a bad taste in the mouth with slime covering my tongue and teeth. I could eat little or nothing, and what I did eat gave me great pain. I felt as if held in a vice; my breathing was laboured and short, and I spat up a great deal of phlegm. I had a dreadful hacking cough, and could get no sleep at night; for after ten minutes' sleep I would wake up and cough for two or three hours at a spell. Night after night I heard the clock strike every hour.

"When the bad attacks came on I felt as if I should suffocate, and had to be bolstered up in bed. I was coughing and spitting up matter and phlegm all night long. Finally I got so weak I couldn't walk across the floor, and if I ventured out my breathing was so bad that I had to stop and rest every few yards. Of course I was obliged to give up my work, and for eight months I did nothing. I was under the doctor all this time, and from the first he said my case was a bad one. After a while he said to my wife, 'Your husband is in a consumption, and will never get better.'

"I thought it was all over with me, and every one who saw me thought I would die. About this time I read in a Liverpool paper of a medicine called Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and fancied I should like to try it. So my son, who lives in Liverpool, got me two bottles, and before I had used up the second one my cough was all gone, my breathing was easy, and I could eat anything. I soon got back to my work, and have enjoyed good sound health ever since. When I began taking the Syrup I was so low I don't believe I could have held out much longer. I have lived all my life in this district, and in my present house forty years.

(Signed) "THOMAS BATEMAN,
"Marbury Locks,
"Near Whitchurch, Salop.
"March 23rd, 1891."

What are we to learn from Mr. Bateman's experience? First, that he had no real consumption. His cough and the spitting up of matter were symptoms of a thoroughly disordered condition of the digestive organs, brought on by exposure, loss of rest, and the breaking up of all his regular habits of life. This resulted from his outlying for the poachers and his foolish sleeping in his damp clothes. Acute indigestion and dyspepsia followed, of course, with all the suffering which he details so well. But was the illness his fault? We do not say it was his fault, for maybe his occupation compelled him to take such risks, but where there is one case of this kind there are a hundred in which the evil might have been averted.

We conclude then that prevention is better than cure, but when a cure must be sought, the successful and trustworthy remedy is Mother Seigel's Syrup.

A NORTH COUNTRY THOROUGHBRED

PEOPLE were saying in the club house that Audrey looked like a fairy princess. They did not know that the girl was telling herself over and over again, how like it all was to a fairy tale. Barely a year back she had been a slim, shy, sun-burned creature, whose sole companions were books, horses, men.

Her home was in the grass country, among the hills of Cumberland. A rambling house set fair in the middle of three thousand undulating acres. It had sheltered only Peytons since the first of them came out of London to this northern world. A fine gentleman he, in powder, lace, ruffles, small clothes, and silk stockings. A horse, a woman, he swore, were the two things in life worth loving. As between them he was nobly impartial. His descendants for the most gave preference to the horse.

Necessarily, they loved also their land, and took pride in the knowledge that no Peyton had ever parted with an acre of the original property. Of course, it went always to the male heir. Audrey had known since she knew anything that, some day, her cousin Jack would reign in her father's stead.

But the knowledge gave her no concern. She was happy as the birds, the flowers are, in life and sunshine. Motherless from birth, if she missed the mother's tenderness, she missed also the brooding prescience in whose agony mothers often shadow lives far dearer than their own. Audrey did not like the ladies in the neighbourhood—their eyes were not kind, she decided. Besides, more than once she had caught whispers of "tomboy," "little wildcat," "burnt black as a nigger almost" as she walked with her stateliest step, and head in air up the long church aisle. Possibly that was why she refused utterly to be sent to school.

"We've got a whole roomful of books. I can learn more at home than they will teach me," she said to her father, when the matter came up.

"But will you?" he asked. "Remember, it's word of honour."

"Indeed I will—word of honour," Audrey said,—and there it ended.

No doubt it was a hazardous experiment—this giving a girl-child free range of books chosen strictly for masculine taste. But it wrought good only. In her white innocence Audrey took to her soul only what was wholesome and uplifting. She had inborn a fibre of heroism that made her as responsible to the impulse of great deeds, great thoughts, as is a summer lake to ruffling winds of June. Besides, she lived so in the open—had long gallops with the dawn-wind in her face,—through a world-steeping dew; walks over mile-long grass-fields to bathe in the creek's still pools; hours of sunny loitering with the birds, the bees, the butterflies; more than all, whole days in the pastures, where mother and foal alike knew and answered to her call.

Beyond all that, good comradeship with men—her father, Jack, the friends who dropped in to dine or sup—now and again in the autumn some stranger, who stayed in for a week of quail shooting. To a man they were fond of the bright-faced creature who sat at table in her mother's place, saying little, hearing much, with a fine small dignity of her own that forced them always to speak of her as "Miss Audrey Peyton" rather than "Peyton's little girl."

So the girl came to sixteen. Something happened then.

"I was never so delighted in my life."

She was told—what all her world had long known—that Jack loved her—and asked would she marry him? Not at once, of course, but in a year or two—when she was eighteen, perhaps—unless—unless—well! unless she could, may be, be willing to say seventeen.

Audrey looked at him, breathing hard. He was tall, handsome, the truest soul alive. And she had loved him all her life—but not in this way. Dimly, faintly, she felt the lack—but how refuse what his heart was set on? What she knew now had been for years her father's cherished hope. It was a cold, small hand that she laid within his palm. When he made as if to kiss her, she drew away with a little shiver—but Jack was well content. It soothed and suited his pride to have her stand at guard even against the man who was her promised husband.

Then for a year life went on in quite the old groove, save that now and then Jack lingered at Audrey's side ten minutes longer than was his wont. But he rarely spoke of his love, of their united future. So rarely, indeed, that but for the ring upon her finger, Audrey might almost have fancied the betrothal scene a dream. Now and again her father said, looking away from her as he spoke, "You are fortunate, singularly fortunate, Audrey, in—in your prospects of future happiness. The man who has chosen you is one of a thousand. Never forget that, whatever happens."

Certainly, Jack showed himself a friend as well as a lover. Particularly when the letter came that began the fairy tale. It was from her mother's rich sister, wife of a London millionaire, who, having married off her own two daughters early and brilliantly, suddenly bethought her that she "really must do something for that girl of poor Lucy's"—a creature towards whom her sense of kinship had hitherto been expressed wholly in Christmas cards.

Major Peyton resented them so much that he was for keeping silence when the lady, Mrs. Archibald Wayre, wrote, begging that her niece might come to her for a year's visit. Jack had a different mind. "Let her go," he said. "A Peyton can be trusted anywhere. She needs to see the world. Besides——" Only to himself would he say that he wished her to see other men—listen, it might be, to other lovers—since only thus could he be honourably quit of the charge his conscience had so often keenly preferred against him—namely, that he had taken advantage of his position—given her no liberty of choice.

So it came about that Mrs. Wayre, uneasily expectant of a gauche, red-cheeked, bouncing lass, found herself, upon a bright autumn morning, facing a lithe creature half a head higher than herself, who looked about her with a pretty rural bewilderment at London sights and sounds, but was no whit abashed by her magnificent kinswoman or the long, searching glance that swept her from head to foot. She even smiled a little, saying at last:

"Aunt Flora, Jack bade me tell you I was sure to be a certain disappointment. He knew I was not more than half as awkward as you would expect to find me."

"Jack was impertinent," Mrs. Wayre said, knitting her brows. "I remember him—a horrid boy—you know I came down when your mother died—but you! my dear! I was never so delighted in my life. Where did you get that air?—that turn of the head; that lift of arm as though a branch swayed by the wind. You are a princess masquerading in tan and freckles. Luckily, they are the fashion now. When I think what a career of conquest lies before you I really tremble at my responsibility."

Mrs. Wayre was wise in her generation. She did not overestimate the charm of wholesome girlish beauty with a white soul shining through. The winter was one long triumph. Audrey was a positive rage with the very best people, particularly the best parties. If the girl had been eager for conquest a score of hearts would have been laid at her feet before Lent brought quiet. As it was, she had but three refusals upon her conscience. Over each her aunt had smiled approval, though each meant a settlement in life such as, before her niece came, she could not have hoped to have her make.

But then she did not dream—as indeed how should she—? that the Hon. Arthur Cecil was not wholly invulnerable. Ten years or more he had been the hopeful despair of all that segment of society which had upon its conscience the establishment of a marriageable young woman.

For he had great possessions, as became the bearer of a fine old Sussex name, and was, besides, the soul of honour and of manly simplicity. A fellow of infinite nerve as well, else how could he calmly smile to naught the dainty lines, the pretty wiles spread all beside his path, especially without ever betraying the faintest consciousness of their existence?

Audrey had "made friends" with him upon the instant.

"My life against one word from your lips."

There was a fibre of sincerity in each soul that called at once to the other. To her aunt she had said, frankly "I like him better—a hundred times—than all the rest." And the good aunt had but smiled and looked wise, too wise to taint by a worldly word the talisman of unconsciousness by which she felt her niece must win a way into this so-long guarded heart.

It was such a triumph—one she had never dreamed of. She sighed almost at the thought that the victor was not her own child. A niece, though, was very near—and to think at first she had been so absurdly uneasy about Jack—Jack, who seldom wrote, and said hardly more than "Cheque inclosed; be sure you let us know before you need more money."

No doubt Jack was a good fellow enough—valuable squire, picturesque even—in Westmoreland. So long as he stayed there, a good many hundred miles away, Mrs. Wayre could think of him with a truly amiable complaisance. If her niece's mind strayed ever in the same direction nobody was the wiser for it—least of all the Hon. Cecil, albeit he flattered himself that to him her heart was as an open book, on each page whereof he read some fresh and delightful thing.

Thinking of Jack, Audrey had told herself that his love could not be deep—always she had had a sort of haunting fear that the betrothal was only a convenient family arrangement in which his heart was no more seriously engaged than hers. So long as the Hon. Cecil kept silence she could do nothing but be happy. If—if ever there was need, Jack should know all the truth. She knew he would bid her choose whatever was for her best happiness. Dear old Jack! It might be for his happiness as well.

But upon this white-hot August day, Audrey throned in the secretary's box in the grand stand, was drawn away from thought of what lay behind, before her, by vivid joy in the present. A figure of delicate stateliness, with everywhere a faint suggestion of roses, what wonder that she held a little laughing court, wherein distinctly the best men of the assemblage bent reverently to do her homage. Besides, it was all so new—her first vista into the ultimate destiny of the brave creatures she loved so well. They had driven the dozen miles betwixt the course and Belpré, the Wayre's country house, and Cecil, who was a member of the Jockey Club, had now taken command. The Quorn Plate, which was worth £5,000, was the principal event of the day. Of course, the entries had been phenomenally numerous. Equally, of course, the tragic march of time and training had left just two-year-olds to face the starting flag.

"Ten too many, at the very least," the Secretary said in Audrey's ear, as far down the course the grand parade began to form. Audrey looked away from him over the club-house lawn, with its brave show of turf and blossoms, the magnificent wide-sweeping course, to the trees outside, whereon ragged, adventurous lads sat thick as blackbirds, then back to the rank upon rank of heads in the big, breezy stand, and said reflectively:

"I don't know about that. Most of them have no ghost of a chance to win—but only a few here know that. If there were but three or four creatures to carry the hopes, fears, fortunes of this multitude, do you not think the feeling would be too tense for enjoyment?"

"Perhaps," the grey beard admitted. "But, see—there they come."

Audrey gave a low, delighted cry. They were coming—those young racers, finer than silk, stepping slow and stately, yet with motion so supple as to show their feet could spurn the wind. Four or five were chestnut coats, as many bay and sorrel—two brown, two greys; a single shining black made up the tale of fire and muscle, passing slow in review under the eyes of the massed throng.

"Let me introduce you to my cousin."

The black colt rider wore a thin gold sash across the chest. The pair came almost last, and were evidently unknown and friendless. Other steeds, other riders, had got hand-clappings, plenty—joyous shouts of welcome. These two passed along in a waft of heavy silence.

"Pick the winner, Miss Peyton. I hear you know all that is to be known about horses," the Secretary said, smiling down at Audrey. As she bent her glass critically on the vanishing paraders, he added:

"I will tell you, though, the race lies between three—Northman, the bay colt, who came first, and is the rankest outsider in the betting; Raveloe, the chestnut, an odds-on favourite; and Victor, the sorrel with white stockings."

Audrey shook her head. "It will be none of them, if the best horse wins; for the best of all is the black who came last. Let's see his name—Chance! Who ever heard such a one? He moves as if he were made of lightning and velvet. With anything like fair play he must surely win."

"You must back your judgment," Cecil said, very low. "And let me name the wager: my life against one word from your lips."

Audrey did not answer him in words, but as she turned from him there were damask roses a-blossom in her sweet face. All eyes were now bent on the farther end of the straight course, where twenty impatient creatures, each bearing a rider whose face was hard-set almost to wolfishness, were plunging, rearing, lashing out wildly with the heel, nipping savagely one at the other, yet each one wildly eager to dash foremost across the three-quarters of a mile now betwixt his owner and fortune.

Once, twice, thrice they formed, broke away, with still some laggard to make the effort vain. A breathless hush fell on the waiting throng; half-words died upon the lip; hands were arrested in mid-air. As the roar of the sea, but tensely human, at last came the shout, "They're off—off!" Before it could die away the rataplan of flying hoofs swelled electrically upon thrilled, expectant ears. As one soul, the crowd caught its breath, then got to its feet, bent forward, as though to draw, by the might of its burning desire, the racers yet the swifter to their golden goal.

It was an even start. For the first hundred yards the young things kept the order of troop horses. Then Victor's white stockings flashed out of the rank. Northman was at his shoulder, Raveloe's nose at the crupper. A wink of the eyelash, and he came abreast. Stride for stride, with glaring eyeballs, with nostrils wide and red, ears laid close along the neck, the brave creatures came over the sunlit space, swifter than the swallow's flight.

"Raveloe! Raveloe! Northman! No! Victor! Victor! Raveloe! Raveloe wins!" came up from the throng over a babel of shouting. They were close—so close now. With a glass it was easy to note the lined, hollow faces of the jockeys, bent so low, so fiercely over their horses' necks. Audrey's hand closed hard upon Arthur Cecil's arm.

"Look! look! The black horse!" she cried. "See! They have him pocketed! Oh, it is cruel—cruel! Why will the rest not give him room? I know he could win. Ah! there he comes at last!"

He came—like the whirlwind—the tempest's driving wrath. Only an eighth remained—the flying leaders, running neck and neck, had a hundred and fifty yards to the post. The noise sank—shouts died in the throat—with bated breath, the throng watched the electric speed, the wide space-devouring bounds that brought the black nearer, ever nearer to his more fortunate foes. Nearer, ever nearer.

Fifty yards from the post the dust of the leaders swallowed him—his nose came through it—his head, his shoulders. Locked with the first flight, running as a team, the face went past the post, the black muzzle a bare six inches behind Victor's white face, which, in turn, just showed in front of Raveloe and Northman.

"You are a witch for guessing—or a marvellous judge of horseflesh," the Secretary said, as bedlam broke loose about them. "On my soul, though, I'm sorry for the fellow who owns that black. He must have won had the run been five yards longer. It's years since I saw a beast of such quality. I must find out all about him and his owner."

"I can tell you the whole story," said an aristocratic-looking man in the next box. "As you say, it's a beastly shame. The boy rode to perfection—but he's new to the business, and did not know how to look out for himself. The whole outfit—owner, horse, and jockey—came from the North. The man, it seems, is a breeder with a big place there—but somehow he has run behind, so far as to have a big mortgage on his hands. In addition, he's engaged to marry a pretty girl for whom he thinks nothing is quite fine or good enough. So a year ago, instead of selling this black wonder, who is royally bred, and would have fetched a tidy sum, he decided to keep and train him, hoping to pull off the Horn of Plenty and live happy ever after. As you see, he has just missed it; and so confident was he of winning that he wagered the horse on the result of the race."

A tall man, wedging himself out of the throng behind them, caught Audrey's eye, as he moved away. Instantly she sprang to his side, crying aloud, "Jack! Jack! You must not go away and leave me."

As with the illumination of a lightning flash she comprehended—he was the man who had risked and lost for love. After one glance at his working face, she put both hands fast over his arm, and turned to face the Hon. Arthur Cecil, saying, with a touch of shy pride, "Mr. Cecil, let me introduce you to Mr. Peyton, who is my cousin, and is to be my husband as soon as I go home."

At her words a flame of joy lit Jack's face for a breath's space, then faded, leaving it hollowed in tenser new lines. He laid a caressing palm on the soft hands holding him, and said, looking full in Cecil's eyes:—"That was the—plan, sir—and—and you see a Peyton never goes back on—anybody in trouble. But I've known this face by heart for years and years—I—I saw it sitting back there when—when you made your wager—and knew before the race was run I was in the way of losing—to-day."

Speech was beyond the lovers. In silence Cecil took Audrey's hand that Jack laid tenderly within his own. Mrs. Wayre looked uncertain whether to scream or faint over such happenings in public. The Secretary of the Jockey Club came forward and caught Jack's hand. Wringing it hard, he said with suspicious huskiness: "Mr. Peyton, I thank you—you have widened my experience. It has been—a most unfortunate day for you—but in spite of all, I must thank you for showing me, and so many others, that in quality the North Country thoroughbred stands ahead of the world."

THE GOLDSMITH OF ANTWERP.

A BELGIAN STORY.

It was the beginning of the sixteenth century. A wonderfully fine Sunday morning in winter had dawned; the clear, cold sun was sparkling on the snow-covered roofs of Antwerp. The sunbeams climbed and glided merrily along the houses, gilding the stained glass window panes. Then they jumped gleefully over to the smooth fields of ice formed by the frozen canals which encircle the city.

At the north end of the town, a small, well-frozen lake had been formed by the outlets of the smaller canals. Church was just over; the last sounds of the bells were still trembling on the crisp air as they died away. A merry throng was on the lake; a delightful picture of youthful gaiety presented itself to the visitor. The slender forms of youths and maidens, with their glittering skates, seemed to skim along as if driven by the wind. Two by two the elder ones skated by, followed by boys and girls, forming long chains.

Every now and then a pretty girl swept by all the other skaters, who bowed to her respectfully and watched her with admiration. But, like a proud swan, she went on farther and farther. Her magnificent dress betrayed the wealthy patrician. A blue velvet gown, falling in rich folds, and trimmed with fine fur, enveloped her form; and under the turban which she wore, and which was trimmed with flowing red plumes, gleamed a mass of golden hair, which fell in two heavy braids to the edge of her gown. The wonderful, dreamy eyes in her beautiful, aristocratic face often looked searchingly among the young patricians, but only to turn away in disappointment and with intense longing

Finally the form of a young man, coming rom the other end of the lake, came gliding towards the pretty skater. Her eyes sparkled with joy; he bowed to her reverently; but then he confidently grasped the little hands which she stretched towards him. They glided on in silence for some time.

"Why did you remain all alone, Antje?" he asked suddenly; "the young patricians will think it haughtiness on your part."

Antje drew up her rosy lips in scorn.

"That just suits me, cousin Adrian!" she laughed. "I wanted to wait for you undisturbed!"

"Oh, Antje, you must not do it! As grateful as your cousin is to you for your friendship, you must never forget what a deep, immeasurable abyss separates the wealthy Anna Der Solst from the poor goldsmith, Adrian Van Benschotten!" The handsome man spoke earnestly and mildly.

"Oh!" pouted Antje, "but suppose I do not like anyone else as well as poor Adrian?" and with a proud, loving look she scanned his noble, stalwart form in its plain brown doublet.

"Adrian! do you know whom you resemble—in comparison with the gaudy patricians? You are like the falcon among the bullfinches."

"Sweet child, it is well that you can jest; I feel as if I should like to die—for I come to you to-day for the last time—to bid you farewell—I am going to England."

"Go," she said icily. She pushed him from her, but only to draw herself up again, closer and more confidingly to him. It seemed as if they were made one for the other, for they were the most distinguished-looking couple among the crowd of young people.

"You see, Antje—I must go, hard as it is for me to do so. My honour demands it. It is my duty. Shall I notice, Antje, how my little cousin's affection grows stronger, day by day? And to know that we may never come together. It is better that I should go while my Antje is still young, so that she may more easily forget the poor goldsmith. You will know and love a better man, but I shall remain true to my first love."

"Adrian! I shall never love any one else but you!"

"Poor Antje! It is in vain; the proud Mynheer Van Solst will never give his only child to a poor apprentice in marriage——"

"You are an artist, Adrian," Antje answered vivaciously. "Even to-day I will be the wooer for you at my father's feet."

Adrian shook his head. "You don't understand Mynheer's patrician pride." He tore himself away violently. "Farewell, Antje."

"Soon I will send you good news!" Antje called after him.

He smiled sadly, waved one final farewell and disappeared.

. . . . . .

The finest house on the Schelde quay belonged to Mynheer Van Der Solst.

A stately repose reigned in the reception hall, covered with rugs and decorated with large chests, mirrors, weapons and shields, which led to a suite of richly furnished apartments. The last one was Antje's own, a charming and dainty room.

Rare tropical plants adorned it. Costly silver covered the toilet table. Heavy red silk draperies fell from the golden crown of the tester of her bed. Gobelin tapestries from Brabant showed scenes from the Bible. In the midst of this splendour Antje sat, in the cosy, upholstered bay window, and gazed sadly upon the dead winter landscape. Her eyes were red from weeping; now and then a soft sob escaped her half-opened lips. There had been a terrible scene. Mynheer—her father, who had always been so kind and lenient—now swore high and low that only a wealthy merchant should become the husband of his only daughter. "I will never give you to that poor beggar!" were his last words.

It was not on account of the difference in rank, for the goldsmith's art was greatly honoured in the sixteenth century, but Mynheer considered Adrian an idle dreamer.

"Profession has no golden bottom with that fellow!" grumbled the excited man. "I shall never intrust my greatest blessing to a man who will never be prosperous!"

Time crept on slowly and weighed heavily on Antje; finally she found some diversion in her embroidery frame. The beautiful lace collar upon which she was at work had been intended for a bridal gift for Adrian.

"Now the collar shall ornament my shroud!" thought Antje, and gave way to sombre thoughts. She did not even notice that she had pricked her middle finger, until the drops of blood from it already made a large spot. The fine Brussels cambric was spoiled. Antje angrily threw the frame into a corner. Just then Greta, her maid, entered, and handed Antje a small package bearing Adrian's handwriting.

Quickly Antje opened the seal; a small silver article, set with a blue stone, fell out and rolled down at Antje's feet. Inquisitively Antje picked it up, and looked at the strange trinket in astonishment; then put it down indifferently, took up the parchment, and read:

"MY DEAR, SWEET ANTJE,—I know very well that you would not send me a good message. Now I am on my way to England. Believe me, I act only from motives of pure, disinterested love. But you, my dear child, must obey your noble father, who is anxious for your welfare only.

"Farewell, my darling! Be happy, and try to forget,

"Ever your loving,

"ADRIAN.

"P.S.—Perhaps I may give you just a little souvenir! The silver trinket is a little cap which I thought of for the protection of your delicate finger, when I noticed how often you pricked it at your embroidery."

Then Antje alternately pressed the letter and the little finger-cap to her lips, and held up her hand as she made the vow: "Adrian, I will wait until you return to take your Antje with you!"

. . . . . .

Three years have passed; a long magnificent wedding procession is moving to the grand Jacob's Cathedral, at Antwerp.

The pretty bride, who smiles so happily under her veil, is Antje Van Der Solst. She has not lost any of the freshness of youth, but has blossomed out even more beautiful and queenly, a full-blown, fragrant rose. The bridegroom is a wealthy, stately-looking man from Sheffield. He looks his best in his costly velvet waistcoat, decorated with a wide golden necklace of honour—altogether a distinguished figure among the patricians following the bridal pair.

Antje is following the man from Sheffield to the altar, with her father's blessing—and still she has kept her vow, for the bridegroom is Adrian Van Benschotten the inventor of the thimble.

The practical Englishmen had soon appreciated the value of the invention, and through it Adrian had attained riches and honours.

My friend Max, Mr. R. Max of New York, was a capital story-teller. He had been on the stage at one time, which accounted for the gift. One night we had gone to the Empire together, and sitting there in the stalls he began like this, for all the world as if he were reading from the programme in his hand:—

General court-martial had been proclaimed at Fort Marcy. It had convened. Private Thomas Wilkins of Company D, —th infantry, had been tried for being off duty without leave; the papers had been signed and sent to Washington by the afternoon mail, and Colonel John Brierly, who had acted as judge-advocate, and Major Thompson, the surgeon, who had appeared as a witness against Wilkins, were striding along the broad walk towards the colonel's quarters when I met them, and was invited to have a glass of something hot.

After the something hot had been declared excellent by all the persons interested, the talk naturally was of the court-martial.

"By the way, colonel," said Major Thompson, "if you will pardon my saying so, I thought you were very lenient towards Wilkins in your examination."

"Yes," said the colonel, "I generally am in such cases. You know," he said, turning to me, "Wilkins left his quarters to go and see his sweetheart. He is engaged to the girl."

"But it was a clear case of neglect of duty," remarked the surgeon.

"I know it," replied the colonel, "but—well, I sympathise with him."

The major said nothing more. The colonel regarded his glass for a few moments, tested the punch, and then, looking up suddenly, he said:

"I'll tell you what I'll do. If you men will give me your word of honour never to reveal to a soul what I have to tell until I am dead and gone, I will give you my reasons for sympathising with this man."

We gave him our word of honour, and we kept our word. The colonel has now been dead for many years; the major, I believe, is on the retired list, and living somewhere up in Maine; and I do not feel that I am wronging any man in repeating the story told to us that winter afternoon some ten or twelve years ago.

"In the little old churchyard on the outskirts of the Mexican village of San Felipe in Arizona," the colonel said, "is a grave standing by itself in one corner. On the modest head-stone is the inscription, 'Sacred to the memory of the Wood Dove, received into the Church as Mercedes Brierly, wife of Colonel John Brierly, U.S.A., died on March 10th, 187—, aged 26 years.'"

The colonel was silent for some moments, and then, in a grave voice, he continued:

"Mercedes Brierly was my wife. I am the John Brierly referred to. She was an Apache Indian, and when you have heard what I did to win her hand, knowing her heart was mine, you will understand why I did not put many severe questions to that poor young man to-day.

"I first met the girl who was destined to be my wife in the year 186—, when I was stationed on the frontier. The civil war, in which I had won my colonel's commission, was but over, and the Apache and other Indians were constantly on the warpath. I was at that time in command of the —th of cavalry, and I had about 400 men with me.

"We were encamped near a little Mexican village, San something or other, in the north-western part of New Mexico.

"We had no work to do for about a month, but the air of my tent was heavy with the reports brought to me of a large body of Apaches said to be on the war-path, and rapidly approaching our neighbourhood.

"One afternoon—I remember the day well—the reports were verified by the capture of an Apache girl by some of the men. The girl was brought to my tent by her captors. They had found her riding by herself in the hills, and had only succeeded in making her a prisoner after she had severely wounded one of them.

"I will not attempt to describe the beauty of this girl. She was then about nineteen years of age, of sublime figure, with the most wonderfully beautiful eyes. I will only say that I fell in love with her the very moment I saw her.

"We held the girl a prisoner. She refused to tell us anything about herself or to betray the whereabouts of her people. That they were near we knew, however; and daily and nightly we expected an attack. But for one month they remained under cover. We did not go out and look for them, as it was my policy always to let them fire the first shot.

"That month was, in many respects, the happiest month of my life. Love was new to me, and I loved this girl with all my heart. What was sweeter, she soon grew to love me in return.

"One day I told her of my love, and I asked her to marry me. I left her, and that night the Apaches attacked us. Their victory was complete. They found us unprepared. Our loss was something fearful, and my loss was greater still, for when the morning came the girl was missing. Her people had recaptured her.

"The morning found us in a desperate mood. The men were mad and I was mad. We were all in a humour for a first class massacre, and I laid my plans accordingly. Our scouts discovered where the enemy's forces lay, and that afternoon we penned them in and had them at our mercy. Our numbers were about even, but our men were all old soldiers, thoroughly disciplined, and so they fell easy victims to our superiority.

"At about five o'clock, when the fighting was at its worst, I showed a flag of truce, and a few moments later an Indian of commanding stature rode out from the little fort they had built on top of the hill and advanced to the centre of the diminutive plain which stretched between the two armies. I rode out alone to meet him, for I could see that he was the chief of the tribe.

"We saluted.

"'I offer you peace,' I said to him, 'on two conditions; first, that you lay down your arms and surrender; second, that the girl you stole from us last night be returned to me.'

"'She is my daughter,' said the Indian haughtily.

"'Then there is so much more reason why you should surrender, for I love her; I would marry her, and I do not wish to be at war with her people.'

"'You are good,' replied the Indian, with a sneer; the first and only time I have ever seen a sneer on the face of an Indian. 'You offer me peace for honour. Go back to your tents.'

"I felt as though he had kicked me, and, flaming up with wrath, I returned to my men and the Indian to his. But there was very little more work done that day. I determined to wait until the morning, and then to charge upon the enemy and kill every man of them, to capture my sweetheart and marry her, whether her father liked it or not. By that time, I considered, it wouldn't make much difference whether he liked it or not, for dead men rarely interfere in matters of love.

"I had no fear of their escaping during the night, for we had them pretty well penned in, and I had no fear of their attacking us until morning. After sunset I called my officers together and gave them their orders.

"'At eight o'clock,' I told them, 'we will charge upon them and finish them up.'

"The officers left me in my tent to my own reflections, and a few minutes later I heard a slight cheer from the men. I knew then that they had heard the order, for all the afternoon they had been itching for a good charge. The command had not been given, for the simple reason that I feared in the charge upon the Indians the girl I loved might be either killed or wounded.

"I sat for a long time thinking how I might capture her, and, seeing no way clear, I was about to turn in in despair, when I heard a cry for the corporal of the guard from one of our outposts. There was a hurrying of men, and then, in a few moments, the corporal came into my tent, saluted, and said that an Indian girl wished to speak with me. My heart beat violently, and I ordered the men to show her in.

"But it was not my love, my Wood Dove, as she had told me her name was among her people. The girl who stood before me was small and wizened, with weak eyes and in rags.

"'What do you want?' I asked her.

"'The Wood Dove could not fly to you,' she replied, 'so she sent me. They are guarding her, but she will escape from them. She tells me to say to you that my people will charge upon you to-morrow morning, and that to deceive you all of our women will be mounted and held in the rear as if they were men waiting for their turn to fight. She tells me to say to you that she will be mounted on a black horse, with a star in its forehead, and with two white forelegs. She will be in the front line when the charge is made, and at the first fire will fall from her horse as though she were wounded. You must then manage to pick her body up before our people do so. Her father is the chief of our people; he was the chief with whom you spoke to-day, and he was very angry with her when he came back to us.

"'She has persuaded him that she does not love you, but hates you, and, though she is well guarded to-night, it is because of the fear of an attack from you. In the morning she will ride forth and take her place at the head of all the women. In the excitement of the moment she will be able to mix with the men, and you know what to do then.'

"The girl left me and returned, as she had come, to the tents of her people.

"I was naturally excited over this story. I could not help realising the real danger the Wood Dove would run of being killed, and I was puzzled for some while what I should do. Then an idea occurred to me, and, smiling to myself, I went to sleep and rested peacefully until the morning.

"In the morning I called my officers about me again.

"'I have learned,' I said, 'that the enemy intend to charge upon us. I have decided that it will be best to wait until they are halfway across the plain, and then to sally forth. The chief in command of them is the famous Deer Head, and my orders are to capture him alive, if possible. For this reason, I think it would be advisable to supply the men with one round of blank cartridges.

"'When the enemy is halfway across the plain I will give the order, and at the sound of the bugle we will sally forth. When within one hundred yards of the enemy the blank cartridges are to be fired. Then charge into them and take as many prisoners as possible. Only one round of blank cartridges is to be supplied, and no man is to fire after that until the bugler repeats the charge. I myself will take the centre. Captain Howard will take the left, and Captain Watkins the right. Now, gentlemen, to your posts.'

"I chuckled to myself, as, with astonishment depicted upon their faces, the young gentlemen left me, and then to complete my plans I summoned my body-guard. In those days a colonel on the frontier had as many in his body-guard as he wanted. My men were all good, loyal, brave fellows, and I knew that I could depend upon them.

"'My men,' I said to them, 'I am going to lead the centre this morning, and I'm going to put you all immediately behind me, in the front rank. I want you all to watch me closely, and I want you also to look out for a black horse, with white forelegs, and a white star in its forehead. If the rider of that horse falls at the first fire, or the second fire, or at all, I want you to be careful and follow me, and get to the body before it is picked up by any of the Indians.'

"My plans now complete, I had but to wait. I had not long to wait either, for within an hour the warriors came forth from under cover, and behind them came what looked like a second regiment, but what I knew to be the women. It is not often that the Indians, I should say here, take their women with them when they go on the warpath, but the Apaches, being a wandering tribe, generally had no safe place to leave them, and so were obliged to be hampered with their presence.

"The Indians advanced, and the bugle sounded the order to mount. I rode out to my place, and stationed my six body-guardsmen immediately behind me in the rank. For some time I could not make out the horse I looked for, but at last I saw it in the rearguard, and then, as the Indians galloped their horses, I saw it come out from among the women and take a place in the ranks of the men.

"The enemy came on now towards us at a brisk gallop, its line as straight as an arrow, and as I tightened my waistband I caught sight again of the horse with the white forelegs. It was in the very middle of the line. My joy was almost complete.

"The enemy was now in the middle of the plain, and the time had come for action. The bugle sounded and we were off, slowly and quietly loping over the ground at first; then, as the enemy came nearer, thundering over the parched earth. Within gunshot we came, and the Indians opened on us. A few of our men dropped, but we did not reply. On we thundered, and then a line of insipid, useless fire burst from our lines.

"I heard a cry. I saw a figure—the figure of the girl I loved. There was a rushing and a growling and a thundering of hoofs. We were among them, cutting to the right and left. We cut our way through them. I dashed forward to where my love lay waiting for me.

"I leaned forward over my horse, seized her in one hand, and lifted her, with a strength I knew not I possessed, and placed her in the saddle behind me. My bodyguard placed themselves in a circle round me, the bugle sounded the charge again, the signal to commence firing, and then, wheeling, we opened on them with sabre and carbine.

"Through their lines we went again, my guardsmen about me mowing a lane for me through the red men. And then, safe in our own territory once more, I gave my love into the safe keeping of my six faithful fellows, and they returned to our camp with her.

"You know the result of that battle. The fight lasted for only a few minutes, and then, beaten, half of their number dead, the great Deer Head killed, the enemy retreated in disorder.

"Without much ado my Indian girl and I were married at the little Mexican church in the village. For some few short years we were very happy, and then she was taken from me.

"Now that you know how great risks I took with the lives of my men for the sake of the woman I loved, do you blame me for sympathising with poor Wilkins? I was fortunate—he was unfortunate; that's the only difference. And, poor man, he really did nothing. He did not leave us at the mercy of a cruel foe. More than likely at the time we were comfortably drinking hot punch and telling stories. And I'll tell you what I am going to do, gentlemen. I am going to write to Washington to-night and give the man a first-rate character, and take the liberty of advising the department merely to reprimand him. What do you think?"

The major and I filled our glasses, and, raising them to our lips, exclaimed, in a voice, as we quaffed the cheerful beverage:

"Colonel, here's your very good health!"

Mr. R. Max of New York had finished. The call bell rang and the curtain rose on the latest London ballet.

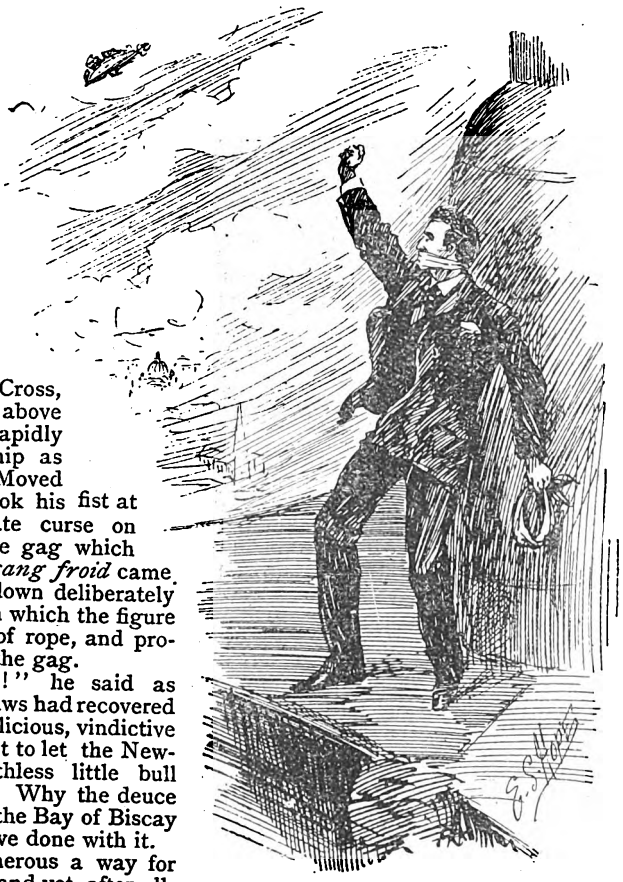
CHAPTER LI.

Game to the Last.

Renault's first action as soon as he had satisfied himself that his feet were resting on a solid foundation was to take the bandage from his eyes. Although he felt certain that such an enemy as Hartog would have taken very good care to leave him in a position from which no escape was possible without the intervention of a miracle, still, with that elementary instinct of self-preservation which, in such supreme moments rises superior to, and independent of, all reasoning, he lifted the bandage very slowly from his eyes for fear of being dazzled and dazed, and so losing his footing by some involuntary movement.

He looked out under it as he raised it, and the first glimpse showed him where he was. He was on the east-side of the capital, and therefore, facing Morley's Hotel and Charing Cross, and far away over the roofs above which he stood he could see the rapidly diminishing shape of the air-ship as she sped away into the clouds. Moved by an irresistible impulse, he shook his fist at it and mumbled an inarticulate curse on Hartog and her crew behind the gag which filled his mouth. Then his old sang froid came back to him, and he sat himself down deliberately with his back against the base on which the figure of Nelson stands beside the coil of rope, and proceeded to untie the fastenings of the gag.



He shook his fist.

"You treacherous little beast!" he said as soon as his stiffened tongue and jaws had recovered the faculty of speech. "You malicious, vindictive little cur! What an ass I was not to let the Newcastle people stretch that worthless little bull neck of yours as they wanted to! Why the deuce didn't you pitch me overboard in the Bay of Biscay as I intended to pitch you and have done with it.

"That would have been too generous a way for you to treat an enemy, I suppose, and yet, after all, I don't know—I must confess there's a sort of what the old dramatists used to call, 'poetic justice' about it. As you said, the good people of London had very good reason for wishing to see me again, and you've certainly put me in a fairly conspicuous position.

"Oh yes, I thought so; the audience is beginning to collect for the spectacle. Curious how times change and men change with them! The last time I was in this neighbourhood the people couldn't get out of the way fast enough. They seemed to look upon me as a sort of destroying pestilence, as I possibly was, and—curse that treacherous, sausage-eating little pig, and the curs that turned on me at the last moment!—if it hadn't been for them I should be that still, instead of playing an entirely new version of St. Simon Stylites on the top of Nelson's Column.

"Still, it is no use growling; the game is up, and if, as Byron says, the wolf dies in silence, a good Anarchist can meet his end with no less dignity I suppose. At any rate when the end does come I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have sent a good few thousands of my enemies to perdition before me. Yes, that was a glorious night when I left the heart of London burning behind me, and they won't have repaired those ruins down yonder at Westminster until a good time after they have settled accounts with me.

"Well now, I wonder how they are going to get me down. Obviously they must either fetch me down or shoot me up here unless I oblige them by jumping down. I don't see how they could fetch me, because I wouldn't go. There isn't a man in England plucky enough to climb up and fetch me down. I suppose they'd do that by flying a kite over the Column like they do over mill chimneys, and then hauling ropes and ladders up. Or perhaps they might build a scaffolding, only that would be too much trouble, I should think, especially as I might disappoint them by jumping off just as it was finished. It looks a nasty fall, and those stones look most uncompromisingly hard; but still, I should never feel the smash. According to all accounts big falls are rather pleasant experiences than otherwise.

"Ah, what has that policeman picked up down there? Looks like a bit of paper tied to something. I daresay it's a message that that little pig Hartog threw over to tell them I am here. Yes, that is evidently it. See how they're pointing up. Ah! you brutes, you think you've got me now, don't you? And you are looking forward to another little scene in Newgate Yard which will not be interrupted by the appearance of an Anarchist air-ship; but I can promise you that that will never happen. You shall have something more tragic than that if you have anything.

"Tonnerre! what a crowd, and what a sea of stupid, gaping, up-turned faces! If I could only have command of the Revanche now for ten minutes they might burn me alive or break me on the wheel afterwards. Wouldn't I scatter them in fine style! And aren't they howling, too. It's a good job my aerial experiences have given me a steady head, or I might lose it and fall down. But, bah! what a fool I am! It will only be a few minutes or a few hours sooner, after all, and what would that matter?"

"Ah! a bullet. So you'd shoot me like a trapped wolf, would you, Messieurs? That was rather a bad shot. I think you have knocked a piece of Nelson's coat away. I don't care to be shot, because I might only be wounded; so I think I'll lie down for a bit. Yes, and I may as well have a smoke at the same time. There, that's better; now they can't see me, and I can have one more smoke in comfort, at any rate.

"I wonder what that little backguard Franz is going to do? And, tonnerre de Dieu, I never thought of that—I wonder whether poor Lea has remained faithful and remembered what I told her about the reserves of fuel? Yes, she must have done; she could never have joined those curs, and she's too clever and a good deal too spiteful not to have played that little trick upon them, and, if she has, what a gorgeous swindle it will be for Hartog and the rest!

"There isn't an ounce of the stuff in the Camp except what's on board the other ships—I took very good care of that; and the Revanche will only have about enough to travel a thousand miles with, and then—why, down she comes like a balloon with the gas let out; and when that happens I don't think I shall have very much cause to envy either Franz or any of them. They'll be drowned like so many rats in the sea, or, better still, they will have to drop on land, and then—if they don't get torn to pieces by wild animals—they'll give a little pleasant excitement to the whole of Europe, and then get strung up or shoved under the guillotine, to the applause of a most appreciative audience.

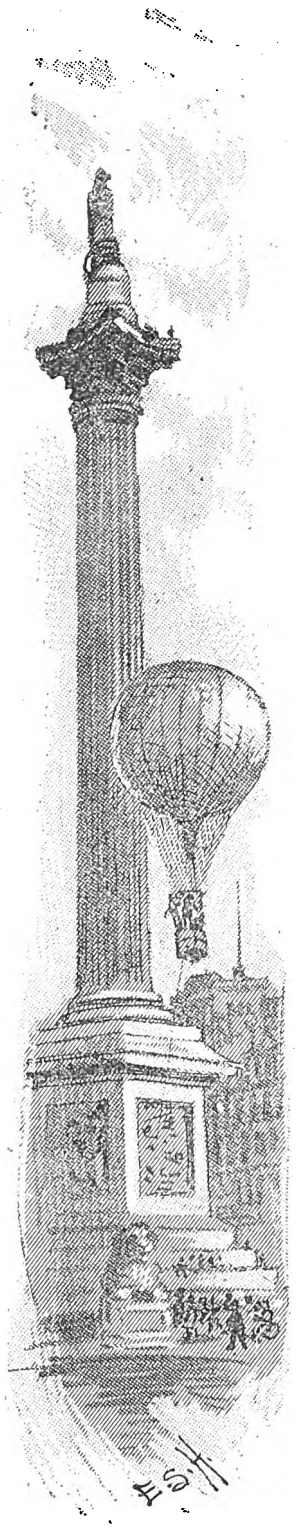
"Yes, that would be a very comforting thought in my present position if only poor Lea wasn't among them. It will be a miserable end for her to meet anyhow, and yet if I'd left her at the Camp it wouldn't have been much better, even if it hadn't been much worse. Ah, well! I can't save her now, though, if I could, and there was a ladder from here down into the middle of that gaping, yelling crowd, that's longing to tear me limb from limb, I'd willingly walk down if it would save her.

"Hullo! What's that they are bringing up Parliament Street from the Horse Guards? A captive military balloon, as I am still alive. So that is your little game is it, gentlemen? What a pity you haven't got one of the Syndicate's air-ships here to fetch me off. I think you'd find it rather more useful than that clumsy-looking thing.

"Yes, that's what it is; all right. There's the balloon, and there's the car and the cart with the windlass and rope. I suppose they've been practising with it in the Park. Really, that is quite a brilliant idea for the British War Office, but I'll give them something a bit more brilliant than that before they've finished the experiment.

"I wonder what sort of a fool they take me for. Let's see, have I got anything in the way of a weapon about me? Yes. I be hanged if they haven't left me my sheath knife. Good! Now, there won't be more than three men come up with it. I wonder if I could manage to despatch them and then cut the rope before they could wind it back to the earth. No! That won't do. They weave a couple of strands of wire now in those ropes. I couldn't cut it even if I could kill the fellows before they got it down, and even if I got clear away I should have to come down somewhere or else get blown out to sea and starve and go mad if I didn't get drowned.

"No; I've had my fun, and I'll end the game here, and now. I don't care very much for fame, but the world shall remember the way I went out of it as long as Anarchy itself is remembered. Yes, cheer away, my friends! You see they've got it into position and four brave men—volunteers no doubt—are getting into the car to come and pull a lonely and defenceless Anarchist off the top of Nelson's Column. A glorious exploit, but it will be more glorious before it's finished—for me if not for you. It's a good job there isn't a breath of wind stirring, even up here.



The balloon slowly rose in a vertical line.

"Yes, it is rising perfectly straight. It will come to within about ten feet of the capital and then I suppose they'll throw out grappling irons and haul it up close, and then they think there will be a bit of a fight. What a set of fools. Here it comes. It's only about fifty feet away now, so here goes. I wish to God I could live to see the end of the fun!"

The gigantic crowd which thronged, not only the Square but all the approaches to it, was staring upwards with strained fixed eyes all concentrated on the great mass of the balloon, which slowly rose in a vertical line from the waggon containing the windlass up towards the capital on which stood Max Renault, alone and forsaken, and really at bay at last.

The spectators expected to see him dragged off the capital and into the car and then brought down again. A strong guard of police and Dragoons from the Horse Guards kept a large open space round the waggon, and stood ready to protect the prisoner from the infuriated multitude that was longing to tear him limb from limb, but both mob and guard were destined to be disappointed in a fashion at once as terrible as it was unexpected. As the top of the balloon rose to within a dozen feet of the edge of the capital they saw the figure of their anticipated victim leap from where he stood down into the midst of the swelling mass of inflated silk.

In the instant that he did so they saw the sunlight flash upon something bright that he held in his hand. Instinctively everyone grasped at least a portion of his desperate intention, and a mighty roar of rage and horror rose up simultaneously from tens of thousands of throats. Then there came silence, a silence of speechless, breathless apprehension. Then those who thronged the upper windows of the buildings round saw the knife flash to and fro through the riven silk. The knife dropped and Max took something from his mouth and rubbed it on the breast of his coat. Then came a spark of fire, a mighty rush of pale blue flame, and then a frightful explosion. The balloon burst like a huge bubble in a momentary mist of flame, and car and rope crashed down on to the waggon, spattering it and all the pavement about it with the blood and mangled remains of the four would-be captors and the victim who had destroyed them with himself. And so, outwitting both the false friends who had betrayed him, and the foes who would have taken him alive, died Max Renault—game to the last.

Twelve hours later the Revanche, far away over the North Sea a little to the northward of the Arctic Circle, was driving to the north-eastward before a furious gale blowing at a speed of over eighty miles an hour. For four hours she had been flying against it, with the whole power of her engines concentrated on the stern propellers, and at the end of that four hours Taxil went to Hartog, who was steering in the conning-tower, and said:

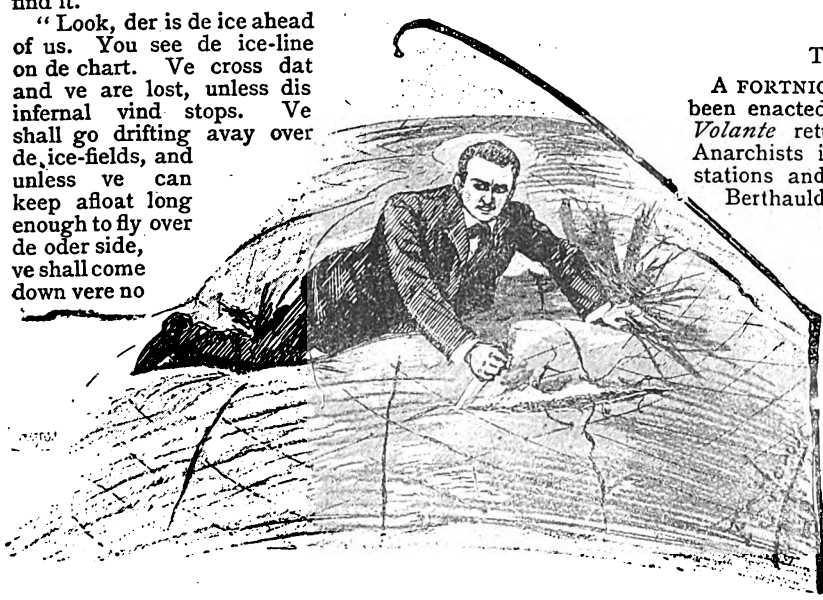
"We have only a couple of hundredweight of the fuel left, and I have just been to the reserve reservoirs in Max's cabin, and they're empty."

"Empty! Vat is dat you say? Mein Gott, den dere is treachery on board even now!" Hartog almost screamed, half in passion and half in fear. "Max vould never haf been such a fool as to come on a voyage like dis mit only fuel enough for about two tousand miles on board her. Some von has emptied dose reservoirs, and I believe it is dat defil of a girl who has done it. She is de only von who can have known of dem besides you."

"Don't call Lea 'devil' in my hearing, please," said Taxil curtly. "Or you and I will quarrel. I don't believe Max would have told her about them, and if she had known she couldn't have opened them, for I took the keys from Max myself, and they have never been out of my possession. It's no good shouting or calling names. The question is, what are we to do? We are using all our power now and not making forty miles an hour headway. In three hours all the fuel will be done, and then we shall just drop into the sea, for we are a good four hundred miles from land anywhere. We must turn the power on to the fans and keep her afloat at any risk."

"But, Gottsdonnerwetter, man, don't you see vat dat means?" shouted Franz, who was now almost in a frenzy of fear at the prospect he saw so clearly before him. "Look here at dis chart. Ve are very little south of de Arctic Circle, and dis infernal vind is blowing a hurricane. If ve stop de screws ve shall go north at someting like sixty miles an hour, and, by tam, if no von has found de Pole yet ve shall soon find it.

"Look, der is de ice ahead of us. You see de ice-line on de chart. Ve cross dat and ve are lost, unless dis infernal vind stops. Ve shall go drifting avay over de ice-fields, and unless ve can keep afloat long enough to fly over de oder side, ve shall come down vere no living man has ever been, and den you vill have reason to see how fondt you are of your Lea, for, by tam, you vill vant to eat her."



The knife flashed to and fro through the riven silk.

The words were hardly out of his mouth before Taxil's knife leapt out of its sheath, flashed for a moment before Franz's eyes, and then sank deep into his breast. Almost without a groan he dropped to the floor of the conning tower, and as he did so the fearful thought flashed across Taxil's mind that he had killed the only man now left among the Anarchists who possessed the secret of the motor-fuel.

Almost mechanically he locked the steering-wheel, went into the engine-room, turned the power of two engines on to the lifting fans, and slowed the centre propeller down to half speed. Then he went back to the conning-tower, set the air-ship's head across the storm, locked the wheel again, and went to Lea's cabin to tell her what had happened.

When morning came the Revanche was flying in the midst of a furious snow-storm across a white, desolate wilderness, which could be dimly seen through the thick flying flakes. The power of the engines was visibly failing. Only a few pounds of the precious fuel now remained. In a last despairing effort Taxil concentrated all the power left at his disposal upon the lifting fans, determined to keep afloat over the icy grave that lay beneath him as long as he could. But this was not for very long. The speed of the fans visibly slackened, and slowly the Revanche began to sink down through the snow to the awful silent wilderness in which her last voyage was to end.

"It's all over, I'm afraid, Lea," he said to her as they stood shivering side by side on deck. "We shan't be long before we meet the fate that I fear now we have deserved."

"Deserved!" she cried, in a voice that came brokenly from between her chattering teeth. "That you have deserved, you mean, you cowardly, treacherous hound. If it hadn't been for you and your treachery Max would still be in command, and the Revanche would still be floating in triumph through the air. You have given him over to his enemies, but, thank God, I've avenged him."

"You!" he gasped, clutching her arm in a savage grasp. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that I and Sophie emptied the reserve reservoirs. Do you think I was going to let a wretched little cur like you reign in Renault's place? Not I—not even to save myself from a fate like this. Now I have told you. Kill me if you like!"

And, as she spoke, the Revanche touched the snow-covered surface of the Polar ice.

CHAPTER LII.

THE SYNDICATE PREPARES TO ACT.

A FORTNIGHT after the last tragedy of Renault's life had been enacted in Trafalgar Square the War-Hawk and the Volante returned from their work of exterminating the Anarchists in the Southern hemisphere, and exploring their stations and treasure-stores, under the guidance of René Berthauld. They dropped to earth for a few minutes on Lundy Island to learn the news of what had happened in their absence, and to telegraph the hour of their arrival in London to Mr. Maxim at the offices of the Syndicate.

Of course, the first news that was told them was the story of Renault's fate, and as soon as Sir Harry heard it he turned to Mr. Austen and Adams, who was standing beside him, and said:

"Well, there's an end of that part of my undertaking, and I must confess that it is a more dramatic one than I think I could have brought about myself, for I must either have sent him into eternity out of a pitched battle or else, if I had caught him alive, I could only have handed him over to the law, to be hung prosaically, like any commonplace murderer. I must own, too, that the exit he made for himself was more worthy of him, for, wild beast as the fellow was, there was something about his cold-blooded pluck and pitiless thoroughness that even I can't help admiring."

"Yes," said Adams quietly. "If he had only been born five hundred years ago he would have probably been a shining light of chivalry, and one of the finest soldiers of his time; and even now, if it hadn't been for that twist in his intellect that made him an Anarchist, he would have made about the ablest dictator that a South American Republic could have wished for."

"If he hadn't devoted himself to politics," added Mr. Austen drily, "and risen to the same position in France. Still, whatever he was, or might have been, the world is very well rid of him. Now, I think we had better go on board again and get off to London. We can read up the rest of the news en route from the papers."

Three hours later, that is to say about ten o'clock at night, the two air-ships touched earth again in the middle of Hyde Park. Sir Harry, Mr. Austen, Adams, Dr. Roberts, Violet, and Dora at once disembarked, taking with them two of the War-Hawk's crew to carry Violet's invalid chair, and then the air-ships immediately rose again and vanished into the darkness.

The party went straight to Sir Harry's town house in Grosvenor Place, where they found the Chairman of the Syndicate already awaiting them. Then the directors forthwith shut themselves in the library to hold the meeting that had been arranged by telegraph, while the two girls betook themselves to Violet's sitting-room for a quiet chat until supper-time. Dr. Roberts not being a member of the Syndicate, and having, apparently, nothing particular to do, vanished mysteriously. About half an hour later there came a knock at the door of Violet's room, and as Dora cried "Come in," it opened, and the doctor entered.

The "Revanche" touched the snow-covered surface of the Polar ice.

"I have brought a visitor for you, Miss Violet—someone who has come on rather important business, so you must excuse the lateness of the hour." Then, before she could reply he threw the door wide open, and, without any further introduction, in walked Wyndham, not only alive, but as well and hearty as he had ever looked in his life. Dora controlled her astonishment with a success that was almost suspicious; but Violet sat for a moment transfixed and rigid, with wide-staring eyes and her hands clutching the arms of her chair convulsively. Just as Wyndham was running forward to her the doctor stopped him, and said, in a short, sharp tone:

"Wait—and you will see something!"

And so he did, for the next moment Violet's whole body seemed shaken by an overpowering emotion; then, raising herself on her arms, she struggled to her feet and with a glad cry of:

"Bertie! Bertie! Then you are not dead after all!" tottered half way across the room and fell fainting into his arms.

It had been a risky experiment, but it had succeeded as Doctor Roberts had been confident it would when he arranged the sending of the false telegram to Lundy which Violet had read in Utopia. The violent and unexpected emotional shock had overcome the remaining nervous weakness that had been day by day diminished by careful treatment and nursing, and under its stimulus the interrupted nerve-connections had been restored, and the muscles of her lower limbs once more placed under the control of her brain. Wyndham lifted her up and laid her on the sofa, and in a very few minutes the doctor had brought her back to consciousness.

"Now see if you can stand up again," he said to her when she had swallowed a fairly stiff glass of brandy and water.

"I think I can," she said, and then, giving one hand to him and another to Wyndham, she raised herself slowly, but steadily, from the sofa and stood once more erect upon her feet.

"That will do," said the doctor. "Now sit down again and don't over-exert yourself whatever you do. Come along, Miss Dora. You and I have nothing more to do here. The case is now one which demands strictly private treatment and we can leave her with perfect safety in Lieutenant Wyndham's hands. You can come back later on and bring her down to supper."

The meeting of the directors lasted an hour, and during that time Mr. Maxim told them that the building of the fleet has progressed very satisfactorily, and that within twenty-four hours a fleet of five-and-twenty vessels, not counting the War-Hawk, the Volante, and the now repaired Vengeur, would be ready to take the air, fully equipped for the assault on the Anarchists' stronghold at Mount Pietra.

"I quite agree with you, gentlemen," he said in concluding his report, "that it will be much better to dispose of these scoundrels before we commence our final undertaking. A fortnight ago—in fact on the very day that Renault put an end to himself—they abandoned their previous tactics and, instead of operating as a fleet and according to some definite plan of action, they scattered, and every one of the ships seems to have gone off on a raiding expedition of her own.

"For about a week they absolutely terrorised the Continent from end to end. They set fire to towns and villages, slaughtered people by hundreds, and then landed, armed to the teeth, and committed the most unheard of crimes under cover of their ships' guns. Then they suddenly disappeared, and for the last five or six days no one has heard anything about them. The whole world has been looking for them, for no one knew what country was to be attacked next, but so far not a single ship has made her appearance again.

"Now, putting two and two together, it seems to me that there has been a mutiny in the Anarchist camp, the first result of which was the abandonment of Renault on the top of Nelson's Column. No doubt they fought about the secret of the fuel. Renault probably refused to give it up and so in revenge they gave him up to his enemies. Then with what fuel they had left they went on one last burst of wickedness and then retired to their camp, where I expect you will find they have left their air-ships and scattered back to their old haunts."

"That may be true of the majority of them," said Mr. Austen, "but I'm afraid it is too good to be true of that scoundrel Hartog and the Revanche. This man Berthauld has told us that he is an extremely clever chemist as well as engineer and, difficult and risky as the job would be, it is just possible that he has got possession of some of the fuel and analysed it. If he has done that one can easily see why he should stir up a revolt against Renault and insure his being killed or executed so as to be the only possessor of the secret himself. At the same time I confess that that doesn't square with the fact that the Revanche herself has not reappeared."

"Another probability," suggested Adams, "is that some one else has killed Hartog for just the same reason. I was quite sure that these scoundrels could never stick together as long as one of them had a secret like that. The proverbial apple of discord would be a mere nothing to it. However, I suppose we shall find all that out before long. And now with regard to the war, Mr. Maxim, how does that actually stand?"

"In this way," replied the Chairman. "Thanks chiefly to the really wonderful exploits of Lieutenant Wyndham in command of the Nautilus, and Renault's destruction of the French and Russian fleets in the Baltic, France and Russia have been thoroughly well thrashed at sea. England, of course, lost very heavily as well; but public opinion woke the Admiralty up so thoroughly that wonderful progress has been made in refitting damaged ships and getting others into commission that were nearly finished, so there is now an ample force to guard the coast and put any attempted invasion out of the question. As for the Russian squadron in the East, it is simply a thing of the past.

"On land, however, things seem to be going rather the other way. Germany is hemmed in between France and Russia, and is getting decidedly the worst of it. Italy has no money, and Austria seems afraid to begin; while, with the exception of the ten thousand men that England threw into Antwerp before the declaration of war—thanks also to the Nautilus—she is not able to do very much to help Germany. There is a scheme on foot, however, for her to finance Italy, which I believe is nearly completed, and if she does that the war will probably become general—that is to say, of course, if we allowed it, which I suppose," he added, with a smile, "you gentlemen of Utopia would not think of for a moment."

"Certainly not," said both Adams and Mr. Austen in a breath.

"I thought so," continued Mr. Maxim. "Well, we shall be in a position to send in the ultimatum the moment you come back from your expedition to Mount Pietra. You know of course that the Russians have a fleet of navigable aerostats similar to those which Renault destroyed over the Baltic, but I don't think they'll give you any trouble, for they are huge clumsy things and no use at all for aerial fighting.

"Still they've done a tremendous amount of execution on the land forces, and according to report it's quite impossible to keep the bravest troops steady when they once begin operations. We haven't had a visit from them over here yet, probably because the Russians have a wholesome anticipation of what would happen if either of the two air-ships that they know we possess happen to be on hand to receive them.

"Now I think that's everything except the terms of the ultimatum. I have got a draft of it here which I'll read to you, and then we can make any alterations that are necessary."

As he spoke the chairman took a sheet of foolscap from his pocket, opened it, and read as follows:—

Offices of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate,
Victoria Street,
Westminster, S.W.
(Date).

To His Imperial Majesty,
The Emperor of the Russias.

Sire,—I have been instructed by the Directors of this Syndicate to respectfully inform Your Majesty that unless all hostilities on sea and land on the part of Russia and France cease within forty-eight hours of the receipt of this ultimatum, and unless within a further period of forty-eight hours satisfactory undertakings are entered into on the part of the said two nations to pay into the Bank of England to the account of this Syndicate the sum of five hundred millions (English pounds sterling) as war indemnity, the capitals and principal cities of the two countries will be bombarded and destroyed and all troops remaining in the field will be dispersed by the aerial fleets of the Syndicate without further notice. A note identical with this has been sent to the President of the French Republic, and both have been despatched with the knowledge and consent of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, with which the forces at the disposal of the Syndicate will henceforth co-operate. In the hope that Your Majesty will appreciate the necessity of replying with as little delay as possible,

I have the honour to subscribe myself,

Your Majesty's obedient servant.

HIRAM S. MAXIM

(Chairman of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate).

"How do you think that meets the case?" he continued, laying the paper down on the blotting pad in front of him.

"Excellently, I should think," said Sir Harry. "Though I can imagine it won't be very pleasant reading for His Majesty and M. le President. Still, I don't think it contains anything unreasonable or over-stated. The indemnity from the two countries is only half what Germany exacted from France in '71; and, even if we have to proceed to extremities, there will still be an enormous saving of human life. Of course, they won't be able to hold out against it for a week, especially if we work with the Germans and bring the Italian troops into the field as well. I don't see that it wants any alteration as it stands, do you?" he said, looking round at the others.

Everyone agreed with him, and the proceedings were terminated by a knock at the door and the entrance of Violet, walking slowly, but steadily, with her right arm through Lieutenant Wyndham's and her left through Dora's.

"Good evening, gentlemen!" she said, with a low laugh, as they all sprang to their feet in sheer amazement. "We have come to tell you that supper is ready."

THE MYSTERY OF POST No. 3

THE moon was shining brightly, illuminating the sandy plain round the fort as only the moon in Arizona can illuminate. The officers, soldiers, and their families were peacefully sleeping. Not a sound was heard except the occasional cry of a coyote.

Three o'clock struck, and the sentinel on post No. 1 started the call:

"No. 1, three o'clock, and all's well."

A slight pause, and No. 2 responded:

"No. 2, three o'clock, and all's well."

Then came a long pause.

The sergeant of the guard stepped out of the guard-room and listened.

"The sentinel on No. 3 must be asleep," he remarked. "Bad business for a sentinel guarding the corral."

Turning to No. 1 he commanded:

"Start the call again."

No. 1 obeyed. No. 2 took it up. But there again it ended. The sergeant turned out a patrol, and marched to the corral.

As he approached the sentinel's post in the moonlight he saw the figure of No. 3 stretched out on the ground. The position did not look like that of a sleeping man.

"Double time!" commanded the sergeant.

And the patrol came down the post at a run. As the men came closer to the figure, a sight met their eyes that froze the blood in their veins. Lying face down on the sand, his hand still grasping his rifle, was their comrade, stiff and cold in death, an Apache arrow buried deep in his body.

Three sharp cracks of the rifle, the rattle of the long roll of the drum, soon brought out the startled garrison.

Scouts were instantly sent out and the plain thoroughly scoured, but no signs of Indians could be found.

The next day, with muffled drums, the members of the garrison followed the body of their comrade to its last resting-place. With uncovered heads, sorrowfully and reverently, they listened while the post-chaplain read the burial service. The military escort fired three rounds over the grave, and the bugler played the sweetest of all calls, "Taps—lights out—sleep." Naturally, a gloom was thrown over the whole post.

The soldiers gathered in small groups and discussed the perplexed question. "How could it have been done?" The moon had been shining brightly, and there was no cover behind which an Indian could hide.

The searching parties came in after fruitless hunts. Night came on. There would be no lack of vigilance on the part of the sentinel on post No. 3. The moon was even brighter than on the preceding night, and the objects on the plain could be seen almost as distinctly as in the daytime.

Each half hour the call of No. 1 was promptly answered by the other sentinels.

Few expected a repetition of the preceding night's cowardly attack. Gradually the garrison became silent, and one by one the lights went out. Morning came, and nothing had happened to disturb the peace of the fort.

Several days past and the post settled down into its old ways, and the memory of the dreadful event was beginning to fade.

The officer of the day was making the inspection of the sentinels after midnight, and was approaching No. 3, when the moon burst forth, revealing at the very feet of the officer the body of the sentinel as before, pierced through by an Indian arrow.

The alarm was quickly given, but, in spite of the most careful search, no trace of the assassin could be found. A horror settled over the post. No one dreaded an enemy they knew, and could fight openly, but against such ghostly attacks no one could defend himself.

At officers' call the next morning the affair was earnestly discussed. It was evidently wrong to require a sentinel to keep watch in such an exposed and dangerous place, and yet, with the corral where it was, no one could see how it could be avoided.

While discussing the problem, an orderly appeared and reported:

"Private Rogers would like to speak to the commanding officer."

The commanding officer went into his private office, and, after the interview, returned to the room where the officers were assembled.

"Young Rogers has asked permission to take charge of post No. 3 at night until he solves the mystery, and I have granted his request."

The faces of the officers showed plainly the anxiety they felt. Young Rogers was the son of a brother captain in their regiment, who at that time was stationed in an Eastern city on recruiting service.

The young man had enlisted six months previously, with the object of obtaining an officer's commission, which may be won by a worthy and capable man.

The young fellow had gained the esteem and respect of everyone by his manly qualities and strict obedience to orders. Many of the officers had known him from his childhood. He had been the playmate of their children, and a great favourite with all. Later on many tried to persuade him to withdraw his request.

"Take the post if it falls to your lot, but don't volunteer," they pleaded.

It was of no use. The young man had a theory, and if he proved it and discovered the assassin he knew that he would get his coveted commission.

He was excused from all duties during the day, and after nightfall assumed charge of the dreaded post, No. 3. Three nights passed without any event. The moon, though on the wane, was still bright enough to allow Rogers to see any moving object on the plain.

Seated on the ground, his back against the corral, his rifle on his knee, he was apparently asleep. Apparently only, for his sharp eyes keenly watched every point of the plain. He knew that he had a tricky, shrewd, but, at the same time, bold enemy in that wily Apache. He felt sure that the Indians, especially in the second case, had not crept upon his victim unobserved. He must have employed some disguise which had completely deceived the sentinel. What was this disguise?

"That Apache would be more apt to betray himself if he thought me asleep than he would if he saw I was watching him," was his sound argument.

Through the long hours of the night he sat motionless. It was two o'clock, when suddenly he caught sight of a moving object on the plain some distance away. Noiselessly he cocked his rifle. He was a dead shot, and woe to that object when he fired. Nearer and nearer it came, while he sat as if asleep.

"Why, it is Corporal!" he suddenly exclaimed.

Corporal was a fine, large Newfoundland dog, a pet of the garrison, which had mysteriously disappeared from the post some time before, and which every one supposed to have been stolen.

Rogers' first impulse was to call the dog, when he remembered his resolution—"shoot any moving object that comes within range." He therefore restrained his impulse, and no one would have guessed that the apparently sleeping sentinel was closely watching every movement as the dog approached.

It was a lucky idea of Rogers to feign sleep, for as the dog came nearer he thought he noticed something peculiar in its appearance, and its actions did not seem quite natural.

"Possibly Corporal may be exhausted from hunger, or it may be the deceptive light of the moon," thought Rogers. The dog was now within range, and he could hesitate no longer.

"It's a matter of life and death," he reflected, "and if I make a mistake every one, even Corporal himself, will forgive me."

Slowly and imperceptibly he brought his rifle to his shoulder, a short but true aim, a crack, and a yell—such as only an Apache who has received his death wound can give—startled the whole garrison.

As if by magic everyone collected on the spot, each, as he approached, evidently expecting to see a repetition of the tragedies.

The story was soon told. The skin of poor Corporal had been used as a disguise by the Apache, who, with a bow in hand, had been creeping up on his third intended victim. Deceived by the apparently sleeping sentinel, he had been led to betray himself, and had met a most merited death. Undoubtedly he had, by the same device, deceived the other sentinels, and had very nearly succeeded in securing another scalp.

Young Rogers was overwhelmed with congratulations. A special report was at once made to the War Department, and before long he received as a reward his much-coveted commission.

ARTHUR TURNER was tall, blonde, handsome, and twenty-eight. He was also the possessor of a long head, inherited from the maternal side of the house. He was likewise a dutiful son.

It was the two latter circumstances that had, on more than one occasion, saved him from making a triumphant ass of himself.

There was that dear little Miss Dixon, whom he had met at the seaside. It had been a glorious evening—that last. They were sitting on the verandah, where they might see and yet be unseen. The soft, dreamy strains of a Strauss waltz floated out from the ballroom. There was the pale silver light of the moon, the murmuring ripple of the waves on the beach—and all that sort of thing, which you have read about so many times that you have learned to skip it in the novels.

Well! Elsie was going away—too, too soon. They had talked in sighs and murmurs for half an hour; Arthur's left hand clasped Elsie's dimpled right one, his right arm was about her waist; both hearts beat vigorously, as hearts will on such occasions, and Arthur had just begun to tell Elsie what she had been waiting for two weeks to hear, when there was a step close at hand, and the cooing voice of the maternal Turner said:—

"I beg your pardon, but will you please excuse Arthur a few moments? There are those miserable business affairs that must be attended to in time for the late mail."

And thus was he saved providentially, for Elsie had not a cent, and neither had he—at least, not many of them. There were several other occasions when his own long head, or his mamma's had helped him out—for Arthur was somewhat susceptible. But it is not of these I have to tell.

His time had come. The in-every-way-desirable young person had presented herself. True, she was not so young as she had been: but, then, that was a mere trifle. She was just his own age, of as good a family as his own, and an heiress of considerable degree. She was not—well, not exactly handsome, and was rather inclined to what is politely called plumpness; but Arthur's mamma and Arthur's long head gave their approval—and Arthur did not care who she might be so long as she possessed the above qualifications, particularly the one involving a very neat fortune in her own right.

Besides, Arthur was getting a bit desperate. In fact, he had so far exceeded his own salary and the maternal allowance (which, by the way, was as large as Mrs. Turner could afford), that nothing short of a miracle, or a matrimonial alliance such as he had been so long seeking, could save him from getting into very deep water

And thus it came to pass that this winter found him engaged to Miss Mildred Field, much to the satisfaction of his mother, who was visiting in Scotland, and to whom he, like the dutiful son he was, sent the gratifying news at once.

He was disappointed, however, on one point. He had pleaded artfully for an early wedding, but Miss Field had set her foot down with much firmness, and said he must go through a long probationary period—all of which Arthur failed to understand. He had always been noted for his persuasive powers, and had flattered himself that Mildred, with her gentle, clinging bud-like ways, would succumb at once.

Now, be it known, that Miss Mildred Field had not arrived at years of discretion for nothing. Neither had she, a not unprepossessing young person, with nearly half a million in her own right, passed through the experience of ten seasons without gathering unto herself much knowledge of the ways and wiles of wicked man. She had had, as might have been expected, offers to a high number; but, thus far, the gentlemen concerned had failed—by reason of their unanimous desire to touch her purse—to touch, in the first place, the all-important key to it, which was hidden away in her plump bosom. And Miss Mildred Field was worldly-wise in her day and generation.

She was certainly in love with Turner—there could be no doubt of that. It is quite as certain that she was very seriously in love with him; but, with the wisdom born of experience, she did not let him know one-half of what she felt for him.

If any one had told Turner that he was just now in a very shaky position he would have scoffed. His chum, Ted Cross, who was spending the winter at the house during Mrs. Turner's absence, had once suggested that "there's many a slip," but Arthur merely flung a shoe at him, and whistled serenely.

It was in this frame of mind that, one evening in February, he ran lightly up the steps of the Fields' house to call on her whom Cross unfeelingly referred to as his "little lady-love." It was warm, and the front-door stood ajar. The little footman was not in his accustomed place, so Turner, with the air of one who knew just where he was going, stepped inside. From the open door of Papa Field's study came the sound of voices in earnest discussion, and one of them spoke his name.

He halted, irresolute, as would any one else under like circumstances. Papa Field was speaking:

"Of course, my dear, you are your own mistress, and I can only advise you. It seems to me, however, that you have done a very foolish thing to engage yourself to this young Turner. True, he seems an exemplary young fellow, and he comes of an excellent family; but it is well-known that he has only a small allowance from the estate in addition to a beggarly five hundred pounds salary. How do you know it is you, and not your money, that he wants? It is a brutal question, I know, but it is one you have probably asked of yourself half-a-dozen times concerning other young men."

Arthur, out in the hall, standing in much the same attitude as a girl assumes, when speaking her first "piece" in school, winced, but waited for the answer. It came, in serious, thoughtful tones, which indicated plainly that Miss Mildred, also, had considered this very matter.

"N—no, I am sure you misjudge him. Of course, I understand how he is situated financially, and—and all that. But I am sure he is honest and honourable, and that he—he cares for me very much. There are a thousand ways by which I can learn much that you cannot, and——."

"Yes, yes; I understand. But suppose you should put him to the test. Do you think he would come through—ah—er—unscathed, as it were? Suppose you should tell him that I had lost all your money and mine in unfortunate speculation—that we were beggars, and had not a penny we could call our own? Are you afraid to try him?"

There was a brief silence. Then:

"I don't like to tell a falsehood, papa; but it would be only a 'white lie,' and perhaps for the best. Yes, I'll try him to-morrow night."

"That's my dutiful girl. Now run along and let me work."

There was the sound of a kiss, and the perspiring young man in the hall hastened to get out of the house. He wanted time to think, but the first thing that entered his head as he reached the pavement was a fanciful picture of the petite Miss Field, with her one hundred and sixty pounds avoirdupois, "running along," and he smiled broadly. Then he walked rapidly over to the next street to take a cab to his club, there to hold a pow-wow with Cross.

On the steps he hesitated for a moment.

"Had I better go back now?" he thought. "No; she won't have her little tale of woe ready, and might be put out if I call to-night. I might give myself away, too. Better have time to get my speech prepared." And this astute young man went in and proceeded to make himself comfortable.

The next evening, with his usual light heart and good spirits, he rang the door-bell of No. 1, Bellevue Square, the residence of the Fields. Yes, Miss Field was in, Peter said. Turner went into the drawing-room and sat down, running rapidly over in his mind the various tender speeches he had prepared for the emergency. Mildred was a long time coming, he thought, for one who expected him.

Presently she entered—slowly—heavily. Her head bent low over her ample bosom, and her breath came short and fast. Turner went forward to meet her, his arms oustretched. He was something of an actor himself, and he knew it.

"Mildred, darling. What is the trouble with my little girl?" (Another good stroke. Miss Field liked to be called "little.")

"Oh, Arthur, Arthur. I don't know how to tell you. It is too dreadful! Papa——"

"What! Has your father been——"

"Oh, no, not that, but—worse. Arthur, we are—beggars!"

And Miss Field, delivering these last words with wonderful impressiveness, hung her head and sobbed bitterly behind her lace handkerchief.

Then it was that Turner, like the young man of action that he was, put his arm as far round his tearful fiancée as possible, and, with some difficulty, led her to a seat and pulled her head down on his glossy shirt front.

He was very sorry, as she must know. But it was nothing. Her father would recoup himself—he had many influential friends. As for her, had she not him—her Arthur? He would not, he once interrupted her to say, permit her, through a sense of false pride, to cast him off now, when she most needed him. No, never.

He had six hundred a year. It wasn't much, he knew; but they could live on it. And did she suppose for one instant that he had expected to live on his wife's money? No, a thousand times, no!

"We will have a real quiet little wedding, dearest; and, after it is all over, we will go quietly to our own little cottage in the suburbs, which you and I will get ready in the meantime, and there we will be the happiest couple in the world. What! Mildred, am I to understand that you laugh at my cherished plans?"

For Mildred had leaped to her feet, and was laughing heartily.

"Why, you foolish boy, I was only teasing you a bit. Don't you think I'd make a good actress? Papa and I haven't lost a——"

Here was Mr. Turner's opportunity. She had doubted him; oh, cruel blow! If she could not trust him now, how could she have any faith in him when they were married? Perhaps, after all, it were best——

And he strode haughtily to the door.

But this was not part of Miss Field's programme, and she did what any very-much-in-love female would do under the circumstances; so that, in a very few seconds, two people were sitting on a divan in a very lover-like attitude indeed.

. . . . . .

An hour later a young man, walking briskly down the street, was reflecting on the vagaries of chance and his own good luck.

If Peter had been at the door—if he had been ten minutes later—if he had sneezed in the hall—if——

"It was an awfully close shave," he reflected, and he stopped and shook hands with himself, much to the amazement of the policeman at the corner.

Bibber's Charity.

YOUNG Bibber broke one of his rules of life the other day and came to the City. This unusual journey into the marts of trade and finance was in response to a call from his lawyer, who wanted his signature to some papers. It was five years since Bibber had been anywhere in the city, except as a transient traveller from Liverpool Street, and as he walked through Cheapside he looked about him at the new buildings in the air and the bustle and confusion of the streets with as much interest as a lately arrived immigrant.

Bibber rather enjoyed the novelty of the situation, and after he had completed his business at the lawyer's office he tried to stroll along Threadneedle Street as he did in Piccadilly.

As he went through the crowded thoroughfares, a miserable-looking, dirty, and bloated object stood still in his track and begged Bibber for a few halfpence to buy food.

"I've come all the way from Birmingham," said the object, "and I haven't tasted food for twenty-four hours."

Bibber drew away as though the object had a contagious disease in his rags, and handed him a shilling without waiting to receive the man's blessing.

"Poor fellow," said Bibber. "Fancy going without eating all day."

He could not fancy this, though he tried, and the impossibility of it impressed him so much that he amiably determined to go back and hunt up the object and give him more money.

Bibber's ideas of a dinner were rather exalted. He did not know of places where a shilling was good for a square meal, including "one roast, three vegetables, and pastry." He hardly considered a shilling a sufficiently large tip for a waiter who served the dinner, and decidedly not enough for the dinner itself.

He did not see the man at first, and when he did the man did not see him. Bibber watched him stop three gentlemen, two of whom gave him some money, and then the object approached Bibber and repeated his sad tale in a monotone. He evidently did not recognise Bibber, and the club-man gave him half-a-crown and walked away, feeling that the man surely must have enough by this time with which to get something to eat, if only a luncheon instead of a dinner.

This retracing of his footsteps had confused Bibber, and he made a complete circuit of the block before he discovered that he had lost his bearings. He was standing just where he had started from, and gazing along the line of the road, looking for a cab, when the familiar accents of the object again saluted him.

When Bibber faced him, the beggar looked uneasy. He was not sure whether or not he had approached this particular gentleman before, but Bibber conceived an idea of much subtlety, and deceived the object by again putting his hand in his pocket.

"Nothing to eat for twenty-four hours? Dear me!" drawled the club-man. "Haven't you any money, either?"

"Not a penny," groaned the object; "an' I'm jest faint for food, s'help me. I hate to beg, sir. It isn't the money I want, it's jest food. I'm starvin', sure."

"Well," said Bibber suddenly, "if it is only something to eat you want, come in here and I'll give you your breakfast."

But the man held back, and began to whine and complain that they wouldn't let the likes of him in such a fine place.

"Oh, yes, they will," said Bibber, glancing at the bill of fare in front of the place. "It seems to be extremely cheap. Beefsteak, one shilling, for instance. Go in," he added, and there was something in his tone which made the object move ungraciously into the eating-house.

It was a very cheap place, Bibber thought, and the people stared very hard at him and his gloves and the gardenia in his coat and at the tramp accompanying him.

"You ain't going to eat two breakfasts, are yer?" asked one of the waiters of the object.

The object looked uneasy, and Bibber, who stood beside his chair, smiled in triumph.

"You're mistaken," he said to the waiter. "This gentleman is starving—he has not tasted food for twenty-four hours. Give him whatever he asks for."

The object scowled, and the waiter grinned behind his tin tray and had the impudence to wink at Bibber, who recovered from this in time to give the man a florin, and so to make him a friend for life. The object ordered milk, but Bibber protested and ordered two beefsteaks and fried potatoes, two omelettes, coffee, and ham with bacon.

"What cher think I am?" yelled the object in desperation.

"Hungry," said Bibber very gently, "or else an impostor. And, you know, if you should happen to be the latter, I should have to hand you over to the police."

Bibber leaned easily against the wall and read the signs about him, and kept one eye on a policeman across the street. The object was choking and cursing through his breakfast. It did not seem to agree with him. Whenever he stopped, Bibber would point with his stick to a still unfinished dish, and the object, after a husky protest, would attack it as though it were poison. The people sitting about were laughing, and the proprietor behind the desk smiled grimly.

"There, darn ye," said the object at last, "I've eat all I can eat for a year. You think you're mighty smart, don't ye? But if you choose to pay that high for your fun, I suppose ye can afford it. Only don't let me catch you about these streets after dark, that's all."

And the object started off, shaking his fist.

"Wait a minute," said Bibber; "you haven't paid the waiter for your breakfast."

"Haven't what?" shouted the object. "Paid him! How could I pay him? Youse asked me to come in here and eat. I didn't want no breakfast, did I? Youse'll have to pay for your fun yerself, or they'll trow yer out."

"I gave you," said Bibber slowly, "three and sixpence to buy a breakfast with. The bill comes to four shillings, and extremely cheap it is," he added, with a bow to the fat proprietor. "Several other gentlemen, on your representation that you were starving, gave you other sums to be expended on a breakfast. You have the money with you now, so pay what you owe at once or I'll call that constable across the street and tell him what I know, and have you put where you belong."

"I'll see you blowed first," gasped the object.

Bibber turned to the waiter.

"Kindly beckon to that officer," said he.

The waiter ran to the door, and the object ran too; but the waiter grabbed him by the back of his neck and held him.

"Lemme go!" yelled the object. "Lemme go and I'll pay!"

Everybody in the place came up now, and formed a circle round the group, and watched the object count out four shillings in the waiter's hand, which left him just one penny.

"You have forgotten the waiter who served you," said Bibber severely, pointing with his stick at the penny.

"No, you don't," groaned the object.

"Oh, yes," said Bibber, "do the decent thing now, or I'll——"

The object dropped the penny in the waiter's hand, and Bibber, smiling and easy, made his way through the admiring crowd and out into the street

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

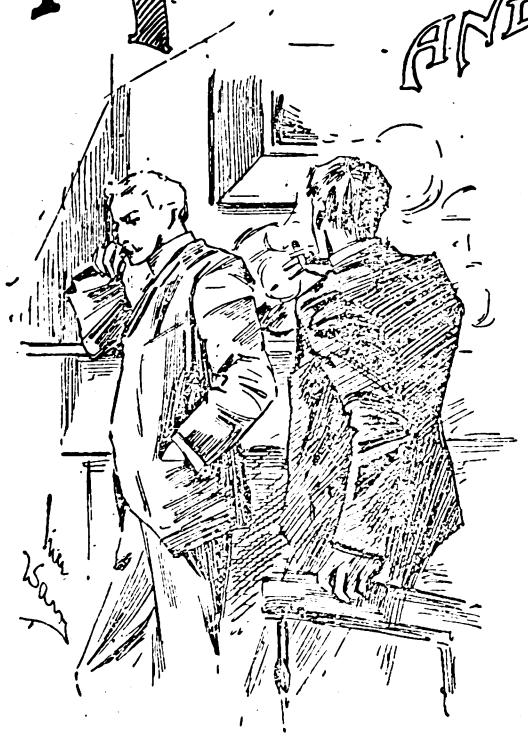
EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 324.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 16, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A Good Man — and True



"You understand, my dear fellow? To put it quite plainly, you know, a wife of this kind is a nuisance."

He stood tugging at his blonde moustache, his whole handsome face—boyish still, in some way, spite of his twenty-eight years—irritated and vengeful.

Reginald Mansfield regarded him attentively through the blue smoke of his cigarette.

"It strikes me," he observed, at last, "that you, to use an expression of our French neighbours, are complaining that the bride is too fair."

Herbert Latimer bit his lip.

"Well, that is just what I am doing! Lena is too fond, by George! Of course, she's the sweetest, best little girl in the world; but, hang it, a man can't be cried at every time he happens to come home a little late from the club! Lena is a perpetual fountain of salt tears. She thinks everything a sin, besides—cards, dances, all the rest of it. I did not mind it the first few months. No man does. But, frankly, Reg, it's beginning to pall. Hang it, I say! She should have married a youthful clerk, with lodgings in the suburbs, to which he would have returned by six or seven every evening! She could have waited on the doorway for him then, and she would have been happy."

Reginald Mansfield knocked the ashes from his cigarette.

"It is possible, as you say, that she would have been more happy under those circumstances. I have been told, I think, that she was a country girl herself? She did not belong to the swim—as you do."

"Oh, yes, she was a country girl," cried Herbert pettishly, "but her people have good blood, all the same; there have been men and women of the world among them; I don't see how Lena comes by her provinciality. She has had a chance recently to cure herself of it, too. As Mrs. Herbert Latimer, she has not been out enough, goodness knows. But there's the bother of it! You can't get her to care. Amusements, admiration, toilets, her own beauty—all that doesn't count for Lena."

"I see. She would prefer her husband's love and devotion."

"Bah!—love, devotion! Fiddlesticks! She knows, and you should know, Reg, that I'm as fond of her as a man can be, but when it comes to toeing the mark as Lena would like me to, why I'm not there, that's all! By George, I'm not a parson, you know."

"No, you're not."

Latimer gave a short laugh.

"Well, no more are you, Reg. You've made the pace pretty rapidly, you know."

"Ye—es," drawled Reginald Mansfield. "Still, I am not married."

Latimer laughed again. "I'd pity your wife if you were. Frankly, now, Reg, were you ever really in love with a woman? I don't mean was your blood ever stirred. By Jove, you've had love affairs in plenty, but I mean, did you really ever seriously care?"

As the other gave no answer, he ran on, reverting to his own concerns in the light way characteristic of his volatile nature. "'Pon honour, though, Reg, what do you advise me to do about Lena? I decided upon this three months' trip on the Continent with Benedict and the rest of that party—a sort of bachelor tour—just to teach Lena a salutary lesson, as it were; just to show her that a man, in our way of life, wants his liberty; that a wife can't draw him about in leading-strings. But the scene she made when she heard I was going—— "

"Scene?" Reginald broke in. "I cannot fancy Mrs. Latimer, from what I have heard of her, making a scene."

"Oh, I don't mean in the usual feminine way, of course; Lena's a lady to the finger-tips. But she looked tragic, you know; as if she could never smile again; as if I were deserting her. Now, I repeat, what do you advise me to do? You know women, if ever a man did."

"Go," said Reginald, shortly, after a brief pause.

"Go?" exclaimed the other, with a sigh of immense relief. "Well, old fellow, that's what I think too! It may do her good."

"It may," assented Mansfield.

. . . . .

It was a week later. Herbert Latimer had left for Paris.

A slight, girlish figure in a straight, flowing dress advanced.

Reginald Mansfield was walking up from the club to Herbert Latimer's house to see Herbert Latimer's wife. It was his first visit. He had been in the North when Herbert had married; and he had returned but a few days prior to the conversation just reported. On the evening of his arrival he had gone to see a woman of a certain age, an old friend of Herbert Latimer, once the friend of Reginald's own mother. She was a woman of the world, who had kept the depth of her heart and feeling and who had looked on many of the chances and phases of life with her clear, steady eyes. The talk had turned on Herbert Latimer's wife.

"She is a simple country lassie, is she not?" asked Reginald.

"She has a rare and charming nature, strong and sweet—far too good for Herbert. But she adores him—as girls of that stamp adore men of his."

"Oh, Herbert is not bad."

"Not at all. But weak. A weak Adonis. Men of that order always have the best love lavished upon them." Mrs. Percy paused a moment. Then she raised her eyes to Reginald's. "She looks like Eleanor," she added in a gentle tone.

She saw that he changed colour. "How that memory lives with him!" she thought. She alone knew this man as he was. She alone had known closely the dead girl who had been the dream of his young manhood. When people spoke of Reginald as a Lothario she would remark quietly: "Let us not judge too much from the surface."

"She looks like Eleanor."

Those few words of Mrs. Percy had been persistently in Reginald Mansfield's mind as Herbert Latimer had come to him a few days later with his grievance. They were in his mind as he rang the bell of the young man's house.

Like Eleanor! Was it true? For an instant, as he waited in the wide, dim drawing-room, he wished that he had not come. Then a curtain was raised and dropped again. A slight, girlish figure in a straight, flowing dress advanced. Mrs. Latimer put out her hand.

"You are a good friend of my husband. I have heard of you often; I'm very glad to see you," she said.

But Reginald Mansfield stood for an instant as one bereft of sense. Mrs. Percy was right. Here was the same rare Madonna type of beauty, the same low, broad brow, the same pathetic mouth, the same expression of the violet eyes—his heart beat fast with the sudden ache that he had so often hoped was stilled.

"Are you not well?" asked Lena Latimer, startled. He had already recovered himself, with an effort.

"You will think me absurd," he said lightly. "But you look strangely like—someone I used to know."

. . . . . .

It was a hot, cloudy morning at the end of August. Herbert Latimer stood in the morning-room of Mrs. Percy's Mayfair house, and words, the enormity of which prevented him as it were from seizing their full import, words which made his brain reel, which had accompanied his arrival, fell upon his ringing ears.

"Reginald? Reginald Mansfield, Lena?" he repeated, twice, thrice, and his hand went up to his forehead.

Mrs. Percy tapped her fingers with her fan.

"Well, my dear boy—allow me to call you so, since I have known you always—what is so singular in what I tell you? I have known Reginald always, too, and I know there is no harm in your pretty wife. But, what would you have? You do not expect such a young beauty as that to remain always the unsophisticated rustic maiden that she was when you married her?

"Had you been an exceptionally devoted husband—mind, I don't blame you; you must be men, especially in what outsiders call our 'set'—you might have kept the same adoration that she gave you at first. But you must acknowledge that you went your way a little. Well, what is the result? Lena, too, has emancipated herself in your absence. She has become fin de siècle—like the other young married women with whom she is thrown in contact in our society."

The blood mounted to Herbert Latimer's forehead in a purple flush.

"Never, Mrs. Percy! I shall never believe——"

"I don't mean any harm. Did I not tell you that I believed Lena a perfectly good woman? But Reginald Mansfield is a fascinating man and Lena is a very lovely creature, and they have happened to be much thrown together this summer and a little flirtation has sprung up. Is that anything new for people in the swim?"

"A little flirtation?" Herbert said the words after her, with a short laugh, not pleasant to hear. The flush had died out of his face. Lines which had not been there a half-hour before had come about his mouth and eyes. Mrs. Percy's steady glances never left him. "Oh, of course, perfectly harmless," he went on. "And that Lena should go off on the yacht with the Wentworths, and that Reginald Mansfield should go with them also, and Mrs. Wentworth's reputation for strictness what it is—that is perfectly proper, too!"

"Hold! hold! Don't exaggerate. Mrs. Wentworth may be frivolous—again, my dear boy, is she not in the swim? and must not young married women amuse themselves? There! but she is a good woman, for all that. I see nothing shocking in this yachting party."

"No. And probably, Mrs. Percy, you see nothing shocking in Lena leaving London yesterday to 'amuse' herself, as you say, on the very afternoon that she knew I would arrive?"

Mrs. Percy shrugged her shoulders. Her visitor had turned towards the door.

"Where is the yacht likely to be now? I take it that you are informed, Mrs. Percy."

"I believe it is to be at Cowes to-morrow, or the day after. You are not going?"

But he had vanished.

One moment the old lady stood musing; and her teeth, white and fine still, showed in the peculiar smile that parted her lips.

"What will the outcome be?" she murmured. "And then—Alas, what fools, what astonishing fools, men can be, at times, to be sure!"

. . . . . .

A mist had come up and lay, an impenetrable veil, over the sea. The rocks were moist with it as if with spray. In the prevailing neutrality of the atmosphere's tints a woman's yachting dress of blue and red made a warm, picturesque spot, blurred and deep, in the foggy perspective. A man, stalking along with swift strides, caught a sudden vision of this dash of colour, and of the slender, well-known frame it clothed at an abrupt terminus of the rocky walk. It was Lena, and she was not alone. A man walked by her side too, whom he (Herbert) could have no difficulty in recognising. The tall, loosely built, nonchalant figure was that of Reginald Mansfield.

The two had stopped now. Their backs were turned. But, sharpened to abnormal acuteness, Herbert's senses could divine, as it were, their mental attitude at the moment, betrayed in the pose of their vague, dark silhouettes. Lena, her head bent away from her companion, seemed to be looking out to sea, and, as Herbert advanced rapidly nearer, something listless, dejected, became more clear in the droop of her shoulders. But Reginald Mansfield looked not at the sea, but at her. He stood near her, so near that his hand could touch her elbow. The blood surged up in Herbert's heart, and at that instant the two faced about to retrace their steps and saw him advancing.

"Herbert, dear You here?"

Lena was the first to speak. She had turned from white to red and back to white. A suppressed trembling had seized her. But her voice was clear and steady.

"Herbert, dear! You here? How did you know where the yacht would be to-day? I thought of you as being in London. Who told you where we were?"

Herbert's white, dry lips framed two words shortly:

"Mrs. Percy."

Reginald Mansfield raised his eyebrows.

"Ah, yes. To be sure, she would know. You had a jolly summer, I suppose, Latimer?" Calmly he met the glare of Herbert Latimer's eyes.

But Mrs. Latimer, laughing nervously, had touched her husband's sleeve. She turned her glance to Reginald Mansfield, and there was something like a wild repressed appeal in it. Did he read its meaning aright? He took off his hat.

"Will you permit me to withdraw, Mrs. Latimer? I am sure that after your separation your husband's companionship must be the only one acceptable."

He nodded to Herbert, but received no look from the latter in return.

The next instant husband and wife were alone, and then the floodgates of Herbert Latimer's jealous rage and indignation were opened. Lena stood silent, with downcast eyes, as the hot words poured over her. She was, then, he asked, like every other woman? The great trust he had had in her truth, believing it so perfect that not even the shadow of a frivolous flirtation could touch it, was, then, proved to be unfounded? He had, perhaps, not been a model husband himself. He acknowledged it.

He had been in the wrong. He had gone after his own pleasures. He had seemed to neglect her. He had, in fact, neglected her. He had the misfortune of having been bred among people who looked upon such things as legitimate. But, through all, he had always felt that, faulty as he might be, that she was unassailable. Mrs. Percy, however, had told him all that had been going on through the summer. And a flirtation with Reginald Mansfield, of all men! A flirtation with his own friend!

In intolerable despair he talked on. And then he stopped. What more was there to say? Sharply he turned from her.

Was he going from her? She raised her head, she watched him as he walked away, blindly, as one who is stunned.

"Herbert!" she suddenly cried out, with a rapturous note of joy and love. She ran after him, she clung to him, all her sweet Madonna face was covered with tears and smiles. "Herbert! Beloved! beloved! It was only to test you, only to teach you, by your own pain, what mine had been! Truly, truly, I have given no thought to Mr. Mansfield save such thought as one gives a good, good friend. He has seemed very 'attentive,' as the world speaks of such things, but he has been only kind, oh, so kind! You see I look like—like some one he loved once, and so he was my friend from the first. He saw how miserable I was, dear, about your going on the Continent, about your seeming indifference—for, indeed, I thought you cared nothing for me any more! Oh, was I not foolish? Do I not see now, in your eyes; do I not feel by the clasp of your arms, how much you loved me in truth?

"But I was wretched, and Mr. Mansfield discovered it, and because he felt as a friend to me he thought of this plan. He and Mrs. Percy. She, too, has been, oh, so good to me. Together they combined it all. She was to see you and tell you when you arrived, and I was to go off with the Wentworths.

on the yacht, and with Mr. Mansfield. It was all to keep up the appearance of the comedy we were playing! And it was to have been kept up much longer; I was not to divulge the truth to you until you were well tried. But I cannot, cannot play this farce another moment when I love you so! I see and feel that you so love me!"

She was weeping, now, in his arms. Tightly clasped Herbert held her. When, at length, she looked up, his face was changed—graver, colder, firmer than she had seen it.

"Yes, dear Lena, the comedy was played long enough, child, long enough. The lesson has been well learned. It has been taken to heart."

. . . . . .

Two weeks later Reginald Mansfield returned to town. In the evening he went to Mrs. Percy's. The old lady greeted him with an exclamation:

"Where have you been all this time? In hiding? In every manner I have tried to get news of your whereabouts. And not only I, but Lena, and Herbert Latimer himself. I think the latter wants to thank you, honestly, for bringing him to his senses. He has already thanked me. Never was a conspiracy crowned with more admirable success. They are turtle doves now—turtle doves! Herbert will remain to the end, I believe, a model mate; and as for Lena, she is supremely, completely blissful. You have done a good work, my dear fellow."

She paused, and then something caused her to regard him more attentively.

"Turn your face to the lamp," she said, brusquely. Off his guard, he did so. Thereupon Mrs. Percy gave a low expostulatory cry.

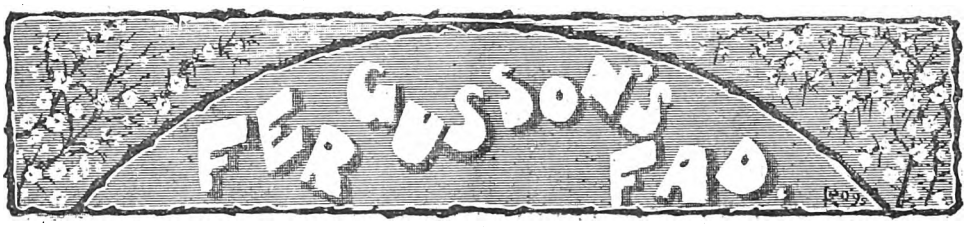
"Reginald!—that is not why you have been in hiding, is it?—not truly this, boy?"

At the tone of deep, interested sympathy Reginald covered his face with his hands. After an interval he raised his head.

"Yes," he said slowly. "I am afraid it is so. I care for her. She is another man's wife and it has an ugly sound. But the feeling I have for her could not stain a flower. I thought it was only friendly interest at first, because she was so like——. But she was too like! It was playing with fire. I have been suspecting my real feeling some time. I knew it when Herbert came back, and by the look in his eyes I realised how much he cared for her and that they would be reconciled." He got up. "Well, I shall have to live it down, as I did the other."

Mrs. Percy held his hand a moment. Her eyes were moist.

"My poor boy!" she said. "They are happy. But you——."



"AND this is what you call a 'kind criticism,'" cried Mrs. Flora Forester, with tears in her sweet blue eyes.

Linwood stared at the newspaper with a mortified frown. "It's too bad," he said. He liked Mrs. Forester, and pitied her; they were excellent friends. He thought her latest novel of London society a very breezy and artistic performance. He belonged to the staff of the Daily Umpire, and he had given the book to their "literary man," Fergusson, and asked him to write kindly about it. Fergusson, who was not more than three and thirty, and desired undisputed sway in his own limited realm of book reviewing, had sniffed a little at this request. But he had promised to look into the novel and see what he could do, and Linwood had expected of him something at least fairly civil.

"I hadn't seen to-day's book-column before," he said to Mrs. Forester, with ill-concealed disgust. "But one never knows what Fergusson will do with a book. Luckily this is only a small paragraph."

"Into which," sighed Mrs. Forester, "are condensed five distinct sneers."

"The truth is, that Fergusson belongs to that class of critics who despise the society novel, or English novels at all. The French, and the Spanish, and the Russians—especially the Russians—are their delight. Fergusson has lately been bitten by that craze. Upon my word," pursued Linwood, laughing a little, "he's at heart the nicest young fellow in the world. But he has somehow got himself into the queerest condition. If he sees Mayfair or Piccadilly in a book, he always feels like either shutting it up or reviling it."

Mrs. Forester bit her lip musingly. "M—yes. I understand," she replied. And then she smiled a little oddly, in her gentle, wise way. "I know something of Russia. I lived in St. Petersburg for two years; my late husband, you know, held a diplomatic place there. It often strikes me that these passionate Transatlantic admirers of Tolstoi, and Tourgénieff, and several other famous Russian writers, can scarcely grasp the 'realism' they belaud. Really, being so ignorant of actual Russian life, I cannot quite see how they are able at all to verify it."

Linwood gave an amused chuckle. "Neither can I! You actually know the Russians' language, don't you, apart from your familiarity with many of their native and distinctive customs?"

"Oh, yes," she smiled. "But I speak Russian very poorly."

The next day when Linwood saw Fergusson at the office of the Umpire, he said, in his dreamy and lazy way: "Oh, by-the-bye, you didn't give poor Mrs. Forester's book much of a send off, Jack, did you?"

Fergusson looked up from his desk. He was reading a translation of one of Valdès's novels. He didn't know Spanish at all well; he had never been in Spain; he had already made up his mind to praise this novel copiously for its marvellous truthfulness to life. And by "life" the life of modern Spain must here inevitably be meant.

"No, Robert," he said. "A reviewer should be conscientious, you know, or nothing. Frankly, I thought your friend's view of society at the present time a curiously—ahem—feverish and—er—unauthentic one."

"I see," said Linwood drily. "Mrs. Forester goes about a good deal here, now that she's left off her widow's mourning."

"Oh, indeed!" Fergusson's eyes were busy again with the pages of his translated Spanish novel. "It—er—seems to me that I have heard somehow, somewhere, that she is a good deal sought after nowadays."

"No; not 'sought after' in any marked sense. She receives cards to a good many nice places, however, and often goes to them. Her observations, I mean, are usually first hand."

"Oh, yes! Quite so."

"Have you been much into society lately?" Linwood innocently went on.

"I?" Here Fergusson started, and then shrugged his shoulders. "I'm in mourning for my father, you know."

Digitized by Google

"Yes; you've been in mourning ever since you took this place on the Umpire, haven't you? That was about four months ago, and previously, my dear Jack, you were on the Continent for three years. I remember that you went abroad just after we both took our degrees at Oxford."

Linwood delivered this parting shot very mildly. He always did everything mildly. You could have sworn that of him, after a glance at his placid, clean-shaven lips and his large grey, reposeful eyes.

But he would speak quiet words, now and then, that had the cuts of knives in them. To a fellow-editor whom he liked (a shaggy bearded man named Fosdick, who wrote poignant financial and social articles that often struck the public tellingly, and helped to sell the paper), he soon made certain remarks which roused a vigorous laugh.

"Why, my dear Robert," exclaimed Fosdick, trying to smooth that recalcitrant beard of his whose amber tangles needed for such purpose nothing short of a stringent and uncompromising comb—"why, my dear Robert, I'd love to fool Jack Fergusson in some such way! He deserves it for his ridiculous carping at modern story-tellers."

Linwood stroked his beardless chin with one meditative hand. "If I wrote the thing we could manage to bring it out cheaply, with our 'printing' pull, and all that. Only a few copies, you know, need be got out at first, and we could put as an imprimatur the 'Waverley Publishing Company,' or 'The Dorchester Press,' or something imposing and mystifying. There's a good deal of that sort of thing done nowadays, you know, in the way of a send-off for current fiction."

"Yes, quite right. We could manage the hoax dirt cheap, as soon as you have got it ready."

One day, several weeks later, Linwood paused at the side of Fergusson, where he sat before a book-piled desk. He was deep in an Italian translation of a novelist who holds high rank, just now, throughout the famed and historic peninsula. "Busy, Jack?" Linwood drawled.

"Oh, no," said Fergusson, "not particularly. I was only finishing this lovely story. Ah, how these fellows understand the full meaning of life, Robert!"

"Yes; no doubt. I don't read much fiction, at present. I wish I had more time for it. By the way, here's a small novel by a great friend of Tourgénieff's. You see it isn't very handsomely printed, though, after all, the get-up is fairly decent."

"Yes; yes."

Fergusson spoke somewhat eagerly. He had abandoned his Italian tale, and was turning over the pages of the paper-covered book which Linwood had laid before him.

"A great friend of Tourgénieff's?" he murmured. "I've never heard of any Russian author named Vladimir Karanoff. Ah! here is a preface. Explanatory, I suppose?"

"And yet quite short," said Linwood, "like the story itself. The unhappy young man died in his twenty-eighth year—shot as a Nihilist, though the accusation against him was afterwards found to be a false one. The inscription on his tomb, written by his famous friend, is given there in the preface. I think it is not translated. Is it?"

"No."

"Mrs Forester can tell you what it means. She put it all into English."

"Mrs. Forester?" queried Fergusson, raising his eyes. "The lady whose book——"

"You 'slated.' Oh, yes; but she's got over that long ago, especially as her novel went so well with the public. You know you promised, Jack, that I should take you to one of her 'At Homes.'"

"Mrs. Forester did the whole thing then?" said Fergusson, turning over the pages of the book, and letting his eye leap along the lines, in the way of the professional critic.

"She's the translator—yes, as I just told you."

"It contains a good many Russian words, I perceive."

"She thought those at least partially untranslatable," said Linwood with splendid gravity. "When you personally meet her she will no doubt define for you their true meaning as well as lies in her power."

And this, about a week later, Mrs. Forester did. Meanwhile Fergusson (who had a good deal of work distracting and pressing upon him, as happens with most modern newspaper critics) had written a column and a half in the Umpire on Vladimir Karanoff's novel. He had praised it for its "appealing pathos," its "fine dignity of intellectualism," but most of all he had applauded its "astonishing realistic fidelity."

The particular Wednesday they selected for the promised visit happened to be an extremely rainy one. Linwood and Fergusson were Mrs. Forester's only guests. The lady was very gracious, and for some time talked of the weather and of the latest pleasing play. At length she lifted from a near table a copy of Vladimir Karanoff's book. Then she thanked Fergusson, briefly, yet sweetly, for his goodness in having given it so genial a review. After that she handed him with a winning grace a certain evening newspaper.

"Pray read this horrid letter in the last number of the Sentinel, Mr. Fergusson. How unkind to print it from their angry correspondent. Don't you think so?"

Fergusson cast his eye on the column to which her delicate finger pointed. Linwood rose and slipped into the shadow at the further end of the room.

Presently Fergusson's face grew livid. The paper dropped from his hands. As he stared at Mrs. Forester, she said, in her dulcet voice, with her graceful head leaned a little sideways and the open novel in her hand:

"You see, Mr. Fergusson, you have made a mistake. There is no such person as Vladimir Karanoff. And you took those Russian words quite for granted, you know. For instance, when 'Liza's robes diffused, as she moved, a faint fragrance of, et cetera,' the word which follows is the Russian word for onion."

"Good heavens!" broke from Fergusson.

"And here, on page 10, when the gentle Katrina stirs the contents of her cup, at breakfast time, in sombre reverie, it—er—isn't coffee she's drinking; it's raw rum."

"Ugh!" broke from Fergusson.

"And on page 19, when you think Dimitoi gets into his carriage, what he does really get into is a washtub, drawn by donkeys. And on page 21, if you will permit me——"

But Mr. Fergusson had rushed from the drawing-room of Mrs. Forester. That night he scarcely slept a wink, and appeared haggard next morning at the office of the Umpire.

Linwood greeted him with a dreamy smile. "How you darted away yesterday afternoon, Jack! I hope you didn't find Mrs. Forester an unpleasant hostess."

"Oh, come, Bob Linwood," shot from the tortured young man. "I should say this joke had gone far enough."

The quizzical twinkle in Linwood's eyes faded. "Do you mean your joke about posing as so mighty an admirer of writers whose countries and the manners and customs of whose people you know almost nothing? Do you mean the joke of trying to strangle and crush every honest literary effort made by your own countryfolk? Because, if you do, Jack, I quite agree with you that such joke has gone far enough."

"I'm glad," fumed Fergusson, "that you like a woman of Mrs. Forester's kind! A woman who would stoop to such deceit, such treachery, such——"

"An extremely clever process of boxing your ears, my boy, and pulling your nose. . . . And, besides," Linwood went on in his cool, listless way, "please oblige me by not insulting Mrs. Forester any more than you can help, for I have to ask for your congratulation on our engagement."

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO
PRICE SIXPENCE.

The first part of this new art album will be published on Wednesday, March 13th. It will contain photographs of every branch of British sport. This number consists of about fifty photos of football players and cyclists, hockey and polo players, the Australian cricketers and Her Majesty's buckhounds, golf players and famous dogs, race horses and royal yachts, skaters and scullers, and many others.

Each picture is accompanied by a careful biography or description, and, indeed, the whole work is the finest production lovers of sport have ever had placed before them

MR. STEPHEN PRIDDY.

MR. WALTER MIDDLETON sat in portly grandeur, gazing forth upon the neat little garden of his suburban villa. He was one of those regular City men who, as Dickens observed, can be said to have no recreation beyond his dinner, if it is not his garden.

Mr. Middleton fulfilled the type to a nicety; he never sullied his own bejeweled hands with the soil of his tastefully arranged half-acre, yet his shrubs were quite a personal matter, and had he by some wonderful feat of horticulture practically created fresh species of flowers, he could not have been more sensitive upon the subject than of the little inoffensive pansies and primroses which bloomed in the large central bed.

But then, to be sure, Mr. Walter Middleton was sprung from a nation which more than two centuries before had been convulsed by an almost incredible tulip mania.

Mr. Middleton had dined. Business had been pretty good, and the bulls, of which large, hornless herd he was a mild specimen, had succeeded beyond expectation in their speculative dabblings. He was, therefore, in a more than usually complacent mood. The sun was setting, and the motionless shrubs and bushes threw their elongated shadows upon the close-cropped grass.

Mr. Middleton's wife and daughter had gone to the theatre, and the City man had been dining alone. He was lazily following with his half-closed eyes the wreaths of cigar smoke which floated out through the open French window, when a rap fell upon the door of the room.

"Come in," said Mr. Middleton, still following the dissolving smoke with his sleepy gaze.

A maid-servant entered.

"If you please, sir, there's a person out in the passage as would like to speak to you in private; and please, sir, he says it's very perticular."

"What do you call a person?" inquired Mr. Middleton with dignity.

"A man, sir, with rather a dirty face, and dressed in nasty old clothes."

"Ah! some beggar, I suppose. Well, tell him I'm engaged."

The girl disappeared, but a moment later returned.

"Please, sir, he says it would be a matter of much regret to you if you was to refuse to see him. I don't think he's a beggar, sir; he don't talk like one."

Mr. Middleton reflected for a moment with a stolid expression upon his imperturbable countenance.

"Show him in here," said he. "Never mind about clearing away the cloth."

A moment later the man entered. He was a tall, seedy-looking individual, with hollow cheeks, ill-kempt hair, dressed in a rusty brown suit, holding a battered beaver hat in one hand and dangling a solitary glove between the finger and thumb of the other. Mr. Middleton propped himself up on his elbows whilst he gazed at his visitor for a moment, then, with a little grunt, let his ponderous form sink back into the luxurious arm-chair in which he was sitting.

The man advanced with a smirk upon his grimy countenance furtively gazing at the dessert upon the table. He had to come quite close to the City man before he could see his face, for that gentleman sat right in front of the French window, staring straight ahead of him, and studying the topography of his garden by the twilight.

"You are the owner of this house, sir, I believe?" said the seedy-looking man, stuffing his one glove into his trousers-pocket.

Mr. Middleton looked at him with a phlegmatic stare of indignation, and said in his deep voice:

"What right have you to ask——"

The seedy man waved his hand.

"Oh!" cried he, "I beg you will not question my right, Mr. Middleton. I think I shall soon establish that to your satisfaction. I am not asking questions from curiosity. Is this your house, sir?"

The fat City man twisted himself into a less comfortable attitude—a sure sign of uneasiness.

"Well, yes," said he, inspecting the ash of his cigar; "if you must know, this is my house. What then, sir?"

"You tell me it is your absolute property?" said the seedy man, setting his hat down upon the floor and fumbling in his waistcoat pocket. "And the garden?"

"Ah! my garden! What the dickens can you want to know that for?"

"You will very soon find out, sir," said the man, who was a very cool kind of customer, producing a piece of pasteboard as he spoke, and thrusting it into the City man's hand. "That is my name, sir," and he bowed whilst Mr. Middleton gazed at the card.

"Mr. Stephen Priddy," he muttered.

That was all; there was no address.

"Now come, Mr. Middleton," said Mr. Priddy, helping himself to a chair, and drawing it very close to the other's arm-chair, "I may as well at once inform you that I am here on important business, and furthermore that this important business will be greatly to your advantage."

Mr. Middleton expelled a great cloud of smoke into his visitor's face, and in his deep voice said:

"Well!"

"Do you know who lived in this house twenty years ago?" continued Mr. Priddy, waving off the bluish wreaths with his hand.

The City man slowly shook his head.

"Very well, sir; I do. Never mind names just at present. Let it suffice for me to tell you that she was an old lady—a connection of mine—and that she was very rich."

The seedy man uttered these last words very emphatically, staring hard meanwhile at Mr. Middleton. That stolid worthy merely again ejaculated, "Well!"

"This is your property now," cried Mr. Priddy, with a sudden air of earnestness, "and, therefore, any treasure"—he paused a moment, then continued—"any treasure that might be hidden upon it must be also yours."

For the first time since the seedy man's entrance Mr. Middleton regarded him with attention. He twisted quite round in his chair in order to obtain a good view of him, and after regarding him for at least two minutes in silence, said:

"What do you mean?"

Mr. Priddy rose and stepped to the French window.

"That garden," said he, pointing; "you have little idea what is concealed beneath the surface of it, sir, in the particular spot upon which my eye is at this moment resting. Briefly, I will tell you the story. Twenty years ago a lady lived here. She was a very nervous old body, and there came the news one evening as I was sitting with her that the house next door had been robbed. That very day she had drawn a very large sum of money out of the bank, and this report of burglars scared her horribly.

"You know what old ladies are, sir. She fancied the mere having of so much money in the house would attract thieves as cheese attracts mice. She became so nervous that she declared that she could not go to bed with all that gold in the safe downstairs. I was staying with her, for, as I have said, she was a connection of mine; and merely by way of pacifying the poor old soul I suggested burying the gold in the garden for the night. She jumped at the idea, and begged me to carry it out. Accordingly, I produced an empty box, placed the bag of money in it, dug a hole in the soil, and hid it. The old lady then went calmly to bed, but when next morning came she was discovered dead—stone dead, sir. Heart disease, the doctors called it. Well, this was a pretty considerable shock to me, as you may suppose, and drove all recollection of the buried money clean out of my head for the time being. All the relatives came flocking into the house like so many carrion, Mr. Middleton."

The seedy man tried to infuse an expression of disgust into his voice, and paused whilst he stared into the stolid and attentive countenance of the City gentleman.

"Well, sir," he continued, "it happened, owing to circumstances which I cannot very precisely recall now, it being, as you see, twenty years ago since the thing happened, that I was obliged to leave this house on the day following the decease of my old lady relative. I went away, still forgetting all about the money that I had buried. I am not going to detain you, sir, by an account of how I have been knocking about the world ever since," and here Mr. Priddy glanced over his seedy person. "My motive in calling this evening is just to inform you that the money still lies hidden where I buried it with my own hands twenty years ago. It is yours now, sir, alas! this old house is, too;" and the dirty-faced man threw what was intended to be a pathetic glance round the room, his eyes lingering long upon the dinner table.

"Why," said Mr. Middleton, an expression of perplexity coming into his stolid countenance, "I don't know what to say. How do I know you are not a swindler, for instance?" and Mr. Middleton tried to force a very knowing scowl.

"Oh, as to that," replied Mr. Priddy, with a superior smile, "give me a shovel and I will reassure you at once!"

"Good!" replied the City gentleman, rising. "There is still light to see by. Lead the way, sir."

"Hold! The bargain!" said the seedy man, picking up his hat and halting upon the threshold. "If the money is there, I take half. Is that fair?"

"It will be quite fair if the money is there," said Mr. Middleton, incredulously, stepping on to the lawn, and grasping the polished handle of a spade which leaned against the verandah.

Mr. Priddy took the shovel, and, carrying it in his hand, walked straight to the large, oval plot in the middle of the grass, pausing to gaze about him when he arrived on the edge of it as though to get his correct bearings. Mr. Middleton followed, forgetful even of his favourite flowers in the curiosity that was slowly over-mastering the sluggishness of his intellect.

Mr. Priddy then fell to digging. The earth was moist, and the large brown sods were easily turned. The seedy man worked hard, his shovel struck with rapid blows into the ground, and the scattered soil pattered like hail upon glass. Mr. Middleton, regardless of the flying mould, drew to the edge of the plot, and stood staring with expectant gaze down into the slowly deepening hole.

Suddenly the blade of the shovel smote something hard, and there was a slight sound of the splintering of wood. Mr. Priddy redoubled his efforts without a word; Mr. Middleton gave a deep "Ah!" In another moment a small, square box was disclosed to view, the wood of it discoloured almost to the hue of the clay soil which still adhered in lumps to it. Mr. Priddy stooped and raised it; then, holding it between his knees, he fell, all very deliberately, to replacing the mould in the hole.

"For goodness sake!" cried Mr. Middleton, fairly overcome with excitement, "let us go into the house and divide. Never mind the hole. The money, man—the money!"

"As you please, sir," said the seedy-looking individual coolly; and, throwing the shovel down upon the grass, he led the way back into the dining-room.

The City man, with a trembling hand, lighted the gas. Mr. Priddy took up the doormat, and very carefully deposited the befouled box upon it. The shovel had shattered the fragile lid, and with the aid of a carving-knife he speedily prised open the splintered fragments. Then, putting in his hand, he drew forth a small, red canvas bag, nearly round in shape, and tightly bound with a cord at the mouth.

"Cut it!" cried the portly City gentleman, thrusting a knife into Mr. Priddy's hand, when that worthy had been calmly trying to undo the knot for about three minutes.

"I trust you are no longer inclined to question the motive of my visit?" said the seedy man, passing the keen blade through the string.

"Oh, hang it, no! There, open it, do! Ah!"

A large heap of glittering gold rolled out upon the snowy tablecloth as Mr. Priddy turned the canvas bag upside down. Both men stood regarding it for a moment in silence, then Mr. Priddy fell to counting.

"Ah, that's right," said Mr. Middleton. "See how much we have here."

"One hundred pounds!" announced Mr. Priddy, after a long interval of silence.

"My friend, you have behaved like a true gentleman. The money was all within your grasp, yet you chose to say, 'No! it belongs to the owner of the house!' Give me your hand, Mr. Priddy."

They shook in silence.

"And now let us divide," continued the City man.

"Stay! One little favour, Mr. Middleton. Fifty pounds in gold is no light weight to lug to the other end of London. Would you give me paper for the amount—your cheque or notes?"

"With pleasure," replied Mr. Middleton, and going to a desk he unlocked it, drew forth a cheque-book, and, filling in a cheque for the amount, handed it to the seedy man, who, with the greatest sang-froid imaginable, placed it in the breast-pocket of his shabby jacket.

The two men sat awhile smoking and chatting, and then Mr. Priddy took his leave and departed.

. . . . . .

Half-an-hour later a vague suspicion slowly formed in Mr. Middleton's saturnine mind. He rose and went to his desk from which he laboriously drew forth the red canvas bag containing the windfall. This he emptied on the floor, and taking coins from the heap at random, he sounded them upon the table. They all fell dead as lead.

"THE TENTH OF JUNE"

is the title of the new serial tale which will commence in the next number of SHORT STORIES. The author, Mr. John K. Leys, asserts that, in point of interest and exciting incident, this, his most recent production, entirely eclipses all his previous romances, a statement which those readers of SHORT STORIES who are wise enough to follow the story from week to week will enthusiastically bear out.

Broadly speaking, the plot deals with the adventures of Geoffrey Dundas and others living in England in their attempts to avoid assassination by certain Hindoos who are under oath to wipe from the face of the earth all those Englishmen and their offspring concerned in an act of indignity against some Indian gods, perpetrated during the Indian Mutiny, on the tenth of June, 1853.

It treats of the extreme measures to which the hero and his friends concerned have to go in order to insure their safety each tenth of June, and with the narrow escapes and hand-to-hand fights necessarily resulting from the attempted assassinations. The marvellous manner in which the Hindoos contrive to live in the very heart of the metropolis, and in the most open parts of the country, without exciting suspicion, and always avoiding capture, is not the least interesting feature of the story. Their native craft and subtle cunning is evinced in all their actions, and is pitted against the cool judgment and courage of the young Englishman.

The story throughout will be embellished with striking and powerful illustrations by Mr. Raymond Potter, whose ability in this direction is already known to the readers of Pearson's Library and Pearson's Weekly.

CHAPTER LIII.

Wolves at Bay.

Three days after the meeting of the Directors of the Syndicate at Sir Harry's house in Grosvenor Place, soon after eight o'clock on a lovely summer morning, the news ran like wildfire through London that a large fleet of air-ships flying the Union Jack and another flag, on which were emblazoned in gold and white background two winged hands grasping each other, had dropped to the ground in the middle of Hyde Park.

Almost immediately ever-growing streams of people began to move towards the Park. Omnibuses full of men going to the City converged instead towards the Marble Arch and Hyde Park Corner, and there were promptly emptied by common consent. Business for the present was left to take care of itself, for rapidly succeeding rumours filled the air, and it soon became known that the much-abused and misunderstood Aerial Navigation Syndicate had been quietly and skilfully working for the best all the time, and had at last emerged from its secrecy and retirement with a fleet of air-ships powerful enough to meet the still dreaded Anarchists in their own element, and hunt them from the skies in which they had too long reigned supreme.

What the immediate destination of the fleet was no one knew, and no one seemed to care much to know. Everyone was satisfied for the time being to see the aerial cruisers there, resting quietly on British soil and flying the British flag. The Chairman and Directors of the Syndicate made, perforce, a triumphal progress through the cheering throngs that lined the way from Grosvenor Place to where the air-ships were lying, guarded by a strong body of police and lancers, and when at last at the firing of a gun the whole fleet of twenty-eight vessels rose at the same instant from the ground and soared away up into the blue cloudless sky, it was followed by such a roaring cheer of delighted enthusiasm as London had never heard before.

The Union Jack and another flag

At a height of a thousand feet the fleet separated into two squadrons, led by the War-Hawk and the Volante, and then, with a parting salvo of aerial artillery, they sped away to the southward, and in a few minutes were lost to the admiring gaze of the almost frantically delighted populace.

A flight of five hours brought them in sight of the Central Cantabrian chain crowned by the rocky summit of Mount Pietra. Signals were now flown from the two flagships, and the two squadrons separated, the one flying to the westward and the other to the eastward, and rising in long upward curves until a height of ten thousand feet had been reached. Then they converged again, with the mountain between them.

A few minutes later those on watch in their conning-towers could distinctly make out with their glasses the dark oval of the gorge to the north of the peak in which Berthauld had told the leaders of the expedition they would find the Camp of the Outlaws of the Air. That his information had been accurate and faithfully given very soon became manifest, for at the moment of their arrival over the gorge five air-ships rose out of it and attempted to scatter and escape underneath them, but before they had flown a thousand yards a converging hail of shells and Maxim bullets was rained down upon them from every ship in the two squadrons.

Three blew up and vanished in a brilliant outburst of flame, and with a shock that shook the atmosphere, and the other two, riddled and crippled, dropped to the earth like birds stricken on the wing, and were dashed to fragments on the rocks beneath. Then the squadrons halted, poised over the gorge, at the bottom of which about a score more air-ships could be seen resting. They waited for a good ten minutes, but not one of these made an attempt to rise.

"Those fellows are helpless," said Mr. Maxim, who was standing in the conning-tower of the Volante with Adams. "They've got no fuel and they can't rise. You may depend upon it that all the fuel they had left they put into those five ships we've sent to glory. That was their forlorn hope, and they've been fools enough to let us catch them like rats in a trap."

"Yes," said Adams, "I suppose that's it. They had no idea that anyone knew anything about this place, and really if it hadn't been for Berthauld we might have hunted the world over for years before we'd found it. Well, we must clear them out of there now we have got them, but we mustn't destroy those ships, they are too useful for that, and they are worth a fight to get hold of."

More signals were then exchanged between the flag-ships and the squadrons, and presently the War-Hawk and the Volante, each accompanied by three ships, sank slowly down towards the gorge, while the remainder kept guard in two great semicircles above. When they were on a level with the encircling rocks, the six ships ranged themselves three on either side, commanding the whole of the valley with their shell guns and Maxims, while the War Hawk and the Volante sank down in the centre, and stopped a hundred feet from the ground just ear of their consorts' line of fire.

On one bank of the stream that ran down through the gorge stood an irregular group of between forty and fifty half-starved and woe-begone looking wretches, the last remnant of the lately terrible Outlaws of the Air. Mr. Maxim had been correct in his opinion. The five air-ships that had been destroyed had contained all that was left of the motor fuel in the Camp. All the men that they would carry had crowded into them, ruthlessly shooting down those who had disputed the last chance of escape with them, and whose corpses now lay scattered about the space they had risen from.

But the fate of the five ships had apparently utterly demoralised those who were left in the gorge, for when Sir Harry hailed them in French, and asked them whether they preferred surrender or shooting down where they stood, they threw up their unarmed hands, and one of them shouted back:

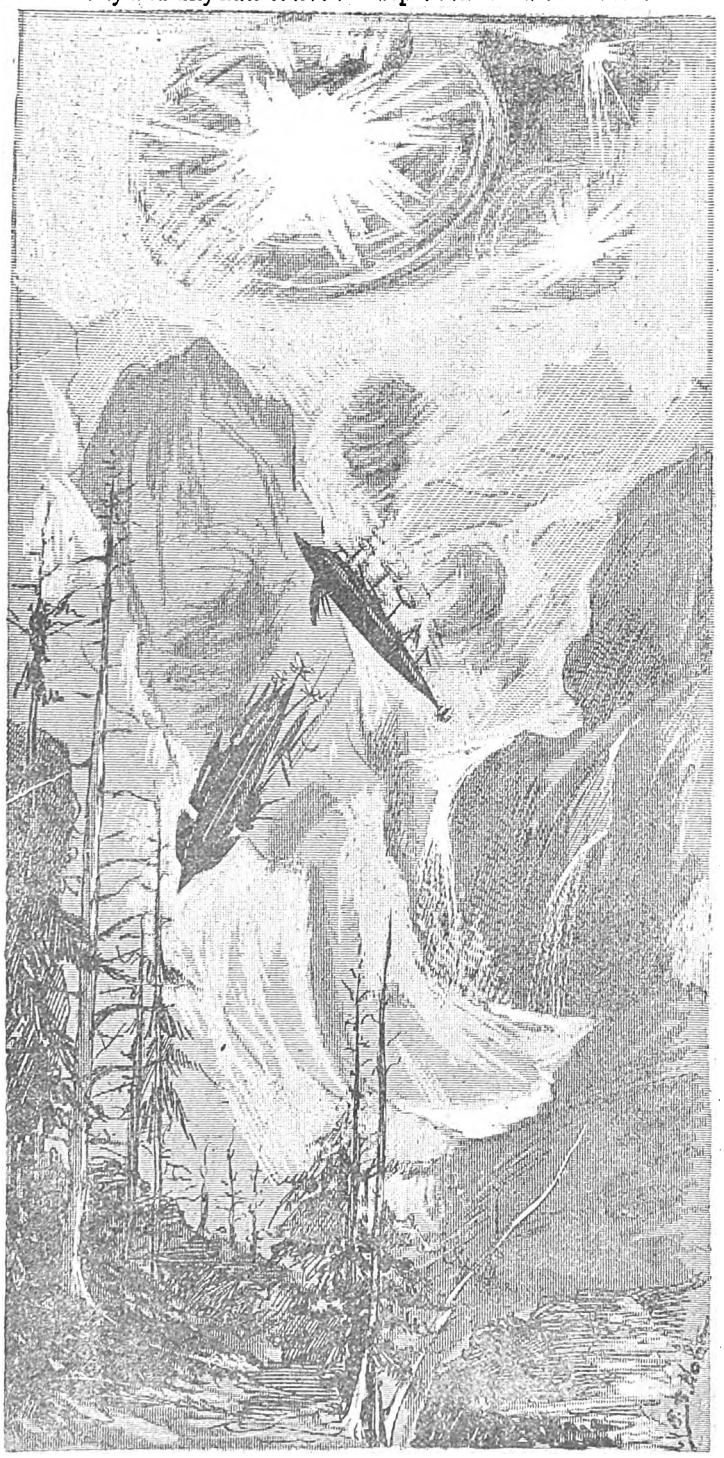
"Yes, we surrender if you will give us our lives."

"I can't promise that," he replied. "All I can promise is a fair trial and English justice."

"Will you promise to take us to England?"

"Yes, if you will surrender quietly, and if there is no treachery. If there is any, not one of you shall escape alive. If a shot is fired, either from those huts or the ships, you shall be shot down where you stand, every man of you. Now put your hands above your heads and keep them there."

Every hand went up as he spoke, and the two air-ships dropped to the ground, one on either side of the group, so keeping the Anarchists between the cross-fire of six Maxims. Three men from each vessel landed, and, taking the Anarchists one by one, bound their arms behind them, the others being compelled to keep their hands up until their turn came.



Dropped to the earth like birds stricken on the wing.

None of them made the slightest resistance, for they had chosen cunningly and well. Resistance meant nothing but certain death; but English justice was an unknown quantity, and might offer more than one loophole of escape to them, as it had done to many others of their evil kind. As a matter of fact, it may as well be said at once that a very clever Old Bailey barrister who was retained for their defence, and actually paid with stolen money, made out the impossibility of identification of the prisoners with those who had committed depredations within the limits of English jurisdiction, that everyone in court, from the judge to the warders, felt certain that a verdict of "Guilty" was almost impossible.

Of course, it was a moral certainty that they had manned the fleet which half destroyed Newcastle, just as it was that they had committed the outrages that had terrorised Europe; but moral certainty is one thing and legal certainty another, and all that the judge in his summing-up could do was to dwell upon the fact that they had been caught in the Anarchist Camp in possession of the air-ships. Berthauld, unhappily, had been employed chiefly on the transport Voyageur, and had not been present at the Newcastle tragedy, so that he was unable to swear positively that the prisoners were there

The case for the prosecution looked very weak when the judge had finished his admirably impartial summing-up; but for once, at least, twelve jurymen declined to be fooled by legal technicalities and forensic trickery. They did not even leave the box; they consulted for two or three minutes, and then the foreman stood up, and, in answer to the charge of the clerk as to whether they found all or any of the prisoners guilty of murder and arson on the high seas or within the limits of the British jurisdiction, he replied, to the relief and delight of every one but the prisoners:

"We find them all guilty.'

And so in due course Justice was done in spite of Law.

While the Anarchists were being secured two other ships landed in the gorge, and a complete search was made of all the huts and air-ships for men or explosives that might have been concealed with a view to treachery. Nothing, however, was found except in the regular magazines of the air-ships, which were nearly full. Hardly any food or drink was found in the camp—a fact which proved that the outlaws had been reduced by the desertion of the Revanche almost to extremity.

The captives were distributed amongst their own ships and those of the Syndicate's squadron, and six hours after the first and only attack had been made, the united fleets, now numbering forty-eight vessels, mounted into the air in two divisions, and within six hours more the remnant of the Outlaws of the Air had been safely lodged in Pentonville Prison under lock and key and a special guard of military and police.

CHAPTER LIV

THE ULTIMATUM

FOR a fortnight the Directors and officers of the Syndicate were busily engaged in refitting the captured vessels with new guns and stores, and getting their new crews accustomed to them and their machinery, which was slightly different to that which propelled their own ships.

This period was signalised by at least two important events. The first was the unexpected appearance at dawn one morning, in Southampton Water, of the Nautilus, which had sailed under sealed orders the day after the success of Dr. Roberts' experiment. Behind her floated, peaceful and harmless at last, the long-dreaded Destroyer, once the terror of the Atlantic, and now the latest addition to the British Navy.

She had been sighted by a North German Lloyd boat chasing a French mail-ship bound for Buenos Ayres, and reported. Lieutenant Wyndham found that his sealed orders were to run her down and sink or capture her, whatever time it took to do so. By a stroke of great good luck he ran across her in three days, a little south of the Transatlantic track. The Destroyer at once gave chase, and the Nautilus went about and ran for it, always keeping just five miles ahead, until at last it dawned upon the pirates that the Destroyer had at last met a vessel faster than herself.

This they knew could be nothing but the terrible Nautilus; and so, after keeping the chase up all day, they doubled at nightfall and ran in the opposite direction. But this was exactly what Wyndham had expected; and the Nautilus, instead of being five miles away, as the pirates thought, was only three-quarters of a mile, so that the moment she turned she was seen in the clear summer night.

"We find them all guilty."

Then the searchlight of the Nautilus flashed out, and, after having wasted nearly half of their rapidly diminishing stock of fuel, as Wyndham had intended they should do, the pursuers became the pursued. Day dawned, and found the remorseless Nautilus still travelling at exactly the same speed as her prey, and exactly four miles astern of her.

All day the chase continued, the two vessels flying through the water at nearly forty knots an hour; but towards evening the speed of the Destroyer began to slacken. The Nautilus slowed down too, always keeping her four-mile distance, until at length the last pound of fuel had been burnt on board the Destroyer and she came to a dead stop.

This happened within about eighty miles of the steamship track between New York and the Channel, and here Wyndham knew he would be certain to pick up a British steamer on patrol duty, so, leaving the helpless Destroyer where she lay, he ran North at full speed, flashing the private signal all the way until it was answered from a British war-ship, which he found to be the Ariadne, a twenty-two knot cruiser on the Atlantic station.

He reported what he had done, gave exact directions as to the position of the Destroyer, and then sped away to mount guard over her until the cruiser arrived. When she at length did so the pirates were given their choice between being blown out of the water or surrender. They replied with a shot from their forty-pounder, which drilled a clean hole through the cruiser's unarmoured bows. Then Wyndham, training one of his guns, dropped a five hundred-pound dynamite cartridge with a time-fuse attached into the water about twenty yards from the Destroyer.

It burst well under the surface, hurling up a gigantic mass of foaming water high into the air, and this, falling back with frightful force, deluged the pirate craft with tons of water and left her helpless and half sinking, with every man on board her either drowned or maimed. The hint proved quite sufficient. The red flag came slowly down at last and a white one took its place. Then the Ariadne lowered her pinnace, and the terror of the Atlantic was ignominiously taken possession of without a struggle, to be towed back to England in triumph by her captor.

The second event was the despatch of the ultimatum of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate to the Tsar of Russia and the President of the French Republic at noon on the day on which the whole fleet was pronounced fit for service. The two copies were delivered simultaneously in Paris and St. Petersburg by air-ships flying flags of truce.

Lost on Green Lake Mountain.

THE two had left the rest of the party, with the guides and burros, at the rude little half-way house by the tiny lake that lay like an oblong emerald in a setting of bronze, and had wandered away by themselves, the brown-bearded young Western mining engineer and she, the delicate-looking visitor from Boston, with her creole hair and eyes.

The benediction of a perfect Indian summer afternoon lay upon the scene. The cloudless sky, so blue that it reminded her of the exquisite colouring of the violets at home; the air so still that even the trembling of the aspen leaves ceased at intervals; the haze about the mountain top like a golden fog. It was an afternoon that made one forget there were ever extremes of temperature, or that the sunbeams must soon sink into the west.

They had sauntered some time, and Madge was tired, for the way had been rough. She did not realise the time nor the distance they had wandered; she only knew that to her the whole thing was a wonderful dream.

Bob's thoughts were different. A perfect Colorado afternoon was not new to him, while his love for Madge was; and his pleasure came from her keen and placid enjoyment. It was no accident on his part that they were separated from the rest, and he realised fully that they had been gone over an hour, and were a long distance from the lake.

His happiness lay in being alone with her, in watching the surprise and pleasure rippling over her face, as new shapes and new landscapes opened upon her, in answering the childlike questions that fell from the dark eyes and pretty lips; and, more than all, in the thrilling touch of the slender arms, and the soft warm hands, as he helped her over the rough places. It was heaven to him, and could not last long enough.

At last she gave a weary sigh, and sat down upon a convenient log as they reached a level stretch, saying, "Oh, dear! I am so tired!"

"I think perhaps we've gone far enough," he responded quickly. "It's getting on in the afternoon, and time to start back."

"Are we very far from them?" she asked suddenly, seeming to realise for the first time that they might be.

"About a mile, I should say; but I really have not kept much track of the distance, and this part of the trail is rather new to me."

After this there was silence for some time. He saw that she was quite exhausted, and it occurred to him that the altitude was having some effect upon her.

He blamed himself inwardly for his thoughtlessness, and was about to ask her if she had trouble in breathing when a sudden chill in the atmosphere, accompanied by a movement of the air that set the aspens shivering violently, followed by a gradual dimming of the sunshine, caused them both to glance towards the sun.

What appeared to Madge like a fog was hurrying across it, and rapidly growing denser; and as she looked up towards the highest point visible in the west she could see the grey, mist-like substance stealing in between the rocks and pines, and sweeping silently down towards them.

He answered her look of interrogation by saying, somewhat absent-mindedly, "Clouds. A change of weather! I might have known that the heat this afternoon meant something, if I hadn't been thinking of——"

He stopped abruptly and coloured; but she had turned, and was absorbed in the curious transformation that was going on, and lost his last low-spoken words.

The grey column had completely obscured the sun and was moving towards them.

They both shivered, and he sprang to his feet.

"As soon as you are rested, Miss Chamberlain, I think we had better start back. It looks as though we might have a squall, and perhaps some snow. This is one of the changes common here at this season of the year. It is my fault though, for you know nothing of these changes, of course."

She had risen, and started to speak.

"Don't you breathe easily?" he continued, with some concern, noticing that she pressed her hand to her bosom.

She had paled a little, and now gasped two or three times before she answered, with a smile, "It seems as though I couldn't get enough air in my lungs. I have felt it several times this afternoon. It's trifling," she went on, reassuringly. "I will take your arm though, please, because I am really very tired."

After they had walked a short distance, she continued, shivering, "What a heavy fog, and how damp it is."

"You could hardly call it fog," he said. "We are in a cloud, and it is an unusually thick one," he added, after a pause, glancing about nervously.

The great grey mass had caught them now, and had closed in upon them on every side—beneath them, above them, around them, pressing against their faces, and brushing their hands with its cold, clammy fingers, leaving moisture and chill with every touch.

There was no fear in Madge's mind. Why should there be? They were only a short distance from the hotel—a mile or so, perhaps. One could almost hear a shout so far. Then, she was leaning upon a strong arm, and enjoyed the sensation of being in the midst of a cloud as she enjoyed everything that was new.

"Why, see!" she exclaimed brightly, "it's so thick one can almost grasp a handful! Oh, dear me! I can see it pass between me and your hat," she laughed, as she threw her head to one side and glanced upwards. "And see the moisture on your coat!" she went on, running her hand along his arm, and flipping the water from her fingers.

Bob's eyes were fixed in front, and while she was wondering why he did not answer and appeared so quiet, a sudden gust of wind tore her hat from her head, and in an instant whirled it out of sight into the all-surrounding vapour.

"Stand quite still," he said quickly, and hurried after it.

How odd it was to be there all alone. There was something so solemn, so awful in the silence, the isolation, and the sombreness of the place! To be able to see and feel nothing save the rocks at her feet, and the noiseless mist floating by, to hear nothing but the moaning of the wind, to realise that she might be within a few feet of a precipice and not know it.

Madge shuddered, and there must have been something in the look that she turned upon Bob, who appeared out of the gloom at her side so suddenly and noiselessly as to startle her, that showed the relief she felt in having him with her again. His face, that was set and serious, softened into a reassuring smile, and the swift, eager glance of the eyes that she had noticed once before during the afternoon might have warned her that he, at least, was on dangerous ground. But it only caused a strange little fluttering of her heart, as she replaced her hat and took his arm without a word.

In silence they traversed now what seemed to Madge a long distance. It was but a short time since the change had taken place, but already the wind had risen to a gale, and the gloom deepened into a black wall around them, while in the distance could be heard the roar, and rattle, and crash of the approaching storm that was already heralded by a few wandering flakes of snow, whirled along too fast to find a resting-place.

Their pace had unconsciously slackened, and now they were simply groping their way over the logs and stumps, dodging the boulders, and between the swaying pines that arose one after another through the mist like a straggling column of retreating soldiers, when suddenly Bob uttered a surprised exclamation, and stood still.

Not five feet in front of them arose a solid wall of perpendicular rock, its boundaries lost in the mist.

Madge's glance showed her the perplexity, anxiety, and irritation in Bob's gaze, and made her ask earnestly,

"Why, Mr. Bartlett, have you lost your way?"

The only answer was a jagged, quivering glare that seemed to envelope them from every side, brightening up the scarped cliff in front, and showing them upon its surface the cold, dank tufts of dark green moss, between which the moisture was slowly trickling to the base. The very earth under them trembled, the air recoiled in terror, and the mountain seemed to split to its base with the almost simultaneous crash that followed.

The storm had overtaken them!

Madge tried to smile after she had relinquished her hysterical grasp of Bob's arm; but there was no answering smile from him, and a vague fear swept over her.

"I don't recognise this rock," he muttered in a low tone. "I seem to have lost the trail. Let us work our way carefully along the face of this a little."

Once more the slow and hesitating march was resumed. The fluttering flakes of snow had changed to tiny hailstones that were rapidly whitening the ground.

The first grand rush of the wind was over, and it had quieted down into a sullen moan that was merely an undertone to the great orchestra of heaven, whose reverberating notes were ringing from peak to peak, and rolling majestically down the valleys.

Faster and faster beat the hail, now rapidly changing back to snow; colder and colder moaned the wind as they drearily picked their way along in the shadow of the dreary cliff.

Madge shivered perceptibly, and Bob, turning quickly, tore off his coat, and with a peremptory "Put it on, please," threw it over her shoulders and buttoned it round her neck.

She felt by this time that they were in danger. It was growing very cold and snowing heavily, but such a combination was not new to her, although she was rather lightly dressed. And what if they had temporarily lost their way? The storm would soon be over, if they didn't find the trail before then. She might catch a bad cold. And that would have been the extent of her anxiety if it had not been for her companion's actions.

Madge had never before seen Mr. Bartlett so quiet and preoccupied. He seemed to avoid looking at her—which was certainly very unusual for him. His almost constant smile was gone and his mouth firmly set. He seemed to be watching and listening like an animal who knows there are enemies ahead. If he would only talk to her it would remove this uneasiness.

She could stand it no longer, and she asked, "Is there much danger, do you think?"

He did not turn his head, but answered with deliberation,

"Not at present; but we are certainly lost, and I am afraid we are simply making a circle and returning to the spot we started from. I hope to find the trail again."

"How can you find it when the snow is covering it all up?"

The question came from her impulsively, and she felt sorry the moment she asked it. Poor Bob! He had not deliberately lied to her, but he had not told the whole truth, and she had given utterance to the very question that was in his own mind.

"I think I could easily find my way by landmarks if the cloud would lift," he answered evasively.

She suspected now that he was concealing the truth from her, and her temper and courage rose with the crisis.

She said energetically, "Mr. Bartlett, don't conceal any danger from me. I am entitled to know it. I am not a baby."

He stopped, and turned on her abruptly. Then he said:

"The storm may last two or three hours, the snow get very deep, and the cold intense. I can stand it, because I'm strong; but you—you—" the deep voice was a little uncertain, and the two hands that had involuntarily grasped her arms as he turned, tightened—"you are delicate, you know——"

He did not finish, but before he turned his head away the same look came into his eyes again. There was no mistaking it. He might as well have said in so many words, "I love you!"

Madge's heart gave a great bound, and then there came a rush of tenderness towards the man who would lay down his life to save hers.

His strange mood was all clear to her now, and her own feelings were a revelation that almost shocked her.

The hours she had spent with him were the shortest and sweetest she had ever known. She recalled the sense of security and rest that his voice and presence always gave, the truth and earnestness of his character, his constant watchful devotion to her, which she had overlooked as mere gallantry; his strange conduct that moonlit night on the verandah when she had dropped her engagement ring, and he had first guessed that she was pledged to another.

And it was inevitable that, with the swiftness of thought, she should compare him with that other one in the East, with his boyish face, effeminate manner, and supercilious air of superiority, to whom, in their college days, she had bound herself.

It startled her, for she had never before thought him effeminate or supercilious, and she felt guilty in thinking so now.

These thoughts hurried through her brain as she stood waiting while Bob was endeavouring to discover through the whirling whiteness some landmark. Somehow she could not feel very much alarmed, with him by her side, after all.

She realised now, however, that she was very cold and very faint, and that the pressure about her chest was growing worse. The wind had risen again, and the snow was beating against their faces, as though it wished to blind them.

Bartlett was by nature hopeful, persistent, and pugnacious, with a cool, quick brain in any emergency, but he could hardly see his hand before his face.

The trail had long since been covered, and he was utterly at a loss what direction to take or what to do—except that Miss Chamberlain must be kept moving, if possible, to keep off that deadly chill until help should come or the storm lift.

His own teeth would have been chattering as hers were, but for his indomitable will. He knew that she relied upon him, and did not realise the danger. Would it be better to impress the truth upon her? Would she not rise to the emergency, and fight to the bitter end?

Her action at the moment decided him instantly. She sank upon a log, and was resting her face upon her hands.

He sprang to her, and said with decision:

"Miss Chamberlain, you must not give way like that. We are in great danger, and if we let the cold benumb us we are lost."

Her pleading answer sent a great throb of fear through his heart, for it told him that she was already under the influence of that awful spell which makes the approach of death seem like a delusive dream.

"I am not cold now, but so tired. The storm will soon be over, and they will come for us. Please wait here."

Action was needed now. He had his vest left. Without a word he wrenched that off, lifted her to her feet, unbuttoned the coat that was around her, took it off, forced the vest upon her—not heeding the feeble motion with which she waved it away—fastened it, replaced the coat, and hurried her forward through the storm—anywhere, anywhere—he cared not where.

But they went only a short distance when she tottered, stumbled, and almost fell, clasped her hands to her bosom, and uttered a cry of pain. He put his arm closer round her, her head dropped on his shoulder, and her voice came in a whisper:

"I can hardly breathe. I am too weak to walk. Leave me here, and if you can't get help, save yourself."

Digitized by Google

All restraint was gone now. He pressed her close to him with both arms, and kissed her again and again.

"Leave you, Madge, when I brought you here! Leave all I care for on earth! Heaven forgive me for saying so, but I can't help it!"

She drew herself back from him an instant; the colour flamed again into her white face, the big eyes looked full into his, then closed slowly, as she put out her arms like a tired child, and was taken back into his embrace. He bent down closer to catch the words:

"I love you, Robert! There can't be harm in saying it now, with death so near. I was not sure until this afternoon. Kiss me, dear! I am so tired!"

He covered her long dark eyelashes, her cold, pale lips, her moist hair, her marble-like cheeks and forehead with passionate kisses.

Her feeble clasp about his neck strengthened a little, and she smiled gently.

The swirling snow and the wailing wind were nothing to him now. He raised his head, and underneath the joyous triumph in his eyes there was a desperate glitter as he glanced about him.

Death? Who talked of death? They should not die there, like rats in a hole. Life was sweet to him now. She loved him, and she was his by right. Was there no escape from this biting cold and pitiless snow?

He would shout. The wild wind swept his call away with a mocking burst. It was like shouting over the sea.

His voice was almost gone. If he only had his revolver with him, he might make himself heard. Fool! Fool to leave everything behind them that would have been useful! Robbins always carried a revolver. Surely they would try to signal. Hark! What was that? Only the roll of the far-off thunder.

When the storm came up it was from the west, and the wind was blowing towards the lake. Yes, he remembered that. The wind hadn't changed, and all he had to do was to follow it. Why had he not thought of that before? There was hope yet! He would carry her!

He lifted her in his arms and staggered forward a few feet. He had to give it up. His legs and arms were icy cold, and his joints stiff. He must get his blood in circulation first. He would scrape away the snow and place Madge against that shelving rock.

She seemed to be sleeping now. She was protected from the wind there. Now he would warm up a little, and then carry her to the lake. All he had to do was to follow the wind.

Ah, how awkward of him to stumble like that! It must have been a stone that tripped him. What's that? Blood! He must have cut his forehead, then. How hard it was to get up again.

"Oh, well, perhaps he had better lie down, and take a little nap, and then——and then——then——"

The snow had ceased falling, and the wind's dreary monotone died away to a mere whisper amongst the ghost-like pines that stood up stark, like sentinels frozen on duty. The lifted, shifting clouds were pierced here and there by slanting shafts of sunshine that touched the snow with diamond points. Wider and longer grew the blue rifts in the rolling, hurrying, and dissolving mass of clouds, changing from black to grey.

Suddenly, bursting through the ragged fringes of the western curtain, the sinking sun touched with gold the pyramids, towers, minarets, and domes outlined in white relief against the blackness of the swiftly-departing storm-clouds in the east. A rainbow poised on two marble peaks, and, spanning the valley, hung in the eastern sky.

The man slept on in his shirt sleeves, and the woman lay as quietly as though she had never known any other pillow than one of snow. Yet the cold was intense. The branches snapped in the frosty air. The sun had gone and the shadows were settling down upon the valley. It would be night soon.

"Oh, Heaven, Jim, look there!"

Robbins's strong voice was only a whisper.

"That's her, sir! And here he is! Hush! See, and in his shirt-sleeves, too! And there's blood on the snow at his head!"

"What was the signal? Five double shots, wasn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"All right! Now—one! two! three! four! five! There! Have you got plenty of cartridges?"

"Plenty, sir."

"All right! Now let's turn him over. Heavens, how white he is! Hush! I think I feel a slight beat. Take off his shoes; light a match, quick! Ah, he feels that burn! Thank Heaven! Pour the whiskey down him while I go to her. Hark! They've answered. They are coming! Shout Jim! Poor little girl, I'm afraid we're too late for you! She seems very stiff, and I can't feel any movement of the heart at all. You had a great head, Jim, to think of bringing those burros. We'd had a hard time carrying them back. Better not try to do anything here but give them whiskey. It won't take long to get them to the house, and then we can go to work on them in dead earnest. Ah! there's her sister."

"Is she dead, Mr. Robbins?"

"I hope not, Miss Grace. It will take some time to bring her to, after we get her in bed. Quick—bring that burro here, Mike! Never mind the dress, Miss Grace. We mustn't stand on ceremony. It's a case of life and death! There! Balance her that way. That will take the weight off us, and we can rub her down as we go along."

. . . . . .

Mr. Robbins, manager and principal owner of the great Denver shelter, looked up over his glasses, his coffee, and his paper, at his wife who was busily engaged with pencil and paper on the opposite side of the breakfast table.

"My dear, you remember the two Chamberlain girls who were here last autumn?"

Mrs. Robbins was making out a list for a very select tea-party, and was consequently much pre-occupied.

"Yes, dear, shall I put their names down?"

"No, no, I didn't mean that. They are not here, anyway. By the way, though, I saw them when I was down at the Springs yesterday. But don't you remember it was the little one that was caught in the snowstorm with Bartlett up at Green Lake, and had such a hard pull with pneumonia? And you know we could not understand why they moved her down to the Springs before she was really well, and even before Bartlett got round himself. You thought there was something between her and him, although I told you she was engaged to young Colby, son of Chamberlain's partner. Well, here's a fine storm from Boston this morning about the boy. Listen:

"'A scandal in aristocratic circles, that has been suppressed for several months through the strenuous exertions of the two families interested, came to the surface yesterday, when it was discovered that the son of millionaire Colby, of the well-known firm of Chamberlain and Colby, was married to the variety actress, Annie Lesly, with whom he is now said to be travelling in Europe.

"'Of course, the matter would have been kept quiet, but for the accidental discovery of this marriage by an inquisitive reporter. A sad feature of the affair is that young Colby has been a long time engaged to a daughter of the senior partner, and the wedding day was actually arranged some time since, the postponement being explained on the ground that the young lady's failing health required a sudden return to Colorado Springs, where she is at present.'"

The reading was interrupted at this point by the appearance of a servant with a note for Mr. Robbins, whose puzzled and surprised look gave way gradually to a genial smile, as he perused the nervously written missive, laid it down, took off his glasses, and answered his wife's look of interrogation

"Bartlett asks for a week's leave of absence on personal business. You were right, dear, after all. He has seen the papers this morning, and he will be at the Springs before sundown."

. . . . . .

"We shall have nothing but chrysanthemums for Christmas," the faithful Grace was saying to the invalid wrapped in her pale blue eider gown, lying in a long chair among cushions. "There are hardly flowers enough to go round the churches

It won't be like home, but you are going to pull through, and that's enough."

"I don't know but I had quite as soon be here as in Boston snowdrifts," Madge returned wearily. "It doesn't matter. Nothing matters any more."

A card was handed in at the door. A wave of shell-like colour swept over the pale face.

"Yes, you may bring him here, Grace. It's something to see anybody we've known before."

Robert Bartlett made short work of his compliments to Miss Grace outside the door, and said other words which sent her downstairs swiftly to the general parlour for the next hour.

In the soft light of the sisters' sitting-room he saw the slender shape among the pillows, hedged by the blossoming chrysanthemums on the low stands at her head. One long dark braid of hair lay over the pillow, with a pale blue ribbon knot at the end.

The star-like eyes under the thick curled fringes said mutely, "Why have you been so long?" and the slight form half raised itself to meet him. He knelt beside her and drew both her hands to his breast. There were no words for such a moment, while eyes questioned eyes, and answered them again with a fulness language knows not. Then he lifted the frail girl gently, tenderly, and she laid her head down on his broad shoulder with a long sigh of absolute rest.

The quick sunset faded, dusk gathered, and the moon came up and tipped the chrysanthemums with silver, but only the flowers knew what few words were said, and the flowers never tell. Only Grace wrote home to her bosom friend as follows:—

"It doesn't matter to her, nothing matters, so long as Robert is with her. She lets him arrange everything. They are to be married Christmas morning, in her room, and her wedding dress will be the long white china silk gown Aunt Diana sent out for her to wear while convalescent, and I believe Robert will have some white roses and jessamine on from Chicago. Of course there wasn't time to get anything suitable for an outfit; but Mrs. Eden, who was married and came out last spring, sent a box of the most beautiful lingerie from her trousseau that she had never worn, which helps one over the responsibility. I don't think Madge cares if she has a new thing or not.

"People who find out what they think of each other on a mountain shelf, in a snowstorm, at the point of freezing to death, are entirely above all lower considerations. I do think three days is a very short time to prepare for any sort of a marriage. But the look that comes in Madge's eyes when I say anything makes me feel queer, and thus you see it won't be Christmas for either of them unless their plans are carried out, and really there is nothing to be said against it—under the circumstances."

And so, under the circumstances, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett were married on Christmas Day, so that neither storm nor snow could part them.

A COSSACK IN CLAY

THE light in Ruth Westover's studio was failing, for the day was in its decline; still the woman sculptor was hard at work. Nearly all the medallions upon the wall were shrouded in shadow, so that no one could have told which bore the profile of great Cæsar and which the likeness of Cleopatra. Here and there the model of an arm or leg could be seen with startling distinctness, while a number of unfinished statues, which were covered with wet cloths, made the room look like a sepulchre filled with corpses wrapped in their cerements.

There was a stronger light in the centre of the room than in the shrouded corners, and there the sculptor worked with her human model before her. She was a slim girl, with dark hair falling about her temples, and with a spirited and sensitive face. She was working rapidly and nervously, for this was the last sitting she could have from her model, and she was making the best use of her time.

The man who sat scowling before her wore the garb of a Cossack. He was named Sergius Zambrena, and was a man whose life had been extraordinary and tragical. He was broad-shouldered, deep-chested, and brown-bearded. His age was probably thirty-five years. He made a fine model, for he looked as muscular as a Roman athlete. While the girl copied his fine head and face in soft clay, he assumed the terrible aspect of a Cossack in battle. He might have been little better than a fierce savage if his face had been any indication of his real character.

They were rather silent while the sculptor worked; but when she ceased all the assumed ferocity died out of his face, and he took her hands, unmindful of the oil and clay still clinging to them, and forgetful of his own remarkable costume. Even now there was something tragic in his face and bearing.

"I must say good-bye to you," he said. "I will go down to Hoffman's studio and get into my everyday habiliments, and then I must be off. I go on board the steamer to-night, and will be sailing away early to-morrow morning. You cannot forget me while you have that ugly Cossack glowering at you."

"I am sorry you are going." There was a bright scarlet spot on either of her cheeks, and he noticed that the hands he held were feverish. "You have been a good friend to me, and I shall miss you exceedingly. I am beginning to think that real friends are rare, and when I have found one it pains me to lose him."

"We never lose our friends," Zambrena answered fancifully. "We separate from them, and sometimes they die; but I think their friendship is always with us. It is painful for me to go away. I love this town; I love this little studio; it breaks my heart to say good-bye to this little Bohemian sculptor. Yet it is gratifying to be able to go back. I was banished from my country ten years ago, and that banishment has been withdrawn. I am glad to show my enemies that I can go back, and I will be glad to receive at least a fragment of the fortune that the Government stole from me when it prohibited me from returning to Russia. Ah, Ruth! banishment is a sad experience. You cannot imagine how inexpressibly sad it is!"

Ruth Westover clasped her fingers tightly behind her, and stood looking up into the face of the man whose great form towered above her. There was a ring of defiance in her voice when she spoke again.

"Banishment from your country would seem to be an impertinence, not a tragedy. I would not be willing to live under a Government that is so barbaric as to use the knout upon delicate women. I could not be subject to a power that denies its people their right of a trial by jury for what are called official offences; and I would hate a country that has a Siberia, with all its legal crimes, for its background. If I had lived in Russia I could not always have bitten my tongue and strangled my speech, and I am afraid I would have been sent to Siberia."

Zambrena laughed with enjoyment of this hot-headed speech.

"They would have sent you there, as sure as fate," he said, with conviction. "You have a trick of the tongue, Ruth, that would have given you no quarter in Russia. Your blood is too warm for that Government, and you would have been sent to the snow-fields to reduce it to what is considered a proper temperature."

Ruth shuddered, but she answered at once:

"Your blood is no cooler than mine, my friend. You are easily angered, and you hate injustice. Russia is not a good country for these characteristics. Are you quite sure you will come back?"

"Not sure," he said gravely; "but hopeful."

They were silent for a minute, and then he spoke again, rather abruptly:

"We have been the best of friends always, Ruth."

"Yes," she assented; "the best of friends."

He was smiling constrainedly now, and her eyes were dark with unshed tears.

"Your genius is already recognised," he continued; "you have youth, good looks, a manner that captivates and a social position that is assured. From the time you made mud-pies in your infancy you have been approaching success as a sculptor, and now you have gained it. Besides all this, you have won the love of a remarkably good and influential man. Think of this little potter moulding the Prime Minister of a great State just as she models her wax and clay figures! You are too practical not to know that Lord Balflower wants to marry you, Ruth."

"I have imagined something of the kind," she admitted.

"And you will marry him," he said, without looking into her face. "I would not speak of this if I were not going away, and if I did not believe that this may be our last meeting. You always came to me for advice when I was the only friend you had in this town, or I would not talk to you now about so personal a matter. I have watched Balflower, and I know that he is a good man. He is a gentleman, with a generous nature that is sweet without being effeminate. I believe he appreciates the womanliness in your nature as much as he admires the artist. If you marry him you will never have to pinch and economise, nor cook your own breakfast, nor drink out of jelly glasses—and give your visitors marble busts for seats, as you have done in this little studio. You will have an easy life, little Ruth, and I shall be enough your friend to be glad of it."

"Are you glad?" she asked. "Is it your wish that Lord Balflower shall marry me?"

He bent and kissed her forehead.

"Dear friend," he said, "I wish there were no partings in this life. I wish we never need say good-bye."

He went away then, hurriedly—almost abruptly. The sculptor sank into the chair he had occupied and covered her face with her hands.

Sergius Zambrena had been a friend to Ruth Westover for several years. It was he who had first induced her to open the studio which had subsequently become a delight to them both, and so profitable to her. He was a man of strong character, but was one whom her new acquaintances regarded with distrust, and who, owing to his alleged Socialistic views, they had advised her to avoid.

He had been educated in one of the universities of St. Petersburg, where he had imbibed some of the rebellious spirit against the Russian Government which runs riot among the young men in such institutions. As his family were Loyalists, and, moreover, belonged to the nobility, his sentiments were not readily suspected; but, one night, one of his fellow-students had come to his bachelor quarters and begged for shelter and protection.

The youth had been accused of Nihilism, and was closely pursued by the police. Zambrena knew him to be a careless lad (he was little more than a boy) who gave no heed to political subjects, but who had repeated some of the disloyal sentiments of his mates. If he were caught he would be tried for treason—which meant conviction and death, or the greater punishment of a living burial in the mines.

Zambrena had risked everything that he had held dear in life to save this youth. He had aided and accompanied him in his escape to France. Later, when the facts were suspected, Sergius Zambrena had been banished for being absent from Russia in a foreign country without official permission, and all of his property had been appropriated by the Government as a further punishment for his offence.

After ten years his sentence of banishment had been withdrawn, and he was granted permission to return to his country for a small inheritance to which he had fallen heir.

Ruth Westover reviewed all these circumstances while she sat with covered eyes in her studio after his departure.

"He may never come back," she thought, with exceeding bitterness. "He has many enemies, and it is possible—even probable—they will make some other charge against him that will bring him into trouble. I believe he will never come back."

"I have been blind, stupid, vain," she continued. "I have fancied that he cared for me—that he would not tell me of his affection because he was as poor as I, and because he was afraid that association with a man who had been banished from his country would be a stumbling-block to my success. Now that stigma has been removed from him, and he is even promised a part of his fortune, still he calls me merely a friend, and advises me to make a prudent match with an influential man. Sergius has been called a Socialist, yet he urges me to marry a ruler and an aristocrat. How little women know of the motives and characters of men!"

She arose and approached the figure she had modelled, and which was fast hardening in the cool air of the studio. She looked into its scowling face, and spoke to it as if it could hear her utterances.

"This is the first time you have ever looked into my eyes and frowned, Sergius Zambrena," she said.

Zambrena left Hoffman's studio, and stood at the street door waiting for a 'bus, and reflecting:

"A man would be a poltroon if he asked a woman to unite her life with his under such circumstances as mine," he thought. "Ruth Westover is an unusual woman—brilliant, successful, and accepted by the best society. I have no right to ask her to go to a country, even temporarily, where she would have no standing, where I will be an object of suspicion, and where danger may assail us both. She will have no Governmental wolves to fear here, and she will know nothing of the real tragedy of my life. I should not suffer like this. I have had hard knocks enough to have made me a philosopher.

His face was very grave and stern.

"And I advised her to marry Balflower," he thought. "I have met with cruelty so often that I am accustomed and hardened to it, else I could not have spoken my own death-warrant. She has appeared to belong to my life. It was I who first discovered her struggling alone, and who encouraged her to be what she is. It may be years before I can come back. I could not ask her to wait for me."

A 'bus went by unheeded.

"I thank God that I had strength to hold my tongue," he continued to reflect, "and yet I am weak—wretchedly weak. I am longing to go back and see her once more. Why should I not go back? It may be the last time before I die."

He went up the stairs softly, almost guiltily. He was sure now of his strength.

He could not see her at once in the darkened studio, but when his eyes became accustomed to his surroundings he saw that she was kneeling with her arms clasped round the neck of the sculptured Cossack, and that all the youth had died out of her face. Zambrena gave a cry of mingled happiness and remorse, and caught her in his arms, unmindful now of his stern resolution.

"Do not worship that graven image whilst a human heart is starving for your affection," he said brokenly. And then—"I did not mean to ask you to share my troubled life, but my love has conquered my human kindness."

Her eyes were bright again, and her youth had returned.

Later she said:

"I am not afraid of any peril while you are with me, Sergius, and now we will never be apart. Have you never learned that there is no cruelty so fatal to a woman as the tragedy of being separated from the man she loves?"

UITE comfortable, sir?"

"Yes, thank you, Martin."

"Shall I draw the couch higher up the path?"

"No; leave it alone."

"Very well, sir." The man retreated a few steps, only to return. "You don't think that book is too heavy for you, do you, Sir Charles?"

"Oh, no, Martin. Do go," I cried; for this constant reference to my helplessness was a sore trial to me, as I was paralysed, and as the old fellow went off I shut my eyes with a sigh.

"What a very ugly man!"

Opening my eyes with terror—for my hermit-like existence had rendered me as timid as a woman—I saw a little child standing at some paces from me.

"What are you doing here? How did you get here?"

My voice, rendered angry by surprise and distrust—for I dreaded that the child should be followed by others—did not in the least seem to frighten the little intruder. She did not answer, but she stood looking steadily at me, and I, in return, looked steadily back at her. Such a pretty little girl!

"Come here, little one. So I am very ugly, am I? Well now, do you know who I am?"

She nodded wisely, answering me in the soft, deliberate voice I was soon to love so dearly:

"Yes, I know: you are the Beast."

"The what?"

She was clasping a tattered picture-book in both her chubby hands, and she now held it out straight before her, peeping over the top with solemn blue eyes.

"Beauty and the Beast."

I read the title, and then took her treasure from her, wondering what on earth she could mean.

"And the house and the garden were always shut up quite tight. No one ever saw the poor Beast, because he was so ugly he would not come out. But he was very lonely and miserable, and all the time he hoped that Beauty would come."

"That's it," cried the child delighted. "Does Beauty ever come?"

"No, Beauty never came. It hurt her to look on me. She was so 'sensitive,' you know."

I spoke very bitterly, but my new friend only smiled in reply.

"That's all right," said she, comfortably. "We don't want her, you and I. And now, I suppose it is time to have some cake, isn't it?"

I blew the whistle for Martin, and enjoyed his utter amazement at the sight of my little visitor.

"It is little Miss Trent, one of the Vicar's daughters."

Martin lifted her off the couch, and then, without the slightest warning, she stood on tip-toe, and then kissed me good-bye.

"When you say your prayers to-night you'll hold my kisses quite tightly," she said quaintly.

"Good-bye, dear Beast."

"Good-bye, dear Beauty," and Winifred was gone.

Little Winifred Trent, or "Beauty," as I always called her, cherishing the pretty fancy that had first led me to her, came to me day by day throughout these summer months.

My couch had been wheeled into the garden, now in the full blaze of its August glory, and Beauty was near me digging in her own little plot of ground.

"Beauty, come here, darling, and show me the flowers."

I called to the child, but the industrious little gardener did not hear me. She had wandered further down the path, and was now nearly out of sight

Suddenly my couch began to move!

You who are able to protect yourselves, who have full control of your limbs, and who can guard off any danger that menaces you—you will understand me when I say that my heart literally stood still with terror. I felt for the whistle; it had fallen to the ground. The couch started down hill, rolling somewhat slowly at first, but gaining speed with every turn of the wheels.

"Don't be afraid. I'll stop you! I'll stop you!"

The voice, Beauty's voice, rang out clear and shrill.

"Go away, darling, go away!" I screamed, as the space between us rapidly lessened. "Don't touch me! Oh, God, save the child!"

The agony in my voice arrested her steps, and for one moment she stood motionless, beautiful as a guardian angel who wards the path of danger; and the next—ah! how can I write it? She was knocked down, the coach stopped with a jerk as the wheel ground into the little, soft body as it turned over, and I was flung out on the path.

When I awoke to consciousness I was in my own room. "He is all right," I heard someone say; and then another voice replied, "I wish the poor little girl was as well as he is; she is dying."

I lay and listened to them as a man in a dream.

"Martin, take me to her."

"Mr. Charlie, my poor lad! You mustn't go."

"Martin, I must go. You can carry me well enough!"

"Carry you? I'd die for you, Mr. Charles!"

And thus, carried in the same kind arms which had first held me as a child, I went to kiss my Beauty good-bye.

The child was apparently asleep, and there I waited by her. Some one (I suppose the doctor) was whispering to me, and telling me that my darling was free from pain, and that very likely she would leave us in her sleep.

"Without one word!"

As I spoke Beauty opened her eyes, and looked full at me.

"Read 'Beauty and the Beast,' she whispered. "It is almost time to go home, isn't it?"

"Not to-night, my darling! I can't read to-night!" My voice choked as I strove to answer her, but the weak whisper was repeated.

"But you always read it before I go. Do read it to-night."

Tears stood in the sweet blue eyes as she reiterated her request; and then I felt a book was put in my hand, and I was told to read—the child must go in peace. "Yes, I will read it, Beauty."

"Thank you, dear Beast."

"'And the house and the garden were always shut up quite tight. No one ever saw the poor Beast, because he was so ugly he would not come out. But he was very lonely and miserable, and all the time he hoped that Beauty would come.'"

For a moment my eyes grew dim. That very sentence had first brought her to me, and now?—Ah, Beauty, Beauty!

"'And the Beauty and the Beast were very happy together. They loved each other very much.'"

A tiny sigh broke from the child's lips, and I stopped in sudden fear.

"It is almost time to go home, isn't it, Beast?"

"Yes, my darling, very, very soon."

"I'm so glad. Finish it quick."

"'Till at last they wanted Beauty to go back to her father's home. And they sent for her, and the poor Beast had to let her go.'"

With faltering voice and bowed head I had read on. Now—the angels had flown back to Paradise, and the little child could no longer hear me.

Beauty had gone to her Father's Home.

Curious Experiments

IN

"A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderate lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2 lb. to even 12 lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetal knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

"Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, price 4d. stamps) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drank as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2 lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for his book, which can be obtained through booksellers, or at the address given above."—Leeds Times, December 1, 1894.

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS

"We were reading in the 'Penny Illustrated Paper' how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

BY JOHN K. LEYS,

Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c.

Illustrated by RAYMOND POTTER.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT BY GEOFFREY LANE DUNDAS, ESQ., B.A., BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

HAD I been deliberately poisoned, or had I merely been the victim of a strange accident?

That was the question that agitated my mind as I slowly and painfully rose from my bed on the afternoon of the 11th of June, 1883.

It happened in this way.

The morning of the previous day, the 10th of June, I had spent, as usual, in "Queen's Bench No. 4," with occasional flying visits (when the tedium became unbearable) to Appeal Court No. 2. I had a genuine brief (the brief of a friend) in my hand, which was my reason for haunting Court No. 4.

Once or twice during the forenoon a Hindoo looked in at Queen's Bench No. 4. Now, Hindoos and Parsees are as common as peas in the Inns of Court, in the Halls, Libraries, and Common Rooms of the Temple; but one never sees them in Court. The reason is, that all they desire is the status of a barrister, so that they may practice in the courts of their native land. They seldom or never hope to attain a practice in England, and are, therefore, hardly ever seen in an English court of law.

In the weariness of listening to petty and uninteresting details any distraction comes as a relief. When, therefore, I saw a Hindoo in wig and gown standing in the passage between the jury-box and the benches allotted to counsel, I stared at him, I fear rather rudely. He took no notice of me. His mild, dark eyes wandered from the Judge to the witness, and thence to the cross-examining counsel; but they never met mine. "What handsome fellows those Hindoos are!" I whispered to my next neighbour, Jack Linton.

"Do you think so?" he asked carelessly.

"I do," said I. "Look at those beef-fed, heavy, coarsely-modelled British countenances around you, and then look at that Hindoo's, with its clearly cut, intellectual features, its refined expression, its look of alert yet not arrogant or self-assertive intelligence. If I were a woman I should fall in love with a fellow like that if I were to meet him," and I nodded gently in the direction of the Hindoo before us.

"You don't mean to say you think a decent English girl could marry a Hindoo?" asked my friend, incredulously.

"Yes, I do," I returned. "Why not? He is no darker than many a Spaniard or Italian; and I am sure he has twice the brains of an average Englishman. To be sure, there is the religious difficulty——"

My aimless talk was cut short by the Judge rising for the mid-day adjournment. We all rose, and, pouring out of the court, passed along the corridor and down a corkscrew staircase to a large subterranean room, still smelling of damp plaster, where various refreshments were offered for sale.

A long bar ran down one side of the room. Linton and I strolled up to it together, he being on my left. I called for a plate of sandwiches and a glass of sherry; and as I began eating, the Hindoo came in, and, standing next to me on my right, asked for a bottle of lemonade.

He got what he wanted; and then, I remember, with a smiling "Pardon me," he caught up the wide left sleeve of his gown with his right hand, so as to prevent it knocking over my glass of sherry, which was standing close to his left elbow, and reached across me for a cake, or bun. It would have been more civil to have asked me to hand the dish to him; and this made me notice the action. That was all.

Having finished one of my sandwiches, I took a sip of sherry.

Now, I have been favoured by nature with an exceptionally keen sense of taste; and I perceived, or thought I perceived, a peculiar, rather unpleasant taste in the wine. It was so slight that I did not suppose anyone else would have noticed it, but it was enough to make the sherry distasteful to me. I had no doubt it belonged to the spirit with which the wine had been "fortified" by way of preparing it for the English palate.

I went on with my lunch; and as several other men came up to the bar at that moment, the Hindoo retired with his cake and lemonade to one of the small marble-topped tables which were scattered through the room. When I next looked round for him he had finished his modest meal and was gone.

"I don't admire your sherry," I remarked to the young woman behind the bar, "please give me a glass of claret." As I spoke I handed her the glass of sherry (still almost full); she placed it on a small ledge within the counter, and gave me the claret.

When I returned to court I felt queer and uncomfortable—hardly ill, but decidedly uncomfortable.

An hour passed, and I grew worse; I though I would go home. In addition to a feeling of nausea, I experienced a strange numbness which made it a trouble, almost a pain, to move. I just managed to avoid being run over in crossing Fleet Street; and it took me five or ten minutes to climb the stairs to my rooms, and a good half-hour to get into bed.

The afternoon and night that followed seemed to me like a long, hideous dream.

I was not free from pain; but it was not the pain that was my worst symptom. My muscles seemed to be paralysed; while my brain—my imagination, at least—was excited in the strangest way. The most hideous and grotesque figures, the most revolting ideas, crowded my fancy; and at the same time a dreadful depression seemed to crush me with an iron hand.

Gradually the languor abated, but a dreadful nervous headache took its place and lasted until noon. I was still suffering from it when Linton called to see why I had not turned up in court.

"I'll send you a doctor," said he, as he prepared to leave me.

"You needn't mind," said I. "I feel that in spite of the headache, which almost blinds me, I am getting over it."

"What can have been the matter with you?"

"Haven't the least idea. I have not been eating or drinking anything that could hurt a baby. An egg and toast at breakfast; sandwiches and sherry—no, claret—I say, Jack, I wonder if that sherry can have hurt me? I only had half a mouthful of it, but it tasted queer."

"My dear fellow, you're talking absolute nonsense! You only took two teaspoonfuls of the stuff. If it were as deadly as all that, half the lawyers in London would be poisoned by this time—no bad thing, either."

My friend left me, but came back in an hour or two to see how I was getting on. I was better, much better; and in the afternoon I was able to rise.

Next day I went to the courts as usual, and I had not long taken my seat when Jack Linton came in and sat down beside me.

"Glad you're all right again, old man," said he. "By the way," he added suddenly, "rather an odd thing has happened, a sad thing, I should say. One of the girls who acted as barmaids downstairs was found dead in her bed yesterday morning."

A strange chill seemed to pass through my body.

"Had she been drinking any sherry?" I whispered.

"I can't tell. I only heard that she was taken ill suddenly yesterday afternoon, was sent home in a cab, and went to bed, and was found dead this morning. She lived alone, poor girl, so that no one knows exactly how or when she died."

"There will be an inquest?"

"I suppose so."

"Then I will attend and state what happened to me."

Found dead in her bed.

"Why not make a communication to the police? It would be more effectual, as they would have all the sherry in the refreshment room analysed. And you would avoid all publicity."

I followed my friend's advice; and I afterwards learned that all the sherry which had been opened on the 10th of June had been subjected to close, scientific analysis without any foreign substance, beyond German potato spirit, being found in it. Nor did the autopsy of the body of the unfortunate waitress reveal anything. A verdict of "Death from Natural Causes" was returned.

In spite of these facts I even then entertained a strong suspicion that the poor girl's death was not accidental; that in some inexplicable way poison had been introduced either into my wine-glass or into the wine; and that the barmaid, having drunk the glass of wine which I had barely tasted, had suffered, as it were, in my room.

And the reader may imagine how strongly that suspicion was confirmed by a circumstance which came to my knowledge a few days later.

Through the carelessness of my laundress, a letter which had been delivered by post on the eleventh of June, the morning of my illness, dropped behind a pile of books and lay undiscovered for a fortnight. When at length it was put into my hands I found that it contained two lines of writing in a language I did not understand, and beneath them the words—"Churruckpore, June 10th, 1853."

The Hindoo name Churruckpore recalled to my memory the Hindoo who had been standing beside me on the day that had so nearly been my last. I remembered his gesture when he caught up the sleeve of his barrister's gown with his right hand, and, at the same moment, reached across me with his left, thus diverting my attention. Could he have dropped a deadly powder into my glass with his right hand in that fraction of a second? It was possible. And if so, the letter probably contained a boast, or a warning, or something in the nature of an explanation. Or was this a document actually written in 1853, two years before I was born?

I carefully copied the lines, and submitted them to a friend who knew Hindustani. He told me that the meaning was—"The hand of the avenger has once more fallen," with the name "Churruckpore," and the date.

From this it seemed clear to me that the letter had not been intended for me. No; the writer of these lines believed that when he penned them I was lying a cold, neglected corpse in my solitary bedroom in the Temple. They were meant for the eyes of my friends or relations. And they were intended to proclaim the fact that I had died, not by accident, but as a victim. It had doubtless been intended that I should be put to death on account of something that had happened some thirty years before; and, but for an accident, that intention would have been carried out.

I had escaped once; but would I escape if the attempt should be made a second time?

A shudder ran through my limbs as I realised that I was a marked man, an object of vengeance to a foe that could neither be fought nor bribed, an enemy passionless, cold, silent, and remorseless as death itself. Again and again during that summer the haunting thought recurred to me—Should I survive another Tenth of June?

I could not act. I could take no precautions, or none that I could depend upon as being of any avail. I could only await my destiny with such courage as I possessed.

THE NARRATIVE.

CHAPTER I.

AT SEACOMBE TOWERS.

IT was the 23rd of May, 1884, and Geoffrey Dundas was sitting in his room at Plum-Tree Court, studying an open letter. He had well-nigh forgotten the events of the previous year. The young have short memories; to them twelve months are what half-a-dozen years are to men of middle life. And Dundas was in the flood-tide of existence, perpetually busy, either with men or with books; with work or with play.

He was neither rich, nor highly born, nor endowed with unusual talent; but he enjoyed life quite as much as if he had been a millionaire, or the son of a Duke, or an acknowledged genius.

He was only an ordinary young Englishman, fairly good-looking, and fairly well educated. His father had been General Sir Owen Dundas, K.C.B., and this fact lent to the young man a certain prestige, and procured him many kindly services, though it did little to improve his financial prospects.

"I wish to goodness my father had been a solicitor or an accountant," he would often say when lamenting his want of a legal "connection;" but he did not mean what he said. He was proud of his father and his father's career.

Perhaps Geoffrey's most notable characteristic was a certain self-dependence, a resourcefulness, and an ability to look after himself when placed in difficult or trying circumstances, which he had no doubt inherited from his soldier father.

The question Geoffrey was now debating with himself, as, for the third time, he read the letter before him, was whether he should leave town at the height of the season, and bury himself in a country house in Devonshire for some days.

"Of course one ought to be in town just now, when all the Courts are sitting," said Geoffrey to himself; "and I wanted to hear the debate in the House on Thursday. Then there's the polo match, too; and that tennis handicap; and I've not found time to see the pictures yet. On the other hand, I believe Sir Arthur is bored to death down there, and would take it ill if I refused to go. If only I could find out whether Leila is at home or not!"

Yes, Leila was the determining factor in the whole calculation; and her father most provokingly said not a word about her—did not even mention her name.

"Perhaps she has gone to pay a visit to some friends, and the old General simply wants me to keep him company in his solitude. Why can't he come up to town? I wonder whether, if Leila is at home, that fellow Byngham will be there? I wonder whether it's any use my going on thinking about Leila? But I needn't say that; I can't help thinking about her. I fancy it is a bad sign for me that her father does not mention her name in his letter. But now that I have an invitation, it would be a pity not to go."

The young man's deliberations ended as any person of judgment who had ever seen him and Leila Chetwynd together might have known they must end—in his writing a letter accepting the General's invitation.

On the appointed day he set out for Devonshire.

The General himself—a fine, tall, upright man, with a sun-tanned face, clean shaven but for a splendid white moustache, and short white hair—came to meet his guest at Torwyn, the nearest railway station. He greeted Geoffrey with a warmth that was unusual for him.

"How like you are to your father!" he exclaimed involuntarily, as he took the young man's hand, and gazed into his face.

Sir Arthur's four-wheeled dogcart, drawn by two powerful bays, was waiting outside the station. The General took the reins himself as a matter of course; and they drove off at a splendid pace.

The fairest of English counties was looking her best. Tall, lithe spruces, and silver birches in their freshest green, stood in rows by the wayside, like maidens decked for a festival. Here and there a laburnum tree by the side of a cottage gateway lighted up the road as with a torch from fairy-land; or a thorn bent beneath its load of scented blossoms; and over all the air was so pure, so keen, so fresh, that it seemed as if care, pain, sickness, languor in that region must be things unknown.

Even Geoffrey, though not as a rule a great admirer of Nature, felt the spell of the summer eve.

"This is like Paradise," he murmured, as if speaking to himself.

The General, sitting at his side, turned his clear blue eyes full upon him.

"Ay," said he, "and Paradise wasn't long without a snake, was it?"

"I hope you don't refer to me?" said Dundas laughing.

Sir Arthur only answered him by cutting one of the horses over the neck; and in the plunging which followed the General found plenty of occupation, and plenty of excuse for saying no more on the subject.

Seacombe Towers—the name was not inappropriate, if it was a little pretentious—stood on a high plateau close to the sea. On the west a thick plantation hid a ravine or "coombe," which ran up from the sea some considerable distance, and afforded a ready access to the beach. The house itself faced the sea, but there was a western front, and in it a side door leading to the hall through a conservatory which was generally used as the main entrance when the family were alone.

Near this door stood a slender figure dressed in white. Geoffrey caught sight of it as the dogcart was whirled rapidly up the avenue; and it made his heart beat fast. The General saw it, and his eyes suddenly filled with tears. A great dog of the rough St. Bernard species was struggling at her side. The dog was pulling at his chain, which the girl was holding in both hands to prevent his leaping up on the dogcart when it came to a standstill; and the great size and weight of the animal made the girl bend backwards to resist the strain.

The breeze—there was generally a breeze at Seacombe—had loosened one or two locks of her hair and blew them across her face, so that she was forced every now and then to leave hold of the chain with one hand that she might clear the hair out of her eyes. The dog seemed to be perfectly aware of this, and every time the operation was performed he dragged the girl a foot or two onwards. Geoffrey thought he had never seen a prettier picture in his life.

He jumped down from the dogcart, and Leila met his smile with a smile as frank as his own, while she offered him her hand. Her dark hair made the best of contrasts with her clear, pale complexion. There was not a touch of colour in her face except her lips. Her eyes may be best described as dark grey; they were clear, and soft, and shining—like the evening sky after a storm. The outline of her face was good, if not entitled to be called beautiful; but the charm of it lay in her mouth. Some fairy had touched it with her wand, and given it that look of tenderness which one sees sometimes on the lips of a child, very seldom on the face of a grown woman. But after all, Leila Chetwynd was hardly more than a child; she was barely nineteen.

There was only time for a little ordinary talk about the weather, and Geoffrey's journey, before the dressing-bell sounded.

"How long do you mean to stay this time, Mr. Dundas?" asked Leila in all simplicity during dinner.

Her father frowned slightly. He wished that Leila would remember that she was a woman, and not be quite so familiar with her old acquaintance.

"As long as your father will keep me," he answered with a smile.

"Then I hope you won't leave us till we go to London. Haven't you heard? Papa has promised to take me to town for the fag end of the season—the middle of June to the end of July—hardly worth having, just a little better than nothing! Why he won't go before the middle of next month I cannot imagine. And it is so dismally dull here in the meantime that I hope you won't desert us till we go."

"I shall be glad if you can stay for the next fortnight, Dundas," said the General; "I daresay we shan't stay here ourselves long after that."

Dundas was surprised. He had contemplated a visit of three or four days, a week at most; and though the General's invitation was not so cordial as his daughter's, it seemed sincere enough. But as he did not feel quite sure whether he could stay away from town so long at that season, he gave a reply which "reserved his liberty of action," as the French say; and the subject dropped.

The evening passed most pleasantly. Miss Frewin, Leila's companion and chaperon, was good-nature itself; and Geoffrey managed to spend one of the happiest hours of his life in the neighbourhood of Leila's grand piano.

After he went upstairs that night he asked himself what the General's unusual friendliness could mean. Ever since his boyhood he had paid occasional visits to the Towers; for Sir Arthur was not the man to forget the son of his old friend and comrade, General Dundas. But Geoffrey knew very well that from this sort of friendliness, to accepting him for a son-in-law, was a very long step. He was quite aware that the General favoured the cause of his cousin's son, Captain Byngham.

The two young people went for a ride.

"It will come . . . on the Tenth of June."

He had expected to be asked to Seacombe Towers some time during the year, seeing that he had not been there for the previous twelve months; but he had not expected to be asked at a time when there was no other guest in the house, and when he must necessarily be thrown a great deal into Leila's society. Nor had he ever stayed at Seacombe Towers for more than a week at a time; and now he was asked to stay at least a fortnight.

"Of course Leila means nothing," said Geoffrey to himself in the solitude of his chamber. "She is as guileless as a child. But Sir Arthur is a man of the world. He must know that his daughter is a singularly attractive girl. If he asks me to spend a fortnight in his house, how can he be surprised if I fall in love with her? But last time I was here he as good as told me Captain Byngham was the chosen man—Bah! After all, Leila's hand is not her father's to dispose of as he chooses. I mean to make the most of my chances while I have them."

"My dear," said the General next morning at breakfast, "Captain Byngham says we may expect him to-morrow, and——"

Geoffrey looked at Leila, and a faint blush rose to her cheek. He felt that he would have given a thousand pounds to know what it meant. Did it mean that they were already engaged? Or was it the blush of a maiden on being told that her lover will soon be at her side? Or was it simply an indication that she was conscious of Geoffrey's questioning eyes?

Absorbed in trying to find an answer to these questions, Geoffrey did not notice that his host had not finished his sentence. Immediately afterwards Sir Arthur gathered up his letters and newspapers, and quitted the breakfast-table, leaving a cup of tea behind him untasted.

After breakfast the two young people went for a ride, attended only by a groom; and during that ride Geoffrey came to the conclusion that Leila was not engaged to her cousin.

The day passed quickly enough. Geoffrey could not forget that his rival would appear next day. After dinner the General retired to his study, and did not appear in the drawing-room till a few minutes after ten.

"Will you come into the smoking-room, Dundas?" said Sir Arthur, when the two men were left to themselves.

Geoffrey did not particularly care for talk at that moment.

Digitized by Google

He wanted to be alone and let his thoughts busy themselves with the fair girl whose voice still lingered in his ears; but he followed his host to the smoking-room as a matter of course.

The young barrister was not one of those persons commonly called "observant," who take a pleasure in watching their neighbours like a lynx; still, even he could not help thinking that Sir Arthur seemed to have something on his mind. He fidgeted about, made one or two unsuccessful efforts to keep up conversation, and at length fell into a moody silence.

"Did it not strike you as odd," he asked suddenly, "that I should ask you to come into the country at this time of year?"

Geoffrey started and blushed a little at this question. "I thought it was very kind of you," he said.

"I think, perhaps, I ought to tell you the real reason of my asking you," said the General.

Geoffrey stared, wondering what could be coming next.

"The fact is," said the old man, with a queer look in his face, "I wanted to increase the garrison."

"To increase the garrison!" echoed Geoffrey in amazement. "Do you mean that you are in danger?"

"Yes," said the old man quietly, "we are in danger."

"Impossible!"

"It is true."

"Do you mean that you have enemies?"

"Yes."

"Enemies that can harm you living here, in your own house in England, in the nineteenth century?"

"Yes, I do."

There was a moment's silence.

"I hope you can trust me, Sir Arthur, to do my best for you and—for the family—that is, if I can be of any service."

"Yes, I can trust you."

"I do not ask what the nature of this peril may be," said Geoffrey after another pause; "but you can, perhaps, tell me when it may be expected to come upon you?"

"It will come," said the General, "if at all, on the Tenth of June."

HE woman was dead. Her face, ashen-hued and distorted, was turned upward, and Darcal, as he gazed upon it, began to understand what he had done. Perhaps, even at that moment, he began to fear the consequences of his crime. Yes, the woman was dead; there could be no doubt on that score. The grip had been too firm, and the lithe, sinewy, rage-strengthened fingers had clutched the white, soft, slender neck with a ferocity that only death could appease.

The brutality of the crime did not move Darcal so much as wonderment that his purpose had been accomplished so easily. She had scarcely struggled when his fingers closed upon her throat. She could not scream, and her gurgling sobs were smothered by the other hand of the murderer, close pressed upon the woman's mouth. Darcal was calm enough now, as he stood there, looking down into that face so cold and still: the eyes almost closed, and the lips parted as if the sleeper were trying to utter the incoherent thoughts of her dreams.

And now he wondered why he had killed her. He wanted to analyse and make clear to his understanding the motives that had impelled him to this murder. Yes, murder. He would not try to disguise or palliate the truth; and, having admitted the truth, he derived an intensity of pleasure in contemplation of his crime that can be appreciated only by those who have wantonly, or in cold blood, slain a fellow being.

Why had he killed her? That he was justified Darcal did not doubt for an instant. It was only necessary that he should collect his thoughts, arrange the details in their proper order, and trace the logic of events to find ample justification for this murder. It was not necessary that his theory of self-defence should satisfy anyone but himself, for it was impossible that anyone else should ever know who had murdered the woman, or why she was murdered. Only in the rarest instances are murderers unable to arrive at this self-justification, and Darcal was confident that his was not an exceptional case.

Going back to that troth-plighting under the apple blossoms, in that distant land where the flowers are perennial beneath skies that are for ever blue, Darcal sought for his justification and found it not, though he saw dimly through the mists of the years that followed a fateful shadow creeping athwart the sunshine of those happy hearts. Then he came to the little grey chapel where the priest gave them his blessing, and he remembered even the odour of the lilacs wafted by the warm breezes through the half-opened windows. Are those lilacs in the bosom of the dead woman's dress?

And the future—how bright it looked, and how swiftly it came to the flower-decked portals of their present; and what a miserable, crime-stained future it was, corroding the honour of the husband, corrupting the virtue of the wife. And so they parted, and went their ways, never dreaming, even then, that it would come to this.

For a time Darcal could not bring himself to a close contemplation of the incidents immediately environing the slaying of the woman. They were too sordid, too insignificant in comparison with the enormity of the event. At first he tried to justify himself by accusing the woman; but, strangely enough, that did not satisfy him—it lacked the strength of an honest judgment. There was a time, perhaps, when such an accusation would have acquitted him before all the world and in the tribunal of his own conscience—but not now. The statute of limitations had intervened to mitigate even the heinousness of her crime.

The bells of a distant steeple struck seven as Darcal softly closed the door behind him and walked down the stairs to the street. In the hurrying crowd he was safe from that human justice so frequently at variance with individual estimates of right and wrong. The hounds of the law could not track him now, and only his own soul could sit in judgment over him.

Why had he killed her? The question kept beating through his brain like a hammer on the anvil. The monotonous iteration became momentarily more painful, manifesting itself in a physical depression, as if extraneous forces were exerting their powers to oppress. Why had he killed her? Why had he killed her?

True, he had asked her for money, and she had refused him, with a sneer on her lips and the scorn of bitter contempt, distorting a face already hardened by reckless disregard of every womanly virtue. But that refusal could not be construed as a sufficient motive for what he had done.

The perfume of lilacs and roses, gushing warm from the open door of a florist's recalled to Darcal's memory the scene in the little grey chapel: the priest blessing their union, the coloured shadows of the stained windows, through which the sunlight streamed; and, like a ghostly melody, he seemed to hear the music of birds, singing in the magnolias—the twitter and carol of merry songsters, distinct and clear through the turmoil of the town.

Surely that shadow, just beyond the side-glance of his half-closed eye, had substance; else why did it so persistently make its presence felt? That absurd fancy again—absurd, but terrifying as an illusion that one fears may become a delusion firmly fixed in a mind capable of understanding that such fixity means insanity. An absurd fancy—and Darcal laughed.

The beggar on the crossing shuddered to hear the laugh of this man hurrying by, instinctively recognising the horror of the thoughts that provoked it—knowing, as some natures know, that the man who laughed thus, alone in the crowd, was one not at peace with himself and God—a creature to be dreaded, shunned, abhorred.

Once more Darcal stopped, and again his eyes stared into the awful gloom of this house, intently listening to hear a moan, a shriek, any sound, human or inhuman, that might break the silence that brooded where the dead woman lay, with her ashen face upturned in the darkness. Why had he returned? His intention had been flight, though he was fain to admit, on reflection, that he had no set destination for that flight, guided only by the instinct of self-preservation. Why had he come back to this scowling abode of sin and death? And as the murderer gazed at the silent house and remembered what lay within, a terror came upon him that only the outcry he dreaded would have lifted.

This time Darcal went away determined never to come back, reasoning with himself that it was not safe for a murderer to haunt the scene of his crime. He would cross the city to his lodging, where the hangman could not find him and where the vengeance of offended justice would never seek him.

Still his thoughts ran upon his motive for this murder. Still he debated with himself his reasons. Why had he killed her? Not because she had refused to give him money, but because—ah! that was the reason! He had discovered his true motive at last. How simple, how natural, what a complete and unmistakable justification!

Yes, he had found it at last, and there was relief, almost happiness, in the thought. The whole world would justify and give him sympathy. He need not fear the hangman, because they do not hang men who strangle women for that. He need not fear the reproaches of a too-exacting conscience, for this monitor accepted the justification as ample and adequate.

He could look the house squarely in the face now; he could meet its scowl with the stern consciousness of rectitude—as the executioner meets the frown of those who execrate him for his work upon those they love. He was strong in the faith of justification.

The man who came down the stairway stepped aside to let Darcal pass, but the latter paused to make inquiry.

"Have you seen her?" His voice was low, but its tone was pleasant, and the other was constrained to reply.

"Seen whom?" he asked.

"Why, my—the woman who lives—who lived here."

"No. There was no answer to my ring at the bell. The house is dark. They are out, I imagine."

"She is not out," said Darcal, earnestly; "let us go in."

Darcal took hold of the man's arm and gently urged him up the stairs.

They stood together in the darkness of the apartment, heavy with the odour of lilacs. They could hear the little clock on the mantelpiece ticking steadily.

"There is no one here," said Darcal's companion.

"You are mistaken," the murderer answered; "she is here. It is not three hours since I left her. I will show her to you."

Darcal struck a match, and gradually the yellow light pervaded the room, revealing the form of a woman outstretched upon the floor, with her face upturned. Darcal waited until the sulphur of the match had burned away, and then he lighted the gas.

Darcal and the man looked down into the woman's face. The eyes were wide open, now staring up at Darcal, and there was a sinister smile on her lips—a ghastly smile, a smile of triumph and satisfied vengeance.

"Why did you kill her?" inquired the man.

"Because—because I loved her," Darcal answered.

I.

"PITY a grass widow!" sighed Mrs. Vancouver, with a shrug of her shoulders as she turned to Lady Greyland.

"When does your husband return?"

"I cannot say; his business is keeping him longer than he anticipated. If I had known that weeks were to drag into months I should have conquered my prejudice against a sea voyage, and braved the Atlantic."

"I believe Stuart will return unexpectedly and surprise you some day. It would be just like him!" declared Lady Greyland.

"Poor dear fellow, he is longing to be back."

"I don't wonder!" replied her companion, with a critical glance at the fair woman married to her nephew Stuart.

Mrs. Vancouver was conscious of the scrutiny.

"Why do you gaze at me as though I were a vanishing point or a phantom form?"

"You are looking so wonderfully well, my dear."

"That is not surprising. I have lived the stupidest, quietest life imaginable since Stuart left, vegetating in the country, going to bed at ten, and rising at seven. My complexion is due to healthy exercise and a schoolroom diet; not, thank goodness, to the art of my maid. But now I have come to London I shall doubtless be bitten by the season's festivities, and then——"

She broke off shortly, resting her chin on the tip of her fan, while a doubtful expression stole over her face.

"You will lose the country bloom in a week if you plunge into the dissipation as recklessly as you did last year."

"The flowers must fade," laughed Mrs. Vancouver. "And I have a restless nature. It has been perfect pain to me stagnating in Wiltshire."

"You are too fond of making yourself out a butterfly. I hear you have been playing Lady Bountiful, and making Stuart's tenants adore you by a hundred acts of sympathy and kindness."

"Don't believe it," said Ray Vancouver. "If I had their children to tea occasionally, and scandalised the natives by running races in the park, it was only because I have no children of my own to play with."

"You will never learn the inestimable benefit of getting credit for what good you do in the world. You always have an excuse for every virtuous action."

Lady Greyland rose as she spoke.

"Thank you so much," said Mrs. Vancouver, "for dining with a deserted creature like myself. I should have been so melancholy here on the first evening, thinking of the great fathomless ocean between me and my dear boy."

She glanced at a photograph of her husband, and Lady Greyland thought she caught the sound of sobbing in her niece's voice.

"You must go everywhere with me till he is home again," she said fondly. Nevertheless, she left her sad, for Mrs. Vancouver was dissatisfied with life, and pondered deeply as she sat alone in the silent room. Thought is an unaccountable evil which attacks the mind at intervals in quite an unexpected manner.

After mentally dissecting the mysteries of Lady Greyland's teagown, which had made her look so very much slimmer than she really was, and wondering whether microbes lurked in the lips and kissing should be abolished from the face of the earth, Ray wandered back in fancy to the early days of her girlhood. Why had one face risen before her with haunting recollections just when she most wished to blot it from her memory? The face of a man years older than herself, whose will once influenced her so strongly, that had it not been for Stuart she would have linked her fate with his.

Yet her husband never knew or guessed there was anything deeper between them than "friendship," that wide word, comprising such a multitude of contradictions. They were friends still, and in one of her husband's letters she learnt he had met Kenneth Reynolds in America. She thought of the great expanse of water between her and those two men, fancying in the roar of the London traffic she could hear the noisy monotonous thunder of waves, and then the foaming water tearing down the shingle. She seemed to see its bosom heave as with the very passion of unrest, and haunted by the sense of its cruel and omnipotent strength Mrs. Vancouver went wearily to bed.

The following morning she received a letter from Lady Greyland. "Come this afternoon," it ran, "I have a surprise for you."

Ray liked a mystery, and drove to her aunt's house full of anticipation.

She entered the room in the full swing of youthful spirits. Lovers of the picturesque would have fallen down and worshipped Mrs. Vancouver, as she drew back involuntarily, in her Liberty gown and wide-brimmed hat, a tremulous smile parting her lips.

A man rose and met her gaze. In her he recognised the girl of three summers ago! The sunlight had fallen on her where she stood, touching her reddish brown hair of the tint known as Venetian, with which is generally associated sea-green eyes and a snow-white throat. There was something of an underlying fire in her expression as she turned to Lady Greyland.

"You were right," she said, "this is a surprise! I thought Mr. Reynolds was in America."

"He only returned yesterday, and as he has so lately seen Stuart I thought you would like to meet him."

"So kind of you!" she murmured extending her hand. "Well! what news of my truant husband?"

Mrs. Vancouver spoke flippantly.

"I met him at a dance given by Mrs. Graeme, a well-known lady novelist in New York. He was talking to a dowager who weighs sixteen stone, and mingles irrelevant gush and ponderous jocularity in her conversation."

"Then I need not be jealous," laughed Ray.

Kenneth looked her straight in the face but did not reply. Something in his eyes troubled her.

"Stuart seems enjoying himself at any rate," put in Lady Greyland somewhat tactlessly; "but then the Americans are noted for hospitality, and he is bound to be a favourite wherever he goes."

"It is a mistake to have a fascinating husband," declared Mrs. Vancouver, with the same forced gaiety of voice and manner.

"Did he look well?"

"Oh! in the very best of health and spirits," replied Kenneth Reynolds. His tone implied that Mr. Vancouver was not pining for his wife's presence.

"I suppose he must amuse himself, poor dear!" she said. "It would be dreadful moping in a huge hotel alone."

Her eyes were slightly averted from Kenneth's, while her smile faded. He seemed suddenly aware of her depression, and shot a kindly glance of sympathy across the delicate china cups among which Lady Greyland's slim hands were moving.

"Sugar and cream?" she asked, but Mrs. Vancouver did not reply. Unconscious of her silence the words re-echoed in her ears—"sugar and cream."

"Kenneth is like a bird of ill omen," she thought.

Once more she looked at the brocaded chairs and silver tea-tray—they were quite familiar to her, yet engrossed her attention. The chairs were rather vivid in their colouring, and she could see Kenneth's face in the tray?"

"What are you thinking of?" asked Lady Greyland.

"Nothing of any importance," replied Ray, plunging suddenly into a hundred items of gossip, such as she knew rejoiced her aunt's heart and disgusted her friend—that friend of three summers ago.

II.

THE faint suspicion which sprang to life in Ray's heart when Mr. Reynolds first spoke of her husband increased tenfold as the days wore on. She never saw him without an uncomfortable feeling that he knew more than he cared to own, and was concealing something painful yet of grave importance. Stuart's prolonged absence increased the doubts and fears for which she reproached herself every hour of the day.

Kenneth Reynold's reserve on the subject troubled her, for he seldom spoke of Mr. Vancouver, and always appeared glad to turn the conversation, at the same time endeavouring to cheer her loneliness by a hundred delicate, unobtrusive acts of kindness. If he wondered at the pallor of her cheeks, and the lines beneath her eyes, he said nothing, and for a while Ray welcomed silence gratefully. But the strain of uncertainty was telling on her, and at last his very reticence drove her to despair.

He had come to call late one afternoon, and found her seated in her favourite attitude when she had some serious subject to consider, her hands clasped, her eyes looking fixedly upwards, and her body thrown backwards in a long, low chair.

"Why are you so depressed?" he asked in his mellow voice, which seemed to invite confidence.

Mrs. Vancouver tapped her foot on the ground impatiently, while the tears sprang into her eyes. She saw in his question the possibility of ending her horrible speculations on Stuart's absence. One moment she forced herself to take a hopeful view of life, making good resolutions, and struggling vainly to think no evil. But "Doubt" with its black whispers, renewed the attack, and Ray found herself laying her harassed mind bare before this man, and telling him her secret thoughts which, in more peaceful moments, she would have given her soul to recall.

When first she spoke to him her face looked slightly worn with fatigue in the twilight, but as he rose to leave her it was livid and haggard. She had wrung the cruel truth from his lips, and watched her idol totter from his lofty pedestal, leaving uncovered the feet of clay. Yet still she could hardly believe the cruel rumour that dispelled her girlish illusions.

That Stuart could have wearied of her, and so far forgotten his marriage vows as to sin irretrievably, seemed too hideous and impossible. She had drawn the truth from Kenneth's unwilling lips, though his wish to spare her pain made the task a hard one. The cruel facts lay before her in crude incredible plainness, while she sat staring in hopeless apathy.

"What can I do?" she asked, in a low hollow voice.

"I hardly know how to advise you," he murmured, "but of course you would never go to America yourself and discover——"

"The truth!" she ejaculated, "why not? How can I stay here with this cloud upon my life?"

"Whatever you decide on is sure to be right," he replied. "All that I have told you is, so far as it is possible for anyone to speak with certainty, perfectly true. God grant that you may find it otherwise."

Ray determined upon her plan of action quickly, restraining from any comments on the accusations against her husband, and simply stating her intention of leaving England by the next mail.

"You have an iron will—an iron nerve," said Kenneth Reynolds with admiring wonder. "But you are too young and beautiful to travel alone unprotected, and arrive friendless in a strange country." A look of fear crept into her eyes as she thought of the unknown future.

"Alone!" The word held terrors innumerable.

"By the next mail, did you say?" he asked.

She bowed her head.

"I have some American friends crossing at that time—a lady with two daughters. I could give you an introduction."

Mrs. Vancouver tried to express her thanks.

"I am returning to New York at the beginning of next month," he continued; "but if you decide finally upon this step, I can go by the same mail, and be on the spot if you should need me. Let me take all responsibility off your hands, book your passage, and place you under the care of my friends."

"You are too good," she stammered, "but I would rather no one knew my movements."

"No one in England, naturally. They would worry you with ceaseless questions, and, for the time being, your secret must be kept closely. But my friends would know nothing, and I will do everything in my power to further your comfort and convenience."

Again she thanked him falteringly, and held out her hand. He pressed it fervently as he bade her good-bye.

The door closed. Alone she stood, for all the world meant but that one word to her then. Her heart's uneven beating seemed to cease suddenly, while the stillness closed round her motionless figure as a wall entombing life. For a single second she was back in the past, dreaming a girl's fancies, hoping a girl's hopes. Then the weary vigil of the woman who has loved and been awakened commenced, and Ray laughed ironically, the jealous anger and bitter resentment in her heart burnt to ashes of despair.

III.

MRS. VANCOUVER was standing in the old-fashioned hall of her country house, speaking to Kenneth Reynolds.

"I have arranged everything for a long absence," she said. "Heaven knows when I may set foot in the old home again! Yet no one has any idea I am leaving England to-morrow, except yourself."

"That is well. Have you received the letter you were expecting from Stuart?"

"No; he cannot have written by this mail. Till now he has kept up the farce."

Her face grew hard, and she paced the floor with the restlessness of some untamable creature.

"I am afraid you were annoyed with me for coming down to-day, but I was most anxious to see you."

"What does it matter; what does anything matter?"

"To-night you sleep in town?"

"Yes; I am going up by the afternoon train."

"So am I, and will drive with you to the station if you have no objection."

Mrs. Vancouver consented reluctantly.

As the sound of wheels approached, she looked with burning eyes at the dog-cart in which she had so often driven her husband, feeling that Kenneth's presence was an intrusion. But Kenneth had known well how to make himself necessary to her in those days of misery, when from sheer weakness she felt unable to enter into mortal combat against fate without the strong hand of a clever man. From his point of view women were anomalies, their hearts outweighed their brains, and even the most reasonable lost their heads in times of emergency. Without her knowledge, he had studied Ray's nature, and could influence it at will.

"This is all so like a bad dream," she said, gathering up the reins, and averting her head from Kenneth as he sprang to her side. She was vexed that his presence brought her the slightest comfort.

"Strained to a certain point feeling becomes numbness," he said, as though reading her thoughts.

He looked at the darkly circled eyes, and the lips closed in a hard line. What would he not have given to see them smile? Hardly had the thought passed through his mind than they parted involuntarily.

"Why do you smile?" he whispered.

The colour rose to her cheeks, while she flashed on him a look of surprise.

"I don't know," she replied. "I felt compelled." Her fingers seemed to relax their firm hold on the horse, and a sensation of faintness crept over her. The fresh young mare plunged forward, some children throwing stones startling her at that very moment.

At first Ray hardly noticed what had happened till she was conscious of the swift rush of air in her face. On—on—they dashed, defiance in the mare's snorting nostrils, and vice in her wild eyes. Mrs. Vancouver rose to her feet, realising she had lost control, and pulling at the reins with a mighty effort. Seeing the danger Kenneth added his strength to hers. A sudden snap—a cry from the woman—a groan from the man—and they grasped the broken leather in mute horror and amazement!

"Save me!" she cried. "For pity's sake save me!"

Her words woke him to fresh action. With a bound he leapt from the swaying cart straight on to the horse's back, and groped for the broken reins flapping in the wind. For a second she watched him grasp the harness, then roll to the ground half-caught in a loose rein, which dragged him under the clattering hoofs of the infuriated beast.

Blind, dumb, and deaf with horror, she still clung to the seat, dimly seeing a tall figure in the road that darted forward and wrestled with the horse's head. The rapid motion ceased, and with it the unbearable throbbing of her temples, as she sprang thankfully from her perilous position to the safe, firm earth. Two strong arms clasped her tremblingly—fervently, and Ray was sobbing on her husband's breast.

"Oh! My darling! My darling! Are you hurt?"

The words were simple enough, but they rang out in agonised intensity.

"No," she gasped. "No! But what of him?" pointing to the senseless figure of a man lying face downwards in the mud of the country road.

Stuart raised the heavy body and looked long into the blood-stained face.

"Poor fellow," he murmured compassionately. "I am afraid he is terribly injured, and you were coming to meet me too. If only you had not received my letter in time! Stay with him, Ray, while I run for a doctor. Here, help me to get him to the bank and hold his forehead—so."

"Run quickly, dear," she murmured. "There may not be much time."

Too bewildered to wonder at her husband's re-appearance, Ray sat half-dazed under the sweet-smelling hedge. Kenneth moved faintly and opened his eyes.

"What has happened?" he asked.

"Stuart is here—Stuart," she said.

"Stuart!" he cried, trying to raise himself, but sinking back with a moan.

"Ray," he whispered, "bend down, I am dying, but I must speak. Can you hear me?"

"Yes, yes."

"It was all a lie, Ray,—that—that story against your husband. I was scheming to get you away—alone—with me. I—I loved you—forgive——"

The words came singly and faintly on the summer air, "Forgive!"

He murmured them again and again as the life ebbed slowly out of vein and pulse, and a miserable sinner sank down—down—down into deep waters.

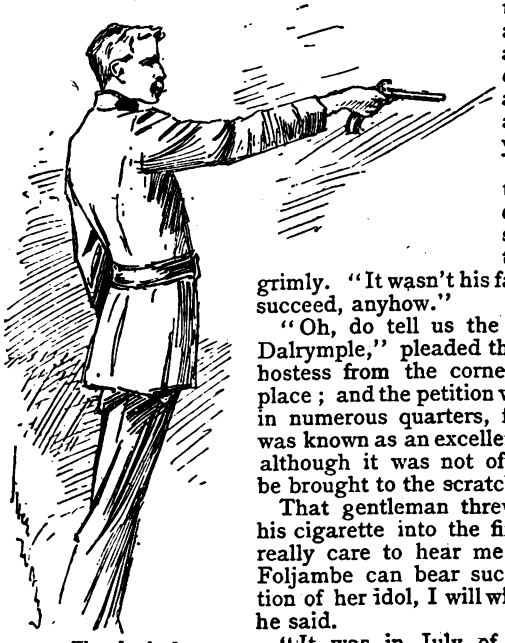
TOLD BY THE MAJOR.

THE morning after the dance at Arden Tower last month was a drencher, and no mistake; there was no getting out of doors except under the penalty of the most complete soaking. Perhaps one's natural disinclination to face the unpropitious elements was heightened by that feeling of comfortable lassitude which seems invariably to impregnate the mental atmosphere of a country house on the morrow of a Terpsichorean festival; anyhow, as one by one the house party, after a late breakfast, sauntered into the old oak-paneled central hall, with its huge open hearth, on which the great logs blazed cheerfully with many a crackle and splutter, each dropped lazily into a comfortable arm-chair, and, after one glance at the rain-blurred windows, settled down resignedly to a quiet morning indoors, with hardly a regretful thought in the direction of their host's well-stocked coverts, or his amply-furnished stables.

"Well," said Miss Foljambe—a pretty, sparkling brunette, and an enthusiastic votary of Diana—"I don't care. He may be as foolishly in love with that handsome old wife of his as you assert, Mr. Elton; but if a tithe of the young men of the present day were destined in after-life to turn into such sweet, unselfish, kind-hearted old gentlemen as General Fordyce, it would be a better look-out for the world at large than it is now. My only wonder is how ever he got on in his profession; I cannot understand his bringing himself to harm any living creature."

"They would have told you a different tale in India thirty years ago, Miss Foljambe," remarked a tall, dark man seated nearly in the centre of the group. "It was before my time, of course, but even now, 'Fordyce' is a name that carries a terrible meaning to many a native. He had totted up a pretty heavy score to his own bat before 1859 came to an end. Did you ever hear how he came to shoot his wife?"

"Shoot his wife! Major Dalrymple," exclaimed the startled young lady. "Good gracious! what do you mean? My dear old General kill a woman? He couldn't do such a horrible thing! You are laughing at me; but I don't think it a nice joke at all, I can tell you."



Then he fired.

"Well, he tried hard enough to do so," replied the Major, grimly. "It wasn't his fault he didn't succeed, anyhow."

"Oh, do tell us the story, Major Dalrymple," pleaded the voice of his hostess from the corner of the fireplace; and the petition was re-echoed in numerous quarters, for the Major was known as an excellent raconteur, although it was not often he could be brought to the scratch.

That gentleman threw the end of his cigarette into the fire. "If you really care to hear me, and if Miss Foljambe can bear such a desecration of her idol, I will with pleasure," he said.

"It was in July of that terrible year 1857, the year that will be remembered in many an English and Indian home with bitterest sorrow—ay, and with heartfelt pride, too. The hideous fate of hundreds of English women and children, the almost superhuman gallantry of the handful of British troops against the overwhelming hordes of mutinous demons of cruelty, will never be forgotten while history lives. All the details of that fearful struggle we shall never know. Many a little garrison of now almost forgotten posts fought like heroes, though their ultimate annihilation leaves no record of the deeds that would have ranked beside those of the defenders and rescuers of Lucknow had any living creature survived to tell the tale.

"Among the miniature sieges, these mad despairing conflicts, where men fought with the reckless courage of desperation to save those they loved from a doom too hideous to bear thinking of, was the one which is the scene of my little story.

"Of the little garrison of Beinapoor, eight hours after the first attack of the mutineers, who thirsted to avenge their imaginary wrongs and glut their bestial ferocity on that devoted handful of Europeans, there remained only fifteen men of the A Company of the 120th Regiment, Captain Gerald Fordyce, and half-a-dozen native servants who had been faithful to their salt.

"Inch by inch, they had been driven from one line of defence to another, every hour bearing its token to the fury of the struggle in the shape of dead or dying comrades; and now nothing was left for them but to make their last hopeless stand in the open central court of the large building which had served as a barrack for the detachment. There was hardly a cartridge left of their little store of ammunition, and only a few feeble barricades interposed between them and their yelling assailants. Many of the small band were wounded, and, even as they stood there, awaiting their inevitable doom, but prepared to sell their lives as dearly as brave men may, some of their number dropped helpless and feeble to the ground, exhausted by fatigue and loss of blood.

"Saddest sight of all was the white, drawn face of a fair young girl, who stood in their midst, clasping with both slender hands the arm of Gerald Fordyce as she looked up into his eyes with a mute but terrible appeal in her own. It was the face of his bride of a few short weeks.

"'You have one cartridge left in your revolver, Gerald,' she said in a hoarse whisper. 'I claim it. I must not fall into their hands alive, remember. You can save me from that horror, at least. Oh, my darling, my darling! swear to me by the love we bear each other that it shall be as I ask. Even death from your dear hand——.'

"She ceased, and a terrible shudder shook his strong frame from head to foot as he looked down into those deep, loving, appealing eyes, his own wild with the torture of that awful choice. Then he turned away and hid his face from her, as the fate of the woman he loved so fondly at the hands of the shrieking, bloodthirsty throng that clamoured at the barricades pictured itself to his imagination.

"'Promise me, Gerald,' she repeated. 'When all hope is gone and the last moment comes—promise!'

"'I promise, love,' he said at last, in so low a whisper that it almost failed to reach her ears. 'I swear it.'

"Then he turned to his men with a few words of praise and encouragement—but, alas! what room was left for hope now?

"They had not long to wait. A very few minutes sufficed for the demolition of the feeble obstructions to the mutineers' progress. A crash or two, some dropping shots, and then with frantic yells of triumph that fiendish crew swarmed into the court.

"The moment had come. Gerald Fordyce strained his wife in his arms, close, close, and covered her face with mad, despairing kisses; then he stood off a few paces and levelled the revolver at that beloved head.

"'Ah! no,' she cried, with a woman's terror of disfigurement. 'Not my face, Gerald! My heart—here!'

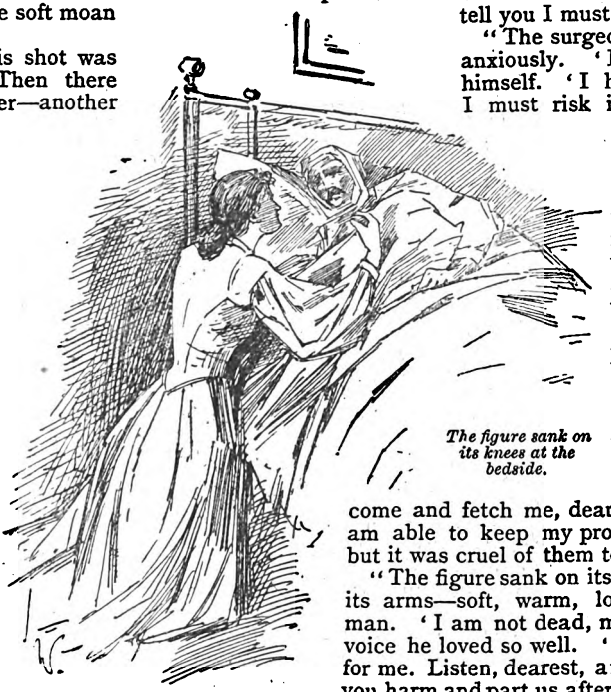
"He changed his aim. 'I shall not be long after you,' he muttered. 'Farewell, Muriel.'

"Then he fired, and with a little soft moan she fell at his feet.

"Hark! What was that? His shot was echoed by a volley outside. Then there came the sound of a British cheer—another—and yet another.

"Captain Fordyce threw up his hands in frantic horror. 'Rescued!' he cried, and his voice rang with intolerable agony. 'Oh, God! what have I done? Too late—too late!'

"Then the steel waved around his head, and, silent despair on his white, set features, he rushed at the mob of sepoys in front of him, determined to rejoin in death the woman he had slain.



The figure sank on its knees at the bedside.

"Many weeks have elapsed, and a surgeon is bending anxiously over a little cot in the temporary improvised hospital at Beinapoor. 'By the Lord Harry! he's pulled through after all,' mutters the gallant medico to himself as the patient's eyes slowly opened, and with a feeble and totally ineffectual effort to raise himself he sinks back again on the pillows, his head and limbs one complicated mass of bandages. 'I believe he's conscious at last.'

"Gerald Fordyce looked about him. 'What is all this?' he whispered faintly. 'Where am I?'

"'On the high road to recovery, I hope, my dear fellow,' is the cheerful reply. 'It's been the deuce and all to keep the life in you, but I've succeeded somehow. You must keep perfectly quiet—do you hear?—perfectly quiet, or you'll slip through my fingers after all.'

"Gradually recollection came back to the sorely wounded man, but with recollection came, alas! despair.

"'Life?' he murmured feebly, while a look of horror gathered on his features. 'Why could you not let me die in peace? Life? And Muriel dead by my hand. Let me be. I tell you I must die—I will die.'

"The surgeon looked at him attentively and anxiously. 'I had forgotten that,' he said to himself. 'I had forgotten. Well, I suppose I must risk it. The shock may kill him, but it is his only chance. If he goes on like this he will die before sunset to a certainty.'

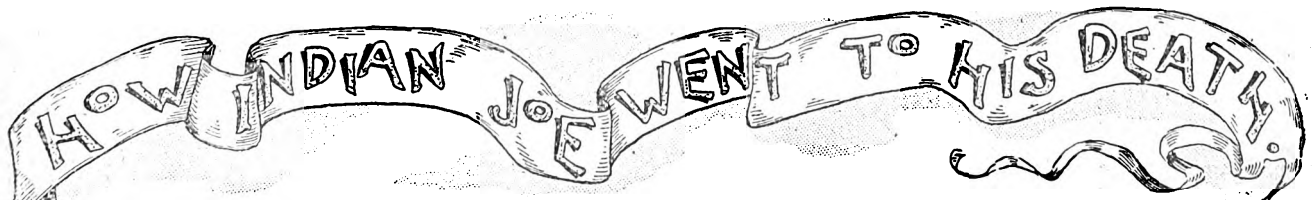
"Then he turned and beckoned to a figure at the other end of the room—a figure that rose, trembling with overpowering anxiety, and approached the cot in obedience to his summons.

"'You must be calm,' he whispered. 'Be a brave girl and we shall save him yet.'

"Captain Fordyce turned his poor bandaged face and saw the figure standing beside him. 'Muriel!' he whispered faintly. 'Muriel! How good of you to come and fetch me, dear. I shan't be long now before I am able to keep my promise. They meant it for the best, but it was cruel of them to try and keep me from you.'

"The figure sank on its knees at the bedside and wreathed its arms—soft, warm, loving arms—around the wounded man. 'I am not dead, my darling,' came to his ear in the voice he loved so well. 'You must live, Gerald—not die—for me. Listen, dearest, and be very, very quiet, or it may do you harm and part us after all. I am afraid you are a very bad shot, Gerald, even at so short a distance, for you only wounded me when you fired. They cured me a week ago, and I am strong and well again, and able to nurse you. See! Lay your poor battered head here, my husband, and rest. Oh, Gerald! I am so happy.'

"And that, Miss Foljambe, was how your pet General came to shoot his wife," concluded the Major.



ONE night, on coming to my tent from my claim in the gulch, I found the following note, scrawled on the back of a blank location notice, sticking in a cleft stick in front of the tent:—

"Git yer hoss an gun an come down to the store az soon az yer git this. Biznes of importance. COMMITTEE."

I knew what it meant, an all-night ride—possibly several days and nights—so I set about getting my supper and frying an extra quantity of bacon. Supper over, I wrapped the surplus bacon and a few squares of pilot bread in a bandana, tied it with a canteen to the saddle, and fastened down the tent fly. Then, taking up my rifle and saddle, I went to where my horse was picketed, and, saddling, was soon at the store, some three-quarters of a mile down the gulch.

The "store" was only a big wall tent at the forks of the cañon, and the stock consisted only of rough wearing apparel for miners, coffee, sugar, flour, pilot bread, bacon, frijoles (beans), tobacco, and a few kegs of whiskey, all packed into the camp on burros. A group of miners, all armed and some mounted, were gathered about the front of the tent; while to one side lay the figure of a man, the upper part of his body covered with a blanket.

"What's the trouble, boys?" I asked, as I rode up.

Two or three jerked their thumbs in the direction of the blanketed figure.

"Who is it?"

"Albany."

Albany was a man from New York State and a native of its capital, upon whose beauties and wealth he was always descanting and planning what he would do on his return there after having "made his pile." This had earned for him the sobriquet of "Albany." No one knew his other name, or if they had it was forgotten, and "Albany" answered the purpose as well as Tom Jones or John Smith.

I dismounted, and, going to the prostrate figure, turned back the blanket. Yes, it was Albany. His skull was crushed in a fearful manner, and his hair and the lower part of his beard matted with congealed blood. The boys had washed the grime and blood from his face in order to recognise the features.

"Who did it?"

"Dunno, unless 'twas Injun Joe: he's the only man missin' from camp. Jimson an' Kaintuck foun' Albany a layin' in front ov his tent with his head busted open. His hoss was gone, an' the tent had been ransacked, an' his gun, best clo'es, an' a lot ov grub took. Jimson come back an' got a hoss an' they brought him down here; then they started out to give the word while some ov the boys went up to fin' the trail.

"They's a lot ov barefooted tracks aroun', an' some ov 'em's made in the blood wha' his head laid, but none lead away. That don't go fer nothin' though, 'cause Albany's shoes is gone. They foun' the trail ov the hoss, an' it led over the hog back, down Toughnut gulch, in Coyote Pass, an' out on the desert towards t'other mountains. It pinted towards Stinkin' Wells. He's got purty nigh twelve hours start, an'll prob'ly camp thar to-night, makin' Mule Spring to-morrer night."

During this brief statement others had come up, until all the miners in the camp, something less than one hundred, were present. According to the custom we divided into five groups, and a slip of paper for every man in each group was thrown into a hat. On one slip in each hat was written "Go"; the others were blank. The men drawing the "Go" slips formed the vigilance committee to accompany the captain on the pursuit. I drew a "Go."

The captain gave orders to have all of Albany's camp outfit brought down to the store, and after adding to our scant supplies we filled our canteens at the spring, and filed away down the gulch to take up the trail at the foot of Coyote Pass.

In the dim light we discerned the hoofprints of the horse, evidently riding at a gallop and headed directly for Stinking Wells, the next water-hole. Paying no more attention to the trail, we rode away into the desert night straight for the wells. Indian Joe was a half-breed, who never acknowledged his tribal origin, but drifted about from one mining camp to another, picking up a precarious livelihood.

He was not known as a bad Indian, could be safely trusted with any message or to do any errand, and no miner where he was known would object to giving a meal, or several of them, if necessary. In fact, he was good-natured and harmless as Indians go, and it seemed almost impossible that he could have committed so foul a crime, yet the circumstantial evidence was too strong to admit of doubt.

It was early dawn when we rode up to the few cotton woods that surrounded the wells, or more properly the "sink" of tepid water. There was evidence of a recent camp, and down under the ashes were two or three half-dead coals, showing that the camp had been abandoned several hours before. We had breakfasted in the saddle, and after a brief council we decided to camp there for the day.

The trail of our quarry led straight for Mule Spring, in the mountains, miles away across that level stretch of desert. He had the advantage in knowing that pursuit could come but from one direction. If he had reached the mountains he would have no difficulty in seeing us far out on that level, and by abandoning his horse he could safely laugh at his pursuers. We figured it out that he would reach Mule Spring possibly that night, and would camp there. By travelling at night we would not only avoid the heat and the chance of being seen, but make more rapid progress, and by hard riding hope to reach the spring before he broke camp in the morning.

The sun had been up an hour as we began the ascent of a "hog back," beyond which in the cañon below was Mule Spring. A noise in the bushes to the right attracted our attention; there browsing on the leaves was Albany's horse.

There was no mistaking the raw-boned pinto, with the peculiarly blazed face. The saddle had been removed, and a lariat around his neck picketed him to the bushes. Indian Joe was still in camp at the spring, but why picket his horse away off here? We would soon know.

As we spurred our jaded horses up the ridge, a scattering volley of rifle shots was fired from somewhere over the cañon, and little clouds of dust were knocked up near a heap of rocks on the summit of the ridge. A puff of bluish white smoke arose from among the boulders, and the report of a single shot came down to us on the morning air.

As we neared the top we dismounted and ran, in a stooping posture, up the rocks, our rifles ready. Indian Joe turned from watching the cañon below, between two boulders, a grim smile on his swarthy face, his white teeth showing like a wolf's through his scraggy black moustache.

"Buenos, dias, amigos. You have ridden hard and well."

"You air our prisoner, Joe," said the captain.

"Bueno. Take me away from here and I will thank you, señor."

"What's the trouble?"

"Apache Kid and a dozen of his cowardly coyotes are on the other side of the cañon; they were fifteen," and again that grim smile passed over his face.

"But you air a Injun; what are they after you for?"

"Yes, but, gracias a Dios, I am not an Apache. Besides, have I not a gun, cartridges, and a horse? I picketed my horse below there in the bushes last night and made my camp here among the rocks to watch for your approach, my amigos, and was awake long before the day. As the night went deeper into the cañon I saw about the spring Kid and his band. At the same time they found my trail and that of the horse, and followed it straight for the rocks, but not far. Two lie below us at the foot of the hill; on the rocks across yonder you may see another."

Hardly had he finished when another scattering volley came from the cliffs opposite; the bullets, glancing from the rocks, went singing away in other directions. With an oath, Jimson laid aside his rifle and clasped his left forearm with his right hand. Turning back the sleeve of his rough woollen shirt, we found a jagged hole in the flesh, torn by a glancing bullet. With part of the water left in Joe's canteen we moistened a spot in the dry earth, and, plastering the wound with mud, bandaged it with the bandana from around his neck.

Then we flattened ourselves behind the rocks and waited. We were in for a fight, that was evident. The murderous renegade, Kid, was not the sort to retreat before our small force, leaving his three dead unavenged. It was useless for us to try to escape; our horses were tired out, while his were fresh. He knew that his single enemy had been reinforced, but our thirsty horses having already crossed the divide to the spring told him how small the force was.

On the opposite side we occasionally caught sight of a red blanket inviting a shot, which was replied to from a dozen seemingly inaccessible places. "There's only one thing to do," said the captain. "We've got ter stay here an' try ter keep 'em off tel night, an' then make a sneak fer camp, pervidin' they don't git our hosses." However, the latter had already drunk their fill, and were coming back over the hog back to graze.

As the day wore on the sun's power increased, and beat down upon us with terrible force. The rocks were blistering hot, and the heat radiated from them with scorching effect. Our thirst grew intolerable.

Our canteens had been emptied during the night ride, and Joe's contained less than a half-pint, which we carefully treasured against an emergency. There was not a bush or weed for shade among the boulders, nothing but the blistering rocks and the hot, dry earth.

Somewhere about noon Kaintuck carelessly exposed his shoulder for a moment, and had it badly cut by a bullet. The mud poultice required for the wound took the last of the water in Joe's canteen. By three o'clock in the afternoon the wounded men were almost crazed for water, which we could see purling about the rocks in the bottom of the cañon less than one hundred yards below, and the sight only increased the thirst of all.

Joe was the only man who did not complain, but lay flat on his stomach motionless, save when he lowered his head to glance between the sights of his rifle, or to throw another cartridge into the barrel.

There was absolutely no shelter in the cañon by which the spring could be reached. Nothing but the bare, brown hill-side, the sandy bed of the cañon strewn with small boulders, the spring, and one hundred yards beyond the cliffs with death lurking at every point of vantage. A horned toad could not have hopped unseen at any spot in the entire distance.

"I've got ter hev some water," muttered Jimson between his teeth.

Joe turned his head.

"There is a spring a mile or two up the cañon," he said to the captain. "I can take the canteens, and, by slipping back down the hill, can go and come with water in less than an hour."

The captain grinned sarcastically. "Putty good scheme, Joe, but 'twon't work. We've got you, an' we're all goin' ter see this thing through tergether." Joe silently turned his face back to the crevice between the boulders and resumed his watch.

An hour passed. Picking up a canteen, Kaintuck, crazed with thirst, half started to his feet, but was jerked down by the captain just in time to escape a volley.

"Whar you goin'!"

"I've got ter hav some water, an' I'm goin' ter the spring," replied Kaintuck, struggling to free his unwounded shoulder from the firm grip.

"No, señor, I will go."

Kaintuck stopped struggling, and we gazed at Joe in surprise. "It air almost sure death," at last said the captain.

Joe looked him square in the eyes for an instant, then shrugged his shoulders. "Yes, señor;" but we understood. Taking four canteens, he tied two cartridges about the neck of each. "I will throw the canteens in the spring, the cartridges will pull the mouths below the water; while they are filling I will try to keep them from being hit. You must keep up a constant firing and hope for my return."

As he arose to his knees he said, "I will tell you the truth. I killed Albany. I wanted tobacco; he refused me; we were both drunk. I went to take the tobacco, and he struck me; I knocked him down, and he drew his revolver; but I struck him with a club before he could shoot. The sight of his blood maddened me, and—you know the rest." He gathered up the straps of the canteens. "I am going. Will you say good-bye?" Silently each man extended his hand, but the copper-coloured one was the steadiest of the lot.

Crouching, he sprang over the barricade of boulders with an "Adios, amigos," and went leaping like a mountain lion down the bare slope. He was at the spring before the Apaches had recovered from their suprise. Throwing the canteens in the water, he began a series of gyrations about the spring, his steps timed by some weird song which we did not understand, but which evidently maddened the Apaches, who at once began a rapid fire on the dancer. Some paid dearly for the reckless exposure of their persons.

In a few moments Joe made a sweep with his hands and came bounding back up the slope, two canteens in each hand. We were too much excited to continue our fusillade into the cliffs beyond. With every nerve strained and breath suspended we lay there and watched every step of that dark-skinned figure running through the hail of death for our lives and his. On he staggers; another crash from the rifles; down he goes, struggles to rise, but fails, and holding the canteens upright tries to drag himself towards us. There was a clatter among the rocks as rifles were cast aside, and, forgetting their thirst and wounds, six men leaped over the boulders and ran to the fallen Indian, who, gasping on the hillside, still held the canteens so that the water would not spill.

Four of us grabbed him in our arms, Jimson and Kaintuck took the canteens, and we ran to the rocks. As we did so there was a chorus of yells from the cliffs, and the number of shots seemed redoubled, but we gained the shelter of our barricade unhurt, and laid our burden down tenderly.

"——El agua—did—you——." We held a canteen to his lips, but he turned away his head. "No—muy poco (very little)—save it."

There was absolutely no hope for him. He had been literally shot to pieces. His right arm and shoulder were shattered; another bullet had struck him in the kidneys, and two more had gone straight through him, from back to front. He lay there gasping for a few moments, then suddenly raised himself on his left elbow, tried to speak, his limbs straightened convulsively, and—Albany was avenged.

We moved the body to one side, out of the way. The captain picked up a canteen and, removing his hat, bowed his bared head towards Joe in silent acknowledgment, and after drinking passed the canteen. Having satisfied our thirst we took up our rifles, and the monotonous firing continued.

"Tan-a-ra, tan-a-ra, tan-a-ra," came the clear notes of a bugle down the gulch, just after a volley, and a squad of troops galloped round a bend in the cañon on the trail of the renegade Kid. Then there was a scattering on the cliffs, and we had our innings at the scurrying Indians.

"The surgeon is with the ambulance two miles below if you need him!" yelled the lieutenant in command, as dismounting the squad he took to the mountains in pursuit. We went down to the spring and waited for the ambulance to come up. Our captain borrowed a pick and shovel, and while the surgeon dressed the wounds of Jimson and Kaintuck the rest of us dug a grave for Joe among the rocks were he died.

It was nearly finished when the surgeon and our two comrades came up. "That's right, dig it deep; I see he is an Indian," said the surgeon. The captain straightened up in the grave, a reproving look on the face. "Yes, sir, he air only a Injun, but he died like a man."

Wrapping Joe in his blankets, we lowered his stiffening body into the grave with our lariats. Then we stood silent and gazed at the captain. He thought for a moment, and, removing his old weather-beaten hat, said:

"I dunno what ter say, boys, but I've heerd ur read som'ers that greater love hath no man than this."

Then we filled the grave, heaped it round with boulders to protect it from the coyotes, and, picking up our rifles, turned to depart. But evidently a thought of other days came over our old captain, for he paused, his blue-shirted figure straightened to its full height, and the heels of his rough mining boots came together with a chug. "Halt!" One look at him, and at least four of the party knew what was coming. "'Tention, squad! Ready! Fire!" and a soldier's last salute rang out on the evening air. Then we started back for camp across that weary stretch of desert.

Now, whenever I receive a word from the "committee," I see a bare, brown hill-top, and on its summit a rounded heap of stones, from which little clouds of bluish-white smoke are slowly drifting.

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Syren of the Skies," &c.

THE allotted forty-eight hours passed and no answer came back. As the forty-eighth struck, the two fleets of twenty-four vessels each, headed as before by the War-Hawk and Volante, rose into the air from Hyde Park and winged their way at a hundred miles an hour, the former to St. Petersburg and the latter to Paris. Before the last extremities were resorted to a second message was delivered to each city, repeating the terms of the former with the additional intimation that the indemnity would be increased a hundred millions for every day of delay and that the bombardment would begin within an hour.

But before a quarter of the hour was up both cities were in a state of utter panic and disorder. The terrible experiences, still fresh in the popular mind, of what the Anarchists had done under similar circumstances, made the mere sight of the air-ships, circling slowly in small divisions over the cities, with their guns pointing downwards, ahead, and astern, and the muzzles of the Maxims peeping from the port-holes in their broadsides, sufficient to drive the inhabitants into a frenzy of fear which made it impossible for the authorities to control them.

Vast throngs half mad with fear filled the streets and squares, besieging the Government buildings and demanding surrender on any terms, since absolutely certain destruction was the only alternative to it. But the authorities in both St. Petersburg and Paris could do nothing without the consent of the Tsar and the President, and the Tsar was at Posen preparing for an advance on Berlin, while the President was at Strassburg inspecting the now triumphant army of the Rhine which had driven the Germans out of Alsace and Lorraine.

Telegrams had been despatched to both on the first appearance of the air-ships, and the reply to the one from Paris was received just as the hour was expiring. Then a war balloon with a white flag flying from the car rose from the Garden of the Tuilleries; the Volante sank down to meet it, also flying a white flag, and Adams had a brief interview with the General in command of the city, who had ascended to meet him. The General informed him that the President had communicated with the Tsar, and that both refused to comply with the demand of the Syndicate. It was, therefore, impossible for Paris to make terms for France.

"Very well," said Adams. "Then I will spare Paris for the present, as it is helpless; but the President shall learn the cost of his refusal in Strassburg, and if he then persists Paris must prepare for its fate, for we are determined to bring the war to an end at any price."

Three hours later the fleet ranged itself in five divisions over the ancient city of Strassburg, which was thronged with troops in the full flush of victory. No warning was given this time, for it had already been telegraphed from Paris. The moment the ships were in position the work of death began.

It was short, sharp, and terrible. The streets were swept with incessant storms of Maxim bullets, and shells began bursting in fifty parts of the city at once. The air-ships flew to and fro far beyond the range of terrestial weapons, and in an hour the city lay little better than one vast shambles under the hurricane of death and destruction that had swept over it. At the end of an hour a white flag was hauled up the spire of the Cathedral, and the firing instantly ceased.

The Volante descended, and when she rose again, half-an-hour after, Adams had in his pocket the written consent of the President to an armistice of ten days between France and Britain, during which terms of peace were to be arranged. He then took his fleet back to London, replenished his fuel and ammunition, and the next morning he was far on his way to Posen and St. Petersburg to form a junction with the other fleets in case the Tsar had not consented to the terms accepted by his ally.

At Posen he found the whole Russian force, amounting to more than a million and a half of men, beginning the advance on Berlin under cover of a fleet of a hundred aerostats similar to those which Renault had destroyed over the Baltic. He took in the situation at a glance, and at once flew the signal to engage.

It was in vain that the huge, slow-moving aerostats tried first to cope with, and then to escape from, the agile cruisers of the air. One after another they were blown up by the shells, or sent, riddled and crippled, to the earth. When half of them had been destroyed, the second division of the Syndicate's fleet appeared on the scene of action from St. Petersburg, which had been spared as Paris had been, and for the same reasons.

The combined squadrons made very short work of the remainder, and as the last one vanished in a mist of flame a message was dropped to the earth calling upon the Tsar, who had watched the destruction of his aerial fleet in impotent rage, to stop his advance and accept the same terms that France had accepted. If within half an hour a white flag in token of consent was not upon his head-quarters the forces of the Syndicate would co-operate with the British and German armies before Berlin, and a hundred millions a day would be added to the indemnity until he surrendered. If in despite of this the war was prolonged for more than a week his head-quarters would be destroyed and himself put to death.

The half-hour passed and no white flag appeared; so, without firing another shot, the two squadrons turned westward in the direction of Berlin and the same evening formed a junction with the allied British and German forces. Three days later the final battle of the war was fought. Although the Russians considerably out-numbered the Allies, the loss of the aerostats on the one side and the presence of the air-ships on the other, made the issue a foregone conclusion from the first.

The Voyageur and two other air-ships had been constantly employed bringing fresh fuel and ammunition from London, and so the fleet was able to go fully equipped into the fight. Before their first assault had lasted half an hour the Russian commanders found it utterly impossible to keep even their best troops steady under the rain of shells, bombs, and machine-gun bullets that was hurled upon them from the sky. Wherever a bomb or a shell burst they broke and ran like so many sheep.

The British and German commanders were kept constantly informed of the position of the Russian forces and the havoc that was being wrought upon them, and when the confusion in the Russian ranks was at its height, the allied armies advanced in perfect order upon their demoralised foes. To a battle fought under such conditions there could be only one end. Five hours' fighting saw the complete collapse of the Russian host. From an army it had become a rabble.

A retreat was attempted soon after nightfall, but the search-lights of the air-ships flashed down upon them from the clouds, making their every movement plain to their pursuers, and after a night of indescribable carnage and destruction the Tsar at last surrendered his sword to the German Emperor and accepted terms of peace.

By the expiration of the ten days' armistice these terms were finally settled. France gave up the whole of her African possessions and spheres of influence to Britain and Germany, evacuated Madagascar and Siam, and gave guarantees for the payment of three hundred millions of war indemnity. Russia withdrew all her pretensions in Central Asia south of the 40th parallel of north latitude, the crossing of which, on any pretence, by her troops or allies, was to be for ever considered as a declaration of war.

The Tsar's obstinacy, or his ignorance of the power at the disposal of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate, had increased the Russian indemnity to six hundred millions. Thus eight hundred and fifty millions were practically at the disposal of the Directors of the Syndicate, whose original capital had been a million sterling. Two hundred millions each were given to Britain and Germany to cover the expenses of the war, and the remainder was divided equally among the original subscribers to the Syndicate.

EPILOGUE.

THE NEW UTOPIA.

A YEAR after the signature of the final terms of peace a new State came into existence and took its place among the Powers of the world. This was the State of Oceana, and its jurisdiction extended over all the islands included within the vast parallelogram inclosed by the 30th parallels of North and South latitude and the 120th and 160th meridians of East and West longitude. A glance at the map will show that this includes nearly all those myriads of lovely islands which gem the bosom of the Central and Southern Pacific, and that is equivalent to understanding that the State of Oceana was beyond all comparison the most beautiful realm on earth.

Although it was in every sense a Sovereign State, free and independent of all control or interference on the part of other empires of the world, it was yet entirely unique among them in consequence of the fact that it was without government, politics, or laws in the ordinary acceptation of the terms. It was managed simply as a huge business concern, and its managers were the Directors of what had lately been known as the Aerial Navigation Syndicate.

The various islands had been acquired either by treaty or cession under the terms of peace, or else by purchase. The rights of the native inhabitants, which had been sorely infringed both materially and morally under the alleged "protectorates" of the Powers, which had exploited them chiefly for their own benefit, were restored.

Absolute religious, social, and commercial freedom was proclaimed throughout the whole area of Oceana, subject solely to two restrictions. The natives were forbidden to make war on each other under any circumstances, and any trader or other white person, whether a citizen of Oceana or not, convicted of giving or selling alcohol in any shape to them was to be put to death, as experience had clearly proved that to the Kanaka alcohol is poison.

Subject to this prohibition the trading ships of all nations were admitted on equal terms to the islands, but no war-ship was to be allowed to cross the invisible lines that formed its frontiers on any pretence whatever. The penalty for an attempt would be destruction, and all the nations of the world were given to understand that the Directors of Oceana not only would but could enforce it, for they had at their disposal four aerial fleets numbering a hundred vessels each, and the Powers of the earth did not need telling after what had happened in the war that this was a force capable of dominating the whole world were the policy of the Directors to change from one of peace to one of aggression.

Such was the outcome attained, as we have seen, through many and strange adventures and vicissitudes of the little social colony which had first been conceived in the brain of Edward Adams, and discussed and matured by the modest and obscure society which had called itself the Brotherhood of the Better Life.

Although Oceana possessed neither capital nor seat of government, yet all those who had been chiefly instrumental in achieving its greatness naturally returned to their lovely home in Utopia, there to continue the tranquil and natural existence which had been so rudely interrupted by the involuntary visit of the Calypso three years before. Only one or two changes had been made manifest when the colony once more settled down in its old home, and the nature of two at least of them may be guessed from the few lines that now remain to be written.

It was New Year's day 1901, and the first day of the new century was being celebrated in Utopia as the second anniversary of the foundation of the State of Oceana. Almost exactly such another picnic as had taken place on the fatal first of January two years before was being held on the slopes of Mount Plato, and just before sunset Violet and Dora were standing almost exactly where Dora and the rest had stood at the terrible moment when they saw the air-ship rising above the crater of Mount Orient. They had both been gazing for a little space in silence at the dark oval of the crater when Dora said:

They turned their backs on the darkening crater.

"Whenever I think of all that has passed since then and now I always think also how little people know who say that the age of miracles is past. Who would have thought then that within two years you would be standing here well and strong and the wife of the Lord High Admiral of the Aerial Fleets of Oceana?"

"Or," said Violet, slipping her arm through Dora's, "that a certain fair Socialist would so soon have been transformed into a millionairess, the Lady Bountiful of broad lands in capitalist England, and the wife of a Baronet who might be a Duke if he liked. I think there is quite as much miracle in that, your ladyship."

"If you ever use that horrid term of address again," said Dora, disengaging her arm and stepping back a pace, "I'll never rest until I've worried Harry into going to England and using the whole weight and influence of the State of Oceana in persuading the Queen into making your Admiral a Duke at the very least—and then I'll call you 'Your Grace' every time I meet you. Now come away back to the others, for every moment it grows darker I seem to see the shape of that awful air-ship growing out of the darkness over yonder."

"Don't," said Violet with a shudder, putting her arm round Dora's waist and turning her away.

And with that they turned their backs on the darkening crater and went down to the mountain side with the full glow of the tropical sunset shining in their eyes and lighting up two faces as fair as any that that day's sun had shone upon.

MRS. CASALIS' LAST BALL

UT merciful goodness!" the man cried out, driven to half-crazed desperation. "Don't you understand? Can't you understand? It is ruin! It is complete ruin!"

She stood before him like one of the antique Greek statues, that looked calmly out from jewelled eyes. Her cold mouth curved a little.

"I suppose you mean that our expenditure has been too heavy; that we must retrench. You are dramatic about it—as you are about everything." She shrugged her shoulders. "And you know that I detest the dramatic."

As he saw that still she did not understand, the moisture came out on his forehead.

"No; I do not mean that we must retrench, as you conceive the word, Camilla. I mean that everything is gone."

"Everything?"

"You will not starve. You will have a house over your head. But——"

"Thank you," she smiled ironically. "That is much. Yes, I think I understand now." She turned to the door.

"Camilla!" He called her back. His eyes strained out of his ashen face. "If you knew—if you knew!—how I have struggled against it! For months it has been coming. But I always hoped that I would retrieve all. But one unfortunate investment followed another. Still I would not tell you; I could not—could not! But now I will explain everything to you."

"Oh, pray spare me." She drew aside the folds of her house-robe as if his outstretched hand might seize and detain her. "I wish for no explanation of disagreeable subjects. After the ball I will hear as much of what you may have to say as I care to know—though speech is useless enough now."

"After the ball?" he repeated. "You do not mean—it is not possible—that you think of still giving this ball?"

"Certainly." She gazed at him through her cold glance. "This ball shall be given. My invitations went out to-day."

"But I say that it is monstrous!" cried Egbert Casalis. "Do you realise what will be said of me? In a fortnight more the whole world will know that I am a bankrupt. My honour——"

"Your honour!" she interrupted, laughing a little. "A man who marries a girl, above him socially, but of impoverished family, under the claim of being a wealthy man, and who, five years later, announces to her that he is bankrupt, need talk little of his honour."

She turned away again and finally, as she uttered the words. They had been spoken in her even, clear, cruel voice. Surely in the five years of their marriage Egbert Casalis had learned to know those tones well. They had never warmed with love or melted with tenderness. They had remained what they had been when he, a self-made man, a man who had arrived at great riches, despite his youth, had paid his addresses to the daughter of the old Vivians, and had been willing that she should marry him without, as she confessed with explicit calmness, loving him in the least.

. . . . . .

Mrs. Egbert Casalis had given her ball.

The early morning hours wore on towards the dawn. The last carriage rolled away. Mrs. Casalis' great ball had marked the summit of the social year. She had achieved her desire. She would fall; but it would be a fall enwrapped and decked in splendour.

She dismissed her servants for such remnant as was left of the night. And then she saw that, at the door of the wide, empty ball-room, littered with its scattered débris of crushed rose leaves, her husband was standing.

She was about to move past him without a word. He checked her.

"I have been waiting to see you until the last guest had gone. There has happened one thing of which I wish to speak to you—very briefly. I shall not keep you. The day after to-morrow the fact of my insolvency will have been published to the world. I had a relative—an uncle of my mother. He was an unmarried man, and rich. For years we had held no communication with each other. It came to me that I would appeal to him—not for myself—for you."

He paused. She stood, her head half-averted, reluctantly waiting. He looked at her. She did not see the glance.

He resumed:

"I wrote three days ago. To-day I received this letter."

He took out a folded sheet. "It is from the old man's lawyer. My mother's uncle died a week ago, and I am heir-at-law of all his property. It is estimated at a quarter of a million."

The silence that fell upon the great room could almost be heard. Not a muscle of Camilla's body moved. Her head was averted.

"I tell you this, because it is you—not I—who hereafter will own this fortune. That is all," resumed Casalis.

When she turned sharply he was gone. The blood surged to her cheeks, and left them again. Was it true? Yes; she knew that it was. She might taunt him with having won her by "false claims," but she knew, in her soul, that falsity and he could not together be mentioned. His word was never doubted. What did he mean, then, by saying that this fortune, which had fallen to him in the hour of direst need, like rain from the clouds, was to be hers not his? Gathering up the long, rustling train of her ball-dress, she mounted the stairs, she pushed open the door of his dressing-room——

"Egbert—My God!"

The cry broke from the lips that had grown stiff and still. She swept forward. Her white arm and wrist struck against his uplifted hand. The pistol, whose muzzle had been raised to the temple, diverted from its direction, was discharged, and the ball struck the wall.

"Egbert! Why did you do this? You were about to take your life! Why? Why?" Her hands closed upon his wrists. The vice-like pressure recalled him from the trance in which he had stood till then.

"Why not?" He spoke hoarsely. "Can you love me? Can anything recall the words you uttered two weeks ago?"

"Egbert! Forget them! Forget!"

"I thought I knew you," he went on as before; "I thought I knew you as cold—but not—not as you revealed yourself that day. I always hoped, hoped for your heart some day. That afternoon I saw you and your heart as they were. You have what you wish—a fortune. Me you do not need."

"I do!" she cried. "You must listen to me. You must understand me, though I scarcely understand myself! My heart was cruel and cold because it had never been awakened. I never knew you as you are—as the man you are!"

. . . . . .

Egbert Casalis and his wife have been abroad two years. Theirs is the model of a harmonious household. Their fortune, generously expended, draws society about them. But Mrs. Casalis has ceased to be a society woman.

"Since when have you so changed, Camilla?" ask her friends.

She smiles and replies:

"Since my last ball."

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

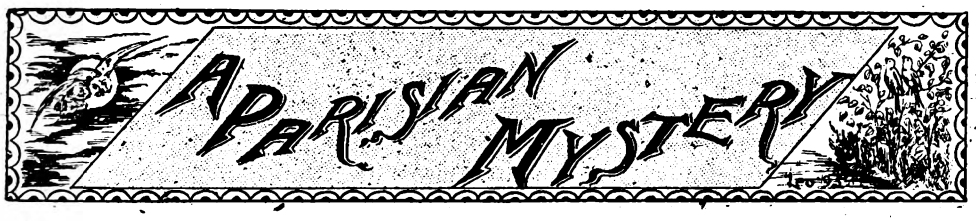
SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 326.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 30, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.



"IT is a bargain, monsieur—a bargain! The rent is a mere nothing," said the old concierge, as he threw open one of the shutters, and flooded the room with dusty sunshine.

The apartment was on the first floor, at the back of a small court numbered 59 of the Rue Neuve St. Augustin. No. 59—I give it fearlessly, since even its foundation-stones have long been swept away.

The tremulous eagerness of this good Casimir made me half suspect that he had not the remotest right to let the rooms at all. But he told a well varnished tale of an old proprietor who hated women, and who passed his life in search of a country so civilised as to do without them.

From this journey of desperation he returned now and then to restore his tired senses, and to gather courage for a new departure.

It was midsummer; I might keep the rooms until the autumn; not an hour longer, since the patron would then be likely to pounce down upon his possessions, unannounced, at any moment. Just now he was believed to be in Lapland.

When I moved in that very afternoon, a guilty feeling of intrusion overcame me. The place was so luxurious, so well ordered, so unlike the four walls of lodging for which one pays. In the library with its leather hangings the patron's books were upon the shelves, his portfolio and his paper-knife upon the table; the ink in the miniature helmet of blue steel was dry, it is true, but there lay the well-worn quill beside it.

"The room reveals the man," says the philosopher. Granting this, the patron was a man of taste and well-informed. I took down some of the books: here were superb bindings, old and new editions. Upon one fly-leaf his name was written—Marius Morizot—the hand clear and fine, like a woman's. All here was as if he had left it yesterday. What if the door were to open and admit him at the next moment?

Just then the door did open, but only Casimir came in, bringing firewood, for the sun had already left the little court in shadow, and then there was an unseasonable chill in the waning summer day. The old man wore a black skull-cap over his thin, grey hair, and a green baize apron that swathed him nearly to the ankles. He chattered about the fire as he made and lighted it, all the time holding under his arm the eternal feather duster, which appeared to be his badge of office.

"The patron has his treasures," I said, laying down my book.

Casimir looked at the shelves with a certain respect, and then shrugged his shoulders.

"Yes, but not there," he answered.

Thinking that he referred to the glittering objects of the saloon, I treated myself to a complacent smile.

"Not there," he repeated, shuffling towards me in his loose slippers, and letting his voice die away into the important whisper that is the emphasis of a French man-of-all-work, "Ah, if monsieur knew."

"Knew what?" I asked. "Have we a gold mine at our feet?"

He chuckled and nodded. "Better than that, monsieur. See!"

And he pushed aside one of the hangings, and showed me that it covered a door of burnished steel.

"A safe?"

"Yes, monsieur, in the wall."

"And of such size," I continued, for the doorway, though narrow, was higher than my head. "What can he keep there?"

"Jewels, monsieur," said Casimir, enjoying my surprise. "Jewels from the ends of the earth, laid away in little drawers, lined with velvet as soft as the down of a bird. It is a passion with him; the collection is a property in itself."

I laid my hand gently upon the shining metal; it might have been the door of a tomb. I drew back shivering. The thought of these untold riches, hardly out of reach, disturbed me; I felt in a measure responsible for their safety.

"The door is locked, of course," said I.

"Oh, yes, monsieur: only the patron has the key." He brushed the door lightly with his feather tips, as though he were dealing with some fragile work of art, and then dropped the curtain over it.

"Casimir! You have your master's leave to let these rooms; you are sure?"

"Oh, certainly, monsieur. Monsieur need give himself no uneasiness; it is permitted at this season. In the summer-time the patron always absents himself. He has been nearly two years away."

I changed the subject, though I doubted him instinctively.

"What is Monsieur Morizot like?" I asked.

"A lamb, monsieur, amiable, as one cannot be more so. Monsieur, then, has not noticed his portrait?"

The pictures were chiefly modern, and were none too well lighted; I had barely glanced at them. Casimir led me to this one, which hung in a dark corner, so high that the flame of a candle held up at arm's length but just revealed it. The face was long, thin, sharp-featured and sallow, with the prevailing moustache and imperial of the time. But the eyes were fine and friendly. On the whole, I felt happier about Monsieur Morizot.

"And yet he hates women! Was he never married?"

"Never, monsieur; in youth he had a disappointment, they say, and now it would be somewhat late for him to think again of that. At his age one no longer makes such plans."

His hand shook more than ever, and the melted wax of the candle ran over, one drop falling upon the floor. "He is good, the patron," he murmured, so tenderly that the drop might have been a tear from his own failing eyes.

When the old retainer had left me I dismissed all scruples, and unpacked my trunk in the little chamber, singing to myself in the happiest of moods. I was in luck, evidently.

"He is good, the patron."

Even should Monsieur Morizot turn up, I felt sure that he would accept my explanation, supposing one to be necessary. But he would not come. I doubted Casimir no longer.

Later I pulled myself together and went to the Opera, stayed the performance out, and left the theatre somewhat damped in spirits. The sky was overcast; a drop or two of rain fell. The great doors of No. 59 were closed and locked, of course; at that hour I could have expected nothing else. But Casimir slept soundly; it was long before I could make him hear, though I pulled the bell till the whole place resounded.

The rain came on in earnest, and I was just about to despair, when the door gave a welcome click and swung back an inch or two. I stumbled in through the darkness, and passed the lodge, where I could hear Casimir swearing to himself drowsily, without a thought of challenging me; and guided myself by the hand-rail of the staircase straight to my own door. I struck a match, found the key, and went in.

The outer rooms were black and unfriendly; through them I saw a thread of light from the library door, to which I groped my way. The light came from a lamp that stood on the table, and I blessed Casimir for his forethought. But for the lamp the room, at the first glance, seemed to be as I left it. The carved chair was drawn up before the fire, which still burned brightly. That I found a fire and not a heap of ashes might have struck me as a curious circumstance, but I set this down to Casimir's forethought, too; all the more readily that my clothes were wet, and that I needed it to dry them, as I proceeded to do.

Standing thus before the chimney, with the crackling logs at my heels, I observed a book upon the table. It lay close to the arm of the great chair—so close, in fact, that one sitting there could hardly fail to see it, even in the twilight. Yet it had escaped my notice until now.

"What book?" The moment my unspoken question was answered, I felt absolutely sure that it had never before been in my hands. Its vellum covers were worn and moth-eaten; its musty leaves were yellow with age. I read the title, "The Trial of François Ravaillac for the Murder of King Henry IV., 1610." I could hardly have forgotten that book had I taken it down.

Immediately a strange terror seized me; vague, unreasoning it was—like a child in the dark. I dropped the book, caught up a candle, and peered into the chamber; then searched the other rooms throughout. I saw no one, heard no sound. I was alone. Yet this knowledge failed to reassure me. I spoke, and was startled at my own voice. I tried to sing, but the walls gave back a mocking echo that was unendurable. And I returned to the library with the same childish dread of nothing still oppressing me, like the remembrance of a nightmare.

I can recall distinctly my struggle to conquer this feeling, and I know that I must have conquered it, for I sat down in the arm-chair and began to read the trial of Ravaillac:

"The prisoner is sworn, and asked his name, age, rank and place of abode.

"He said that his name was François Ravaillac, born and dwelling at Angoulême, between thirty-one and thirty-two years of age."

I can see those lines now, in all their quaintness of type, as one makes a sun picture by a sudden closing of the eyes. I remember that I read on and on till I came to a page so stained as to be indistinct, part of which had been torn away. Then I must have fallen into a doze—a mere cat-nap of a moment only. I woke with a start, unable at first to recognise the surroundings.

The lamp had run down, after the provoking manner of French moderateurs. I knew that it only needed winding, and leaning over the table I gave the key a turn or two; but I was too late—the lamp went out in a long, smoky trail. Yet the room was not quite dark. The fire burned on, flickering at my feet, and making fantastic shadows on the glass.

I rose and looked in the glass, and grew dumb with horror. For I saw there the reflection of a man's face, so hideous in its expression that, even in a crowd, one would have turned from it with loathing. I have never been able to describe it; in that uncertain light it had no colour, I could barely trace its outline. But I should know that face, if I saw it at the top of the great pyramid, or in the plains of Arizona—anywhere, indeed, at once; and I should shudder at the sight, as I do now at the thought, like a frightened animal.

For a few seconds I was helpless. My muscles refused to act; I could not even turn my head to look behind me. Thus with all senses gone but one, I saw the face drawing nearer to my chair and looking down at it. The lines grew more distinct; a strange mark came out upon the cheek, as if the skin there had contracted. Then, with an effort that seemed like a trial of strength with some force unseen, I wheeled about the dark, silent spaces of the room, conscious only of a sudden draught of cold air that chilled me to the bone.

Darkness—there was nothing else. Yet I turned again to the glass, finding only my own figure, scarcely recognisable.

Then, for the first time, I was aware that my left hand, cold and damp, like a dead man's, still clasped the old book, marking my place, between its leaves. I shivered, and would have laid it down; but instead of that, I flung it from me into the fire with a shriek that set the room ringing. For the stain upon its torn page had deepened and freshened, and was oozing out upon my fingers. They were red with it. Kneeling at the hearth, I wiped away the drops with my handkerchief, and burned that, too.

Still on the hearth I crouched, and listened. If there were only something human to face and challenge! Not a sound. But again the current of cold air, as if from an open door or window. That, at least, was real. I found a candle, lighted it at the fire, and searched the room once more.

To my great surprise, I discovered in the darkest corner a small door I had never seen—one of those blind doors so common in French apartments, cunningly contrived to fit a panel of the wall. It stood ajar, moreover, as though forced open by some mischievous gust of the night wind that had lost its way in the house and then made a frantic effort to get out again.

Rejoiced to account so easily for one disturbing element at least, I pushed the door aside, and saw merely a narrow, flagged corridor, leading to a servants' stairway communicating with the ground floor. By the dim light I held, I could distinguish three steps leading down into awful darkness, like a murderous oubliette of the middle ages.

I strained my ears and listened. There was nothing more to be seen, but my ears caught a faint sound, startling at that hour; though by day I should have laughed at it—simply the noise of running water, gently falling, as if from a pipe, upon the pavement below. I went on cautiously to the stair-rail, leaned over it, and looked down. No one; but under the stairs, in the dark, the water went splashing on intermittently, as though it fell first upon invisible hands—washing them, perhaps. The thought suggested itself instantly.

"Who is there?" I shouted, lowering the light towards the dark corner, but in vain.

The water stopped. There was no other answer.

"Who is there?" I repeated, in a voice that was not mine.

I heard a shuffling step, and there came a blast of the night air strong enough to put out the light, if I had not drawn back, shielding the flame with my hand. A door below me quietly closed, and all was still again.

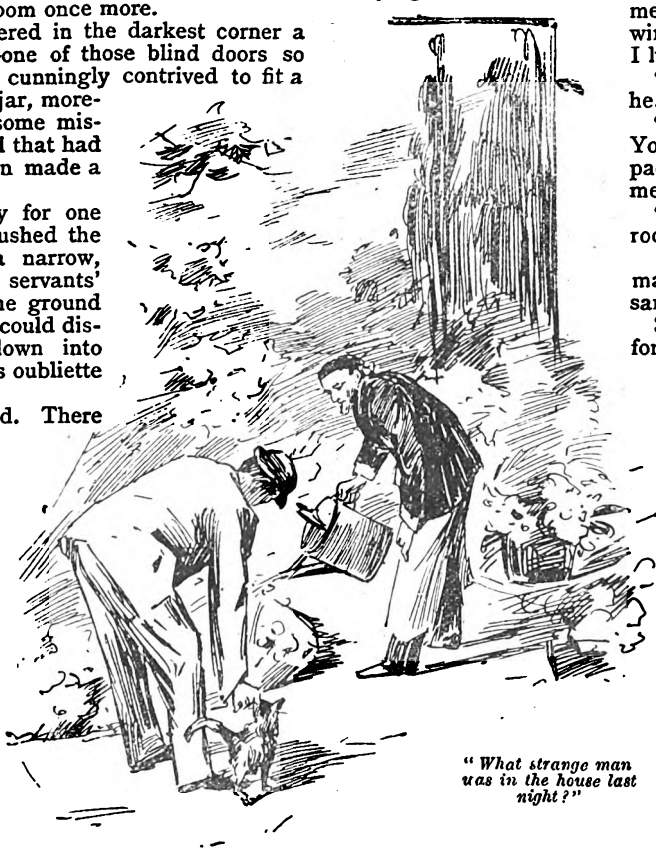
I rushed down the stairs and found the door. It was securely bolted; the bolts were rusted. I tried one, and could not stir it.

Then, out in the court, a harsh cry rang back along the walls, "Cordon!" the familiar call to the sleeping concierge. "Cordon!" the same rough voice repeated. The heavy street door fell into place with a dull, jarring sound. The presence, whatever it was, had escaped scot-free into the world of Paris.

Drip, drip, behind me I heard the water; falling now, drop by drop, upon the stones. There was nothing else to show that I had not been dreaming. I gave one searching look at the dismal little corner, and then fled from it and from the house for ever.

In less time than it takes to tell it, I had rushed through the rooms overhead, and down again by the main staircase, out into the court, and on through the falling rain, shouting to Casimir as I went, "Cordon—cordon—cordon!" And I woke echoes there that drove me half mad; I beat upon the door. At last the cord was drawn, and I found myself in the street, where I recovered my senses sufficiently to put on my hat and coat, snatched up in the flight mechanically from the table in the anti-chamber.

I went back to my hotel, and passed a sleepless night. In the morning, very early, I hurried out again, laughing at my folly. The day was fine and bright, as only Paris can be; and yet I trembled on turning into the court, where, however, I found nothing more terrible than Casimir watering his flowers and talking to a grey cat, that rubbed itself affectionately against his shins. The old man started when he saw me, and looked from me to the window, behind which he supposed I had been sleeping.



"What strange man was in the house last night?"

"Monsieur rises early," said he.

"Yes. I am called away. You will be kind enough to pack my trunk, and send it after me."

"Monsieur gives up the rooms?"

"Unavoidably. It does not matter, they are paid for all the same."

Surprise made him speechless for a moment. The cat came slowly towards me, purring. I stooped and stroked it between the ears.

"He is called Chambord, monsieur. He lives upon raw meat, but he is very kind and gentle. I regret that monsieur goes away."

"Thank you. Casimir, what strange man was in the house last night?"

"Monsieur, I do not understand. There was no one."

"You let no one out, then?"

"Oh, that, of course. The house has many apartments, many lodgers. I do not count them in my sleep."

"Nevertheless," I said with some warmth, "there was a stranger in my rooms last night. I saw him."

"Monsieur was dreaming. It is impossible."

"But I can describe him to you."

And I tried to do so, making only a stammering failure of it.

Casimir shrugged his shoulders.

Then I remembered the curious mark upon the man's cheek, and put in that evidence triumphantly.

The dull eyes opened a little wider, but he smiled and shook his head.

"Sapristi? Now I know that monsieur was surely dreaming. That is the Brazilian Cornelio, the good patron's valet de chambre."

"Well, then, I tell you, he has come back."

"But, monsieur——"

"I swear it to you."

"Impossible. Monsieur Morizet keeps him always at his side. They are both in Lapland."

I argued with him to no purpose. He grew angry, and, in his excitement, tipped over his watering-pot upon Chambord, who turned tail and disappeared. I could convince him of nothing but my own imbecility; and so I left him muttering strange oaths among his flowers.

One rarely fails to recall a startling bit of his own experience, the first time its date comes round again. So it happened that this adventure was uppermost in my mind one midsummer night of the following year, on board the good steamer Baron Osy, bound from London to Antwerp.

One by one the passengers who were about me on the after-deck had gone below as the night breeze strengthened. I knew that the stars were coming out, that under the pale green streak of western sky the English coast was fast receding. But my thoughts were hundreds of miles away.

With them I was really strolling through the Passage des Princes and back along the Boulevard, humming as I walked, the doctor's air in "L'Ombre"; and so, on through the details of that troubled night. I lived again in Monsieur Morizot's apartment; I saw his chair at the fire, his book upon the table; nay, even the old letter-press danced before my eyes:—

"The prisoner is sworn: and asked his name, age, rank, and place of abode."

"He said that his name was François Ravaillac, born and dwelling at Angoulême——"

The sound of my voice brought me back to the deck of the Baron Osy. I had spoken the words aloud. I turned, and saw that they must have been overheard by a passenger who stood at the rail, not ten feet away. He wore a close-fitting, pointed cap and a long dark coat, buttoned tightly under his chin, and these garments had a suggestive richness in them. A splendid jewel, too, shone upon his hand. But his eyes were fixed on me with a look in which fear and wonder mingled strangely; his face seemed white as death, and it was the face of the valet, Cornelio.

I realised an unknown power in the words which I had spoken; and, without moving from my place, I finished the broken sentence from the trial of Ravaillac, then repeated it word for word from the beginning. With that, the mark upon his cheek quivered convulsively; he gave a wild cry, like some brute brought to bay, and with one appealing look, as if towards imaginary pursuers closing in upon him, he flung himself over the rail into the sea.

I rushed to the ship's side, as one of the hands, who had seen him jump, tore a life-preserver from the guards, and threw it in after him. We caught sight of an arm tossed up in the foaming wake far behind. A wave swept over it. The engines were stopped, and a boat lowered. After a long time it came back, bringing only the wet corks. The old grey sexton of the sea works quickly and well.

We found his name registered upon the list—Ramon Quizas, renter of Rio. He had no companion, and his trunks were stored somewhere on the quay at Antwerp. When I left the city they still remained there unclaimed.

Three years later, in one of the continental reading-rooms, I took up the Figaro, to divert myself. Between the last words of Madame X., and the announcement of a fête at Asnières, I found a line of reference to a matter familiar enough, as it seemed, to all but casual readers—the division among the heirs-at-law of a handsome property—that of one Monsieur Morizot. The name, and the mysterious importance given it, roused my curiosity, and I wrote at once to a Parisian crony for fuller particulars. This was his answer:

"Have you retired from the world that you cease to read the news of it? We are worn out with details of the life and death of Monsieur Morizot. Pardon me if I recite them to you very briefly. The worthy man lived, en garçon, in one of those houses of the Rue Neuve St. Augustin, already condemned to make way for the new avenue, which will be a marvel. Like you, he was a traveller, and he often remained for years an absentee, staying away at last longer than the code allows. He became, to all intents and purposes, a dead man, and his heirs demanded to share his estate, and to break up his collection of jewels, known to be of great value. Man proposes! The safe was opened, but it had been rifled, mon ami. They found there, instead, the owner's body, stabbed through and through.

"The good soul had made a hard fight of it. His hand still clutched a bit of watch-chain, identified as the property of a certain Brazilian ape of a servant who never left him. Our police is enormously cunning. Bit by bit the case has been worked up, and this is what happened. The two arrived late one night at the Northern Railway station, where, to save time, at the servant's suggestion, their trunks were left to be claimed in the morning. Thus they installed themselves at home without stir, and unannounced. Then the man got the better of his master, and became in his turn an absentee.

"No one ever dreamed of the arrival or the departure, yet now it is all clear as though we saw it in a glass—the very date proved by the fragment of a journal found in the pocket of what was once Monsieur Morizot. Heed the warning, and travel no more, but marry, and let madame watch over you. Get thee a wife."

I answered my foreign correspondent in good English fashion, by asking a question. "Upon what date," I prayed him, "was the crime committed?" His reply brought me a printed slip, fixing upon the very night of my adventure, but in the year preceding it. And on this point all known records of the affair obstinately agree.

That Señor Ramon Quizas and the valet, Cornelio, were one and the same, I have no manner of doubt; but that he ever could have revisited the scene of his double crime is inconceivable. Whose face, then, appeared to me in the mirror? Whose hands were washed in the running water? Who, besides myself, clamoured there in the dark for release from his own haunting fears? Did I, by some strange coincidence, dream these things, one after another, in quick succession?

Or did the murderer leave behind him in his flight a ghostly presence, to play his hideous part out, time and time again; while the faithful glass of Venice reflected line for line, moment for moment? I cannot answer. But now, when I walk in the Avenue de l'Opéra, I am grateful even for that dullest of improvement's dull marches, sweeping, as it does, all memory but mine of my grim lodging from the face of the earth.

THE time was about a fortnight before Easter. There were not many travellers and I had a compartment in the early boat train to myself. My destination was Paris; my errand to convey from my father (a London jeweller and silversmith) to his agent in that city a very valuable brilliant ring.

"The diamonds in it are worth five hundred pounds if they are worth a penny," my father had said to me, "so I hope you will take special care of the ring, Ned, and neither lose it on the way nor allow yourself to be robbed of it."

I smiled a little superciliously as my father spoke. As if it were at all likely that I should either lose it or allow it to be stolen from me! I was just turned one-and-twenty; and my father had no right to speak to me as if I were still a boy.

I had got the ring in an inner pocket of my waistcoat, as I took care to assure myself from time to time. I had not seen it since my father put it into the little velvet-lined box in which it was still shut up. When I had finished my first cigar and had got through the morning news, the thought struck me that I might as well have another look at the ring. There could be no harm in that, you know.

I took the box out of its hiding-place and opened it. My eyes were dazzled as I looked. There lay the darling in its nest of purple velvet. Who could have resisted the pleasure of taking it out and trying it on? Certainly not I. I tried it. Had it been made for the third finger of my right hand it could not have fitted me better. It looked simply exquisite. Now I came to think of it, was there or could there be a safer hiding-place for the ring than my finger? I had only to keep my glove on and not a soul would know anything about it. It was far safer there than in my pocket.

In such a case, to hesitate was folly. I placed the ring on my finger and put the empty box back into my pocket. As I was alone there was no occasion to put my glove on just then, so I mused and smoked and watched the many-coloured rays of light that flashed from the brilliants, and wondered what great swell's finger the ring was destined to decorate. How I wished that I could call it mine!

A quarter of an hour later we were steaming slowly out of Dover Harbour. There were not more than a dozen passengers on deck. The day was cold and clear, with just enough sea on to make the voyage unpleasant for bad sailors.

Only two ladies were visible. One was a stout middle-aged person, who was eating and drinking nearly the whole way across, evidently an old salt. The other was—well, simply the most charming creature I had ever set eyes on. In point of fact, I could not keep my eyes off her. I passed her and repassed her as I paced the deck from end to end, and every time that I passed her I looked at her.

What lovely grey eyes! What superb yellow hair! But as for her complexion—it would need a poet to describe its wild rose tints. Once or twice her eyes met mine, just for a moment, and it struck me that they were full of a wistful sadness. So far as I could judge she was entirely alone.

We were about half-way across, when, as I passed her for the fiftieth time, she spoke:

"Would monsieur have the goodness to ask the steward to bring me a little cognac?"

She spoke in French. As the song says, her voice was low and sweet. I was too fluttered to answer her. I could only bow and grin, and make a bolt for the steward's den; of course, I took the cognac to her myself. You should have seen how prettily she thanked me. She sipped at it as a canary might do, if that bird were in the habit of drinking brandy.

"I hope that mademoiselle is somewhat revived?" I ventured to observe presently.

"Yes, very much revived, thanks to monsieur. But I am not mademoiselle, I am madame. I am a widow."

She pressed her handkerchief to her eyes as she spoke. How interesting—nay, how touching—was this simple confession! The wistful sorrow in her eyes was at once accounted for. Would that it had been my happy lot to comfort her.

There was a camp-stool close by. Presently I ventured to draw it a little nearer and to sit down on it, blushing at my temerity as I did so. She did not seem offended, and we were presently in the midst of an animated and interesting conversation.

There was no hauteur about madame; on the contrary, she was candour itself. She had only been three days with Sir Henry FitzEvans, who had charge of her late husband's interests in England.

She was now going back into seclusion, going back to the little cottage in which she had dwelt ever since her dear husband's death. She would not be able to go forward by the tidal train, she told me, having a business call to make in Calais. She would go by the evening train.

All this was told me with charming frankness. There was no reason why I should not wait, and go along with her by the evening train, if she would allow me to do so. When I threw out a hint to that effect, she offered no objection. She admitted at once that she was fond of society, and then she looked at me, and—well, I could almost have sworn that she blushed.

I had already told her that I was bound for Paris on a special errand for my father, but I had not said a word about the ring, nor had she even seen it. I had put on my gloves before leaving the train at Dover, and still wore them.

A little while longer, and we found ourselves at Calais. When we landed, madame admitted she was hungry, and that luncheon would be a desirable feature of the programme. Accordingly, while she went about her business, I took a voiture, and drove to the Hôtel Dessin. There, in the course of half an hour, madame joined me.

Now, one can't very well partake of luncheon in kid gloves. The question was, whether I should partake of mine with the ring on my finger, or whether I should put it carefully away in the box, and hide it out of sight. If you have any kind of knowledge of what human nature is at twenty-one, especially when there is a pretty woman in the case, you will know the decision I arrived at. Madame pecked a little at this and that; but hardly ate more than a sparrow might have done.

How swiftly the minutes seemed to fly! I could have lingered on in that cosy little room for a year. When the cloth was drawn and we were left to ourselves, with a bottle of hock on the table between us, somehow our chairs seemed to gravitate towards each other, or perhaps it was the stove that attracted us, for the afternoon was chilly. In any case, we found ourselves in closer proximity.

Then said madame, "Do you not smoke, monsieur?"

"Yes; considerably more than is good for me, I am afraid."

"Then smoke now. Oblige me. I like to see a gentleman smoke."

I rose in order to get my cigar-case out of the pocket of my overcoat. Madame laid her hand lightly on my arm—and what a charming hand it was!—"Monsieur, I am going to make a confession," she said. "I smoke too—moi cigarettes. I lived for many years in Spain, where nearly all the ladies smoke. You are not shocked, I hope, at the idea of a lady smoking cigarettes?"

"Shocked, madame!"

"No, of course not. You are too much a man of the world; you are above such insular prejudices; eh bien! You shall smoke one of my cigarettes."

From the sachet by her side she drew an embroidered case, which she opened, and bade me choose a cigarette. I did so, and she took another. Then with her own fair fingers she struck an allumette, and held it while I lighted the weed. Then she lighted her own. She could not fail to see my ring as she lighted the match.

"I daresay you find the flavour a little peculiar," said madame, a minute or two later. "These cigarettes are made of perfumed tobacco; I never smoke any others. I hope you do not find yours disagreeable."

"On the contrary, madame. I am quite in love with it. As you say, the flavour is slightly peculiar, but aromatic and pleasant—very pleasant."

To tell the truth, I didn't like it at all, but I wouldn't have said so for worlds. We smoked on in silence. What would this superb creature say to me, I wondered, if I were to tell her how madly I had fallen in love with her? Would she reject me with scorn, or would she ——

I gave a sudden start, and was shocked to find that I had been falling asleep. Fortunately, madame had not noticed me. Her large melancholy eyes were bent upon the stove. There was certainly something very soothing, something that inclined to slumber and happy dreams about madame.

Peculiar cigarettes! If I had but two thousand a year now, and this sweet creature to share it, how happy I could be! Certainly she must have been some six or seven years older than myself, but I never was one to care for your chits of schoolgirls, who set up for being women before they are out of their teens. Here was an angel who had been left desolate, who had been cast on a bleak and unfeeling world, who pined for a heart and a home—for a heart that brimmed over with love. Gracious goodness! I had a heart that yearned towards her—that—that——

Why—eh—how was this, and where was I? I awoke with a shiver. But for the lamp in the courtyard, the room would have been quite dark. My head was aching frightfully. I got up and staggered to the window. When I looked out and saw the familiar courtyard, everything came back to me like a flash of light.

Where was madame? Why had I slept so long? I groped for the bell and rang it violently. Up came the waiter with a candle. "Where is madame?" I demanded. "Madame," he answered, "went out nearly three hours ago, saying that she wanted to make a few purchases, and would be back in a little time. On no account, she said, was her brother, who had suffered terribly from mal de mer in crossing, to be disturbed."

Gone three hours ago! Her brother! Mal de mer! What could it mean? As I sat down, utterly bewildered, my arm pressed against the little box in my pocket. Mechanically I glanced at my finger; the ring was no longer there. My heart turned sick within me. I sank down and buried my face in my hands. The waiter thought I was ill and ran to fetch some cognac. I saw it all now. Fool! fool that I was, I had allowed myself to be swindled by a common adventuress.

At nine o'clock next morning I stood before my father a miserable, haggard, woe-begone wretch. I told my tale, but as I did so I could not quite keep down my tears of mingled shame and vexation. He listened to me with a curious, cynical smile. When I had done he went to his bureau and opened a drawer.

"Set your mind at rest, Ned; here's the ring safe and sound."

I could only stare in astonishment.

"When madame, with the ring in her possession, left you asleep, she was just in time to catch the afternoon boat back to Dover. The ring was in my hands again before ten o'clock last night."

"But—but," I stammered. "I don't understand. When she had once got the ring in her possession, why did she bring it back to you?"

"Because she was paid to do so; because she was hired through the agency of a private inquiry office to act as she did. Madame, by profession, is not a thief, but a thief-taker. You had grown so conceited of late, Master Ned, I thought it would do you no harm to take you down a peg or two. If you profit by the lesson my money will have been well spent."

An hour or two later I said, "But wasn't it rather a risky thing to do with a ring worth five hundred pounds?"

My father winked at me with the solemnity of a judge. "My dear Ned, what do you take your old father for? The diamonds were nothing but paste!"

UNITED IN DEATH

It was three o'clock of a hot, drowsy afternoon in Santiago, Santo Domingo. All the town, recently awakened from its accustomed siesta, was bestirring itself and going about its usual occupations. From the billiard room over the way came the click of the balls, mingled with the monotonous "Uno, dos, veinto-seis," of the loto players.

Pedro, the son of the man who kept the billiard-room, sat outside the door, his chair tipped back and resting on two legs. He was thrumming on his guitar and humming a song, the burden of which was "Te amo, te adoro, mi querida" (I love thee, I adore thee, my darling).

The water boys, fresh from their afternoon dip in the river, their four bright tins brimming full, went galloping by, mercilessly digging and pounding the poor burros with their heels. Lucky the boy who had an old spur tied to his bare foot; the less fortunate ones had to content themselves with a good bit of maya (century plant), with points an inch long, projecting on either side, with which to prod the poor beasts. They droned their sing-song, "Aqua, aqua, quatre por un medio" (Water, water, four tins for twopence halfpenny).

It was hot and still inside the patio, the tropical sun beating fiercely down, but in the sheltered verandah it was cool. In a Creole hammock a young woman lay, looking, with wide-open eyes, across the courtyard, where the lime-trees, laden with fragrant blossoms, green and ripe fruit, bent their branches almost to the ground. The lizards darted up and down, snapping, like a flash, at some tiny insect; now ashy white as they crawled on the wall, or black with anger in a sudden contest over a fly.

Just beneath the sour-orange tree, with its russet-brown fruit glimmering through the shining leaves, a pomegranate tree stretched its slender branches up, as if to cling to the stronger tree for support, but the heavy, scarlet, waxen blossoms caused it to sway backwards and forwards.

There was a tap at the door.

"La madama quiere dulce?" (Does madam wish for sweets?) asked a sweet, plaintive voice.

Then came the slip-slap of Creole slippers on the brick floor of the porton.

"Come in, Martina," called out Mrs. Burton, in reply.

A tall, striking-looking girl came into the patio and walked towards the verandah. A little of the Indian could be traced in the high cheek-bones and the straight, glossy braids of blue-black hair; the negro showed itself in the soft, sad eyes; and the Spanish in the erect and free step. With all that mixture she was a beautiful creature.

She wore a simple gown of unbleached linen, which hung loosely from throat to foot. A deep-red hybiscus flower was thrust over the left ear.

She went towards Mrs. Burton, balancing on her head the large, square wooden tray, heaped high with golden squares of orange dulce, white blocks of fresh cocoanut sweets, clear, wine-coloured slabs of guava jelly, in neat, white paper cases, and the amber-coloured dulce leche.

"I have just been wishing for some of your dulce," said Mrs. Burton, a slender, dark-haired English girl. "Sit down, and let me pick out what I want."

Martina knelt down beside the hammock, holding up the tray for her to make a selection. Mrs. Burton chose a goodly pile, for she was childishly fond of sweets, and fumbled in her pocket for her purse, from which she selected several reals, and dropped them into the slender, well-shaped, olive-tinted hand which Martina held out for the money.

She put the tray down on the floor of the verandah, leaned against the brick-plastered wall of the house, clasped her hands about her knees, and looked up expectantly at Mrs. Burton, half-hesitated, then began:

"Ay, Doña Juanita."

"Well, Martina," said Mrs. Burton, smiling encouragingly, "you have something to tell me, I know. We are all alone here, and it's a good time to talk."

Thus urged, Martina went on, the colour rising in her cheeks as she talked.

"Doña Juanita, I have a novio."

"You, Martina!" exclaimed Mrs. Burton, in surprise, for Martina had always before sedulously avoided the young men, and had reached the age of twenty without having had a lover.

"Yes, it is true," returned the girl shyly. "I have never felt love before; but, when it comes, who can withstand it? But perhaps you know, madama?" she asked, glancing quickly up at the older woman, who nodded in return.

"They say," she continued, "that the people of the great Extrangero are colder than we; but you are simpatico, and must have loved. Stupid that I am! there is your marido, the señor. Pardon me, madama."

"But let me hear your story, Martina; tell me about the wonderful novio. Is he handsome?"

"Ah, yes, madama; handsome, brave, tall, generous. He is a soldier—one of the President's bodyguard. He has land, too, and a fine bohio. I first saw him two weeks ago, when the President was here. As the troops went by, Pablo looked up and smiled at me. I felt my heart go out to him. I met him at the park that evening, and since then I have seen him every day; and, oh, madama, he wishes to marry me. You will come to the wedding, won't you? There'll be wine and dulce; and Pablo has already sent to Puerto Plata to buy a gown of white muslin and satin shoes for me. Are the novios of the Extrangero as kind as that?"

"Well, no," answered Mrs. Burton, "they are not so generous in that way; besides, it is not the custom. The bride has to provide her own clothes."

"La pobre," sighed Martina sympathetically. "I could not rest until I had told you," she added, as she lifted the tray to her head and prepared to go. A moment later the gate closed with a click.

Some six months later, Mrs. Burton, who had made a round of afternoon visits, and had just stepped up on her own pavement, her dainty muslin skirt held up with one hand, and her white silk sunshade in the other, fancied she heard a sound of subdued sobbing. She looked about, but saw no one; then she unhooked the gate. There, in one corner, close to the great door, crouched a woman, her head bent over her knees, sobbing at intervals, as if she was almost exhausted with the effort.

As Mrs. Burton entered, the woman lifted a drawn, haggard face, so changed from the bright, laughing one of the summer before, that she hardly recognised Martina.

"Why! can that be you, Martina?" she exclaimed in surprise. "What is the matter with you?" With difficulty she persuaded the girl to rise, and half dragged her across the porton into the cool sala, where she made her lie down on a bamboo couch, then ran to the dining-room for a glass of wine, which she forced Martina to sip. She waited quietly for a few moments until Martina had somewhat regained her composure, then she said gently:

"Tell me about it, my dear."

Martina suddenly threw off the limp black mantilla that had covered her head and shoulders, and sat up.

"God knows, madama, that I am a wicked woman. I have told the padre. It does no good. When I saw you last I was to have been married, but the troops were ordered off to Monte Christi—there was a revolution on the line. I followed as close as I could, and saw Pablo nearly every day. I kept a little shop in Monte Christi. Well, one day, not long ago, that ashy-faced Rositar Ramirez—she who has the evil eye—looked at Pablo, and took him from me. They both left the place. He has since said he was true to me; but I would not believe him, I was desperate.

"One night I went across the line into Haiti, to a little village where old Jacques, the guaguna man lived, and asked for something to bring back my Pablo. Old Jacques said: 'There is no remedy but to have him killed; he is gone from you. Bring me some pure gold and he will trouble you no more.' I took the gold to him, and now, madama"—with a wild burst of tears—"he has been found guilty of a conspiracy against the life of the President, and will be shot here, in Santiago, to-morrow at sunset. There is no help. He was guagunad—that made him do it."

"My poor girl," said Mrs. Burton, softly stroking the girl's hand, "I'll ask my husband; perhaps he can see the President and intercede for Pablo."

Just then Mr. Burton came in. Martina fled out of one door as he entered the other.

"Hullo, what's up?" he asked.

His wife eagerly related the case in full, confident of his assistance.

"I'm afraid nothing can be done," said Mr. Burton; "he has no wealthy relatives. I'm sorry," he added, relaxing his somewhat self-assertive manner at the sight of his wife's distressed face, "but really, dear, I can do nothing. Come," he said, lighting a cigar, "let's go for a walk before dinner. We'll run over to the Benoits'."

The next day a band of twenty soldiers slowly filed down towards the cemetery. In front walked a young man, with his arms bound behind him. There was an expression of stern resignation on his well cut features, and he held his head erect. On either side walked an armed soldier. A rabble of town folk straggled along behind. Low mutterings and an occasional sob could be heard.

The men entered the gates of the cemetery; then they turned to the right, where there was a freshly-dug grave in that part of the cemetery set apart for murderers, thieves and conspirators. Pablo was placed at the foot of the grave. The soldiers drew up in line with their rifles stiffly held upright.

The condemned man opened his lips.

"Compadre Felipe," he said to the soldier at the end of the line, "before God, I am innocent of all conspiracy. I have been denied a trial in this country—a republic—tell Martina Fernandez that I was true to her."

"One, two," sounded slowly, as the men raised their Remingtons, and as the "three" came, there was a swift, rushing movement from a tomb near by. A woman flung herself upon Pablo, and fell backwards into the grave with him.

"Por Dios!" exclaimed the men in horror.

As the smoke cleared Felipe went forward and raised Martina, shot through the head, from the shallow grave, where Pablo lay dead beneath her.

SUMMARY.

GEOFFREY DUNDAS, whose life is attempted on the 10th of June, 1883, by a Hindoo barrister at the Law Courts, by means of poison, pays a visit to General Sir Arthur Chetwynd at Scacombe Towers, in May, 1884. There the General takes Geoffrey into his confidence, and explains that a serious danger threatens the household, and that it will come, if at all, on the Tenth of June.

CHAPTER II.

THE GENERAL'S STORY.

GEOFFREY started; his hand, holding a match with which he was about to light his pipe, remained suspended in the air; he forgot that he had been about to smoke, and quietly laid his pipe down on the table.

The General noticed the young man's agitation, and noticed, too, how he mastered it.

"You seem surprised at my mentioning that date," said Sir Arthur.

"Surprised? No. And yet—yes, General, and I don't know why I should conceal it from you—your speaking of that particular day did seem strange to me. The reason is, that a very curious thing happened to me on the tenth day of June last year. I suddenly, and for no apparent cause, became ill; and I believe I was poisoned by a Hindoo who was a perfect stranger to me. As if to place the matter beyond a doubt this odd letter was delivered at my chambers next morning——"

He took out his pocket-book, and, after searching a little, produced the sheet of paper he spoke of and handed it to his host.

The General's hand did not tremble, but Geoffrey, looking at him, saw that his face turned perceptibly paler as he read the few brief lines.

"Do you understand this?" he asked, as he handed back the letter.

"I had it translated to me; but I have no idea what it refers to. I can only imagine that I am in some way held responsible for something that occurred in Bengal before I was born."

"True—before you were born. Yet the sins of the fathers—God forbid!"

Sir Arthur threw his unlighted cigar on the table, and began to pace the room with long, rapid strides.

"You shall know all about it, Geoffrey," he said suddenly; "you have a right to know."

He continued to march to the end of the room and back again all the time he was speaking, while Geoffrey sat in his chair quietly watching him.

"It was in the days of the Mutiny," he said, "that your father and I first became acquainted. That was in fifty-two. There was wild work doing in those days, I can tell you. They are half-forgotten now, except by a few old fellows like myself—just as well perhaps. The suddenness, the diabolical treachery of the outbreak were enough to make one lose one's head; and then when one realised the extent of the rising, and the length of time that must elapse before help could arrive from home—it was frightful, I tell you.

"You have no idea of it. You have no idea, either, what it is to talk to men who have seen their wives murdered, their little children—bah! It is enough to say that for weeks our peril was extreme; we lived in a perpetual fever; and when at last we got the upper hand, and orders were given to crush out the smouldering embers of the revolt, we were in no mood to show mercy. I say this, not to justify, or even to excuse, but to explain what follows.

"In the month of May, Eighteen Fifty-three, parts of two regiments, with a small detachment of artillery, were sent to reduce the town of Churruckpore, still held by a rebel force. The job gave us more trouble than we had expected; and we lost a good many in the final charge. This infuriated our men; and when we got inside the place—well if an historian were to say that the town was sacked he wouldn't err very far from the truth. At any rate we lost control of the men—perhaps we didn't try as hard as we might have done to keep it—and there was looting, fire raising, and general wantonness going on for the best part of three days.

"Now I must tell you that inside the outer wall of the city, but surrounded by palisades and walls of its own, stood a temple of some Hindoo deity. The place was a favourite resort of pilgrims, who had enriched it with all manner of precious things—cloth of gold, caskets of ivory and sandal-wood, cups and plates of beaten gold, and especially gems. One idol, I remember, was well-nigh covered with strings of pearls; another was clothed in a vestment that was simply stiff and blazing with jewels—and so on. Anyhow, Major Panton of the Sixty-third, as it was then, with Captain Druce of the Artillery, your poor father and I—we four, determined to pay a visit to this temple."

"You didn't mean to st—to take those jewels and keep them?" interjected the listener.

"A lot of fighting men ranged inside the palisade."

"I rather think we did," said the General drily. "And let me tell you, young man, that if you expect men to go through what we went through at a pay of three or four rupees a day, and not help themselves when something good comes in their way, you expect a little too much of human nature. You must remember, however, that this was not exactly private property. In our eyes it belonged to nobody in particular. And, to say a great deal in two words, up to that time we had been living under the rule of John Company.

"Well, we took a dozen men whom we could trust, and proceeded to the temple about two hours before sundown. It was the tenth of June, Eighteen Fifty-three.

"The priests must have got notice of our coming, for they had a lot of fighting men ranged inside the palisade, close to the main entrance; and, as we were demanding admittance, they deliberately potted us! It's a wonder any of us escaped with our lives. There was nothing for it but to go back and get reinforcements. This was not so easy, as most of our fellows were drunk, and the rest were under no sort of discipline; so we were compelled to take two more, Grey of the Eighty-ninth, and Crawford, one of the surgeons, into our confidence. We got together about fifty men, and went for the place again.

"It was getting near dark as we got up to the palisade. This time we proceeded cautiously; but the enemy had vanished. There was not a soul to oppose our entrance; we went on in column of fours right up a broad avenue that led to the temple.

"As we grounded arms, a strange sound fell on our ears. It was a sort of wailing chant—not the sort of thing I could describe to you; but it was eerie, and outlandish, and mournful to the last degree.

"Leaving the bulk of the men outside, we six officers went into the temple. It was a strange sight. The great space was lighted up by hundreds of tapers, so that there was no glare, only a mild soft radiance.

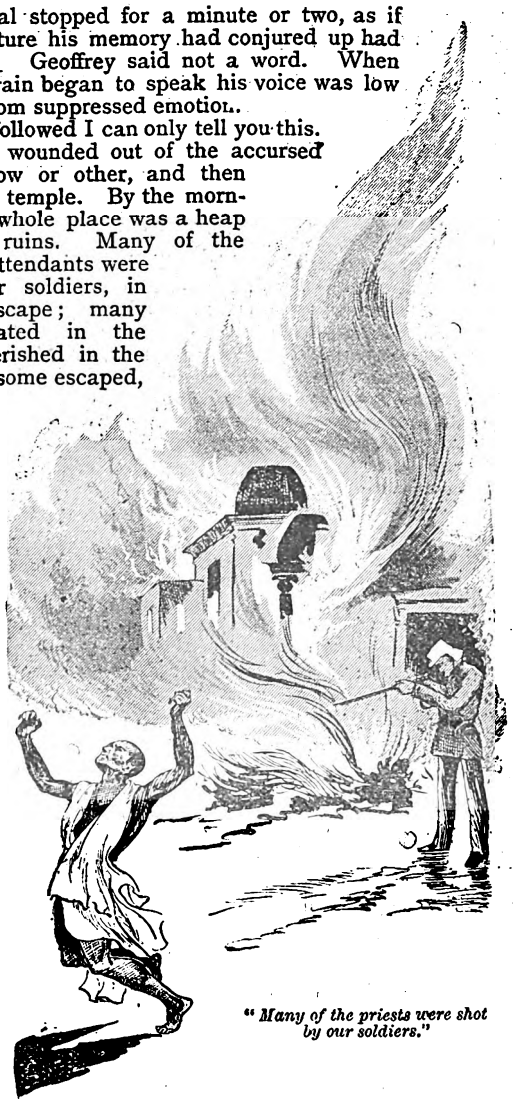
"Right in front was an altar, and towering above it something which I supposed was an idol—the ugliest, most repulsive object my eyes ever beheld. All the treasures of the shrine, it seemed to me, were exposed on and about the altar, and round it were ranged about a score of priests—Brahmins, I suppose—each with a single robe thrown round his body. They were chanting alternately, right answering left, just as they do in our own churches; and at stated intervals they they would unite in that horrid, low, wailing sound—I fancy I can hear it now.

"For some minutes we stood looking on in silence. At last Panton, who acted as our leader, lost patience, and called out something, I forget what—something to the effect that they had better be off. At the sound of his voice one priest stood up, and remained standing in his place while the chant proceeded for a few words; then a second rose and joined him; after a few moments a third, then a fourth, until all were on their feet. Suddenly, in the midst of the chorus, or part in which they all joined, the whole body of priests prostrated themselves before the idol. Then slowly they rose, turned, and marched in a long, thin, dark line beyond the altar, and so left the temple. Not a man of them stretched out a hand to the precious stones, images of gold, and jewelled weapons that were hung on the pedestal of the idol, or lying on the altar. They went out slowly, each with his eyes on the ground, each chanting the mournful burden. It seemed to me as if they meant it for the last service that would ever be rendered to their god to the end of time.

"The sound of the chant died away; and two seconds later we were rushing pell-mell on the treasure. We were, in fact, too eager; for we left no guard at the door, and the men outside, knowing perfectly well that they were not on duty, but engaged in an unlawful errand, and hearing the sound of our footsteps as we ran through the empty temple, came pouring in through the main entrance to see what was going forward. Of course, the sight of the gold and jewels was too much for them. Every man-jack of them came racing up to the great image; when, suddenly, without the slightest warning, a hundred flashes of fire came, as it were, through the wall, with a deafening roar of musketry; and in one instant a score of us lay dead or dying!"

The General stopped for a minute or two, as if the awful picture his memory had conjured up had silenced him. Geoffrey said not a word. When Sir Arthur again began to speak his voice was low and hoarse from suppressed emotion.

"Of what followed I can only tell you this. We got our wounded out of the accursed place somehow or other, and then set fire to the temple. By the morning light the whole place was a heap of smoking ruins. Many of the priests and attendants were shot by our soldiers, in trying to escape; many were suffocated in the smoke or perished in the flames. But some escaped, I fancy by a subterranean passage—or if not, their co-religionists have known how to avenge them. Geoffrey——!"



"Many of the priests were shot by our soldiers."

The old man walked up to his guest and gripped him by the arm.

"Geoffrey! Every year from that day, on the tenth of June, the anniversary of the destruction of the temple has been marked by the death of some one who took part in that destruction, or some member of one of their families! Such, at least, is my conviction. I believe they mean to exterminate not only the survivors of the attack they made on us in the temple, but our children."

The young man made an exclamation of horror and incredulity.

"Listen." I have ascertained that several of the soldiers died on the tenth of June, some in fight, some in sickness, one or two evidently murdered by an unknown hand. But it was impossible to trace more than a certain number of the privates, because we could not be sure who actually were there.

"We knew the officers, however—Panton, Druce, Grey, Crawford, your father, and myself. Panton died of cholera before the year was out; but his son—a fine young fellow of five-and-twenty—was drowned while bathing (as it was supposed) on the tenth of June, four years later. Crawford's horse threw him, and he broke his neck. That was on the tenth of June. His sister died, I remember, on board ship on her way home. And I ascertained that she, too, ceased to live on the same fatal day.

"I cannot go on with the list. Some, of course, came by their deaths naturally, at different times of the year. But what puts the fact of the vendetta beyond a doubt is this Several times, to my knowledge, a letter exactly similar to the one you have just showed me has been received by the surviving relatives. Some disregarded it; others thought it pointed to an old grievance of a private nature. But your father and I long ago made up our minds that we were marked men. Your poor father himself died on the tenth of June."

"But that was in Afghanistan, fighting with men of a different race altogether!" cried Geoffrey.

"True; but how are we to know whose hand fired the shot that killed him? I heard, long afterwards, that the colonel who succeeded him in the command of his old regiment received one of those mysterious letters on the eleventh of June, though the regiment was in Calcutta, and your father was killed in Afghanistan!"

Geoffrey shuddered, and bent his head down on his hands.

"The question is, What are we to do?" said the General, once more beginning to walk up and down the room.

"Do! We can do nothing. Who can guard himself against an unseen enemy, who may strike now, or delay for years?"

"Don't say that. We can do something! I am certain that I have preserved my own life and my daughter's ——."

"Your daughter! Miss Chetwynd! She cannot be in danger."

"But she is—or would be if I were not here to guard her. My life is, of course, the first object. I did not dream that yours would be attempted before mine or I would have warned you."

"It would have been of no use," said the young man moodily.

"Wouldn't it? You were saved by an accident. The avengers were baulked for once. But it was only an accident. If you had known what to expect you might have shut yourself up in your room, and set them at defiance."

Geoffrey was astonished at the pluck shown by the veteran soldier. Far from being overwhelmed by the fatalistic dread that the terrible vengeance of the Hindoos was calculated to inspire, he had set himself to overcome it. His spirit was not crushed nor likely to be crushed. As he stood there, upright and bold, his eyes flashing fire, as if he were about to lead a regiment into action, Geoffrey thought he understood how it was that a few thousand Englishmen had conquered India.

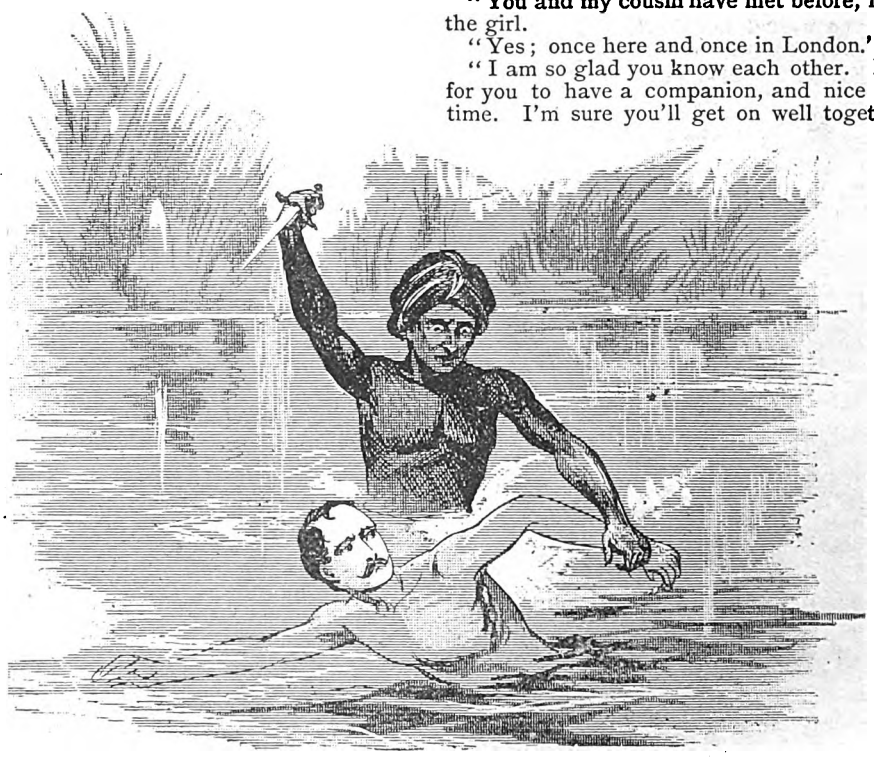
"It is time for us to be off to bed," said Sir Arthur, looking at his watch; "but I may tell you this for your comfort before you go: my chief hope is that the vendetta will die out with the men who first conceived it. I can easily imagine a set of fanatic priests conceiving and carrying out a scheme of vengeance that was to include the whole race of their enemies, and that would require many years for its accomplishment; but I do not believe it possible that they could inspire their successors with the same ferocity of purpose. It is not in human nature that they should. And India is not what it was thirty years ago. The power of the Brahmins has visibly declined since the Mutiny.

"So I hope that we—or at least you and Leila, will outlive these murderers. After all, why shouldn't we? It is only taking special precautions at a particular time of the year. This year, however, I have a special cause—it may be a mistaken one—for alarm, and special need of your help."

"I am yours, sir, to the last drop of my blood!" cried Geoffrey, starting to his feet, and holding out his hand.

"I am sure of it, my boy;" and Sir Arthur took the offered hand and shook it warmly. "And now, good night. Perhaps the incident from which I apprehend danger may not happen. If it does, you may be sure I shall make use of you if I can."

The two men parted without another word.



"His son was drowned while bathing."

CHAPTER III.

GEOFFREY'S RIVAL.

IT was the afternoon of the day on which Captain Byngham was to arrive. The General had gone to the station to fetch him; Miss Frewin was sitting at her wool-work in a corner of the drawing-room, and Geoffrey and Leila were seated by the window, awaiting the advent of the new guest.

"You and my cousin have met before, haven't you?" asked the girl.

"Yes; once here and once in London."

"I am so glad you know each other. It will be so pleasant for you to have a companion, and nice for him at the same time. I'm sure you'll get on well together."

It was with the greatest difficulty that Geoffrey refrained from bursting into a laugh. He looked at her, but she seemed perfectly serious.

"I'm afraid Captain Byngham and I have not much in common," he said drily.

"Oh! perhaps you don't like him?"

"Our tastes are different; so are our occupations."

"Yes; but you might be good friends for all that. You seem annoyed, depressed—I should say bored, at the idea of his coming."

"Well, it is only natural."

"Natural! Why?"

Surely the spirit of coquetry, which they say is inborn in every woman, prompted the question. But Geoffrey replied to it quickly enough.

"Why? Because he will naturally have the lion's share of your society. Miss Frewin and I will be a great deal 'thrown together,' I expect, during the next ten days. As for my intercourse with you, if I get 'good morning' at breakfast, 'please pass the salt' at lunch, and ——"

"Don't talk such nonsense," said Leila, blushing as she spoke.

"It isn't nonsense at all—but here is the dog-cart."

The dog-cart swept up the avenue at that moment, and Leila went out into the porch to meet her cousin, Geoffrey following her a little way behind.

Sir Arthur's cousin was a few years on the wrong side of thirty, but, like most men of fair complexion, he looked younger than he was. In appearance he was short, and decidedly stout, with thick limbs, fat podgy hands, and a bull neck. His eyes were of a light-blue, large, and rather prominent. His closely-cropped hair was fair, one might say reddish; his moustache was arranged after the approved pattern of the day.

Fighting with men of a different race."

In spite of his stoutness Byngham was strong and active in his habits. He jumped down from the high dog-cart as lightly as Geoffrey could have done, stepped up to Leila with a jaunty "How are you, coz?" and kissed her. He then turned round and helped the General to alight, chatting with Leila all the time.

A minute or two passed before anyone remembered Geoffrey; and when the General said, "I think you have met Mr. Dundas before," Captain Byngham took care to show that he did not by any means consider the young barrister his equal. Calmly applying his glass to his right eye, he regarded his fellow guest in silence for a second, and then saying—"Ah! Think I have. How d'ye do?" he slowly extended his hand.

Geoffrey did not refuse to take the offered hand, though it cost him a little internal struggle to do so. He took care to be polite; and he considered that no more was required of him.

From that hour Geoffrey kept a good deal in the background.

He foresaw that if he were to insist on his rights as a guest, and try to secure a fair share of Miss Chetwynd's society, he must live in a state of perpetual rivalry and ill-will with Captain Byngham—a rivalry and ill-will which might at any time culminate in an open rupture. Apart from the awkwardness of carrying on a struggle of a personal nature with his host's nephew, Geoffrey felt that such a contest would be beneath him. His pride would not allow him to push himself forward where he might not be wanted; and he told himself again and again that if Leila preferred the society of a man like Captain Byngham, he would be the last man in the world to interfere with her choice.

But this did not prevent him from suffering a jealous pang, as every morning after breakfast he saw Byngham stroll up to his cousin with—"What shall we do to-day, Leila?" as if there were no one in the world to consider but themselves. The mere fact that the Captain called Leila by her Christian name—a privilege to which as a relation he was fairly entitled—was most distasteful to Geoffrey; but still more obnoxious to him was the air of protectorship which Byngham assumed towards his young hostess—a manner which seemed to say, "You are really very pretty and amusing, my dear coz; and since I have nothing better to do, I don't at all mind playing with you."

It was hard for Geoffrey to see them go off together under the feeble chaperonage of Miss Frewin, or with only a groom for escort, while he had to be content with the society of the General, or betake himself to the library. If it had not been for what Sir Arthur had said to him in the smoking-room, he would at once have returned to London, even although he knew very well that to end his visit abruptly for no ostensible reason would only be playing into Captain Byngham's hands.

Nor could Geoffrey avoid thinking that Leila might have managed differently. He felt that he had cause to complain of her treatment of him; and when, one morning, she asked him whether he would not join Captain Byngham and herself in their ride, he declined, offering but a very flimsy excuse. He thought the girl flushed as she turned away from him, and he was glad to think that he had at last made her see that he was not insensible to the treatment he was receiving.

"How are you, coz?"

He expected to see her ride off with her cousin a few minutes later, a groom following at a respectful distance in the rear; and he was surprised to see, shortly afterwards, three figures cantering down the avenue, one of them being that of Sir Arthur himself.

"Can it be," Geoffrey asked himself, "that the continual companionship of Byngham is really distasteful to her—that she is glad to get anyone to accompany them and prevent her being alone with him?" It almost looked like it; and the mere suspicion that it might be so was sufficient to restore Geoffrey to his usual good spirits. He went and had a dip in the sea, then took a walk, and managed to get a little reading done before the riding party returned.

They all met, of course, at luncheon; and Geoffrey thought that Captain Byngham looked rather surlier than usual. Leila was in good spirits; but Geoffrey noticed that she addressed her conversation exclusively to her father and her cousin.

"Papa," said Leila, when the meal was almost over, "don't you think it would be a good thing to ask Emily and Jane Stoddart to pay us a visit just now?"

"Do you really mean it, my dear?" inquired the General, frowning a little.

"Yes, papa. I feel that we ought to invite them sometimes when we are not alone. Besides, they will help to entertain the Rajah."

"Oh, very well; have them by all means," said Sir Arthur. "The Misses Stoddart," he continued, turning to Geoffrey, "are the daughters of a half-pay lieutenant of the Royal Navy, a fine old fellow who lives a few miles along the coast. Nothing would induce him to sleep out of his own house; but he is willing to spare us two of his daughters occasionally. He can do that easily enough, for he has no fewer than five of them. And very nice girls they are."

It seemed to Geoffrey that this was a new indication that Leila did not care to be left much alone with Captain Byngham—a sign that his own case was not so very desperate after all.

That very afternoon an invitation was despatched to the Misses Stoddart, and on the following day they arrived—two nice, frank, ladylike girls. Everybody at Seacombe Towers, Geoffrey Dundas more especially, felt that they were a great acquisition. They lent an air of ease and festivity to the house. They filled the vacant places at the table; and made the dining-room resound with their merry talk and laughter. They laughed at everything, their own poverty included. Papa had brought them up to do it, they said; and they gravely assured Geoffrey that it was by far the best way of lightening that burden.

Resting after a game of tennis.

"What is the use of grumbling because one can't have new clothes, or nicer food, or larger rooms?" said Emily to Geoffrey one afternoon as they were resting after a game of tennis. "It only makes the privations harder to bear. Of course, we should like to go to London occasionally, and—oh! there are many things of more importance than that! But if you can't have what you want it is better just to try and think of something else."

"Upon my word, Miss Stoddart," said Geoffrey, "you are the first practical philosopher it has been my good fortune to meet."

Jane and Emily were always ready either for riding, boating, music, tennis, or whatever amusement was proposed; and best of all (from Geoffrey's point of view) the addition to the party made it much easier for him to get a few minutes with Leila now and then. He did not notice that on these occasions there was much less said than used to be the case when they were alone together. Geoffrey's supply of talk, usually plentiful enough, seemed to desert him whenever the much longed-for opportunities arrived. But happily Leila did not seem to notice that her companion's eloquence was not what it had been.

"Can you speak with me in the study for a few minutes?" said Sir Arthur to Geoffrey one morning.

"Certainly," was the answer.

"Don't let the others think we have made an appointment. Keep out of the way until they have settled down to their morning's amusement, and then come and tap at my door."

When Geoffrey presented himself in the General's sanctum, he found him pacing up and down the room. The young man had anticipated that Sir Arthur had something to say to him respecting the danger which in a few days might be at hand. Nor was he mistaken.

"Sit down," said the General abruptly. "Do you remember, on the night you and I talked over that—that business, I said that I had asked you here mainly for a selfish reason—that I wished to increase the garrison?"

"Yes, I remember."

"What I had in my mind was this. Some weeks ago I had a letter from an old friend in India, a man high up in the Government service, introducing the Rajah of Nagore, who, my friend told me, was paying a visit to Europe. The introduction was one I could not disregard. I felt that it must be honoured, and that it would be necessary for me to invite the Rajah to stay here. But I could not divest myself of a suspicion that this visit would be found to coincide with the tenth day of June.

"I have done all I could to insure the visit taking place at a different time. But my plans have fallen through. I have a letter this morning from the Rajah asking whether I can receive him quite early in the month. It may be only a coincidence; but I confess it alarms me. I would give anything to put off the man, but I cannot do so without offending, and, in all probability, injuring my friend in India. The Rajah will be here—my guest, free to go and come as he pleases, with his own countrymen at his beck and call, on the tenth of June!"

"But, General, you will not permit this, surely? The danger is too great!"

"It may be purely imaginary," interrupted the General. "That is the worst of it. I have no shadow of an excuse to offer, either to the Rajah, or Lord ——, or my friend in India, for shutting the door in the man's face. For that matter, he comes from a part of India a long way off from Churruckpore. But for aught I know some member of his train may be an emissary of the priests. They may even have arranged the time of the visit."

"At least, sir, have Miss Chetwynd sent to a place of safety," urged the young man, forgetting that he was allowing his anxiety for her to appear too plainly in his face.

"I cannot bear that she should be out of my sight," said Sir Arthur; "and fancy she may be safer here than anywhere else. Elsewhere she would be undefended; and I have an idea that those assassins strike first at the weakest and the most defenceless."

"Have you thought of any precautions that might be taken?" asked Geoffrey after a pause.

"The Rajah will probably have his own cook," said the General, "and I will take care that he does not have access to the regular kitchen. I will give a hint to the housekeeper and the cook, and tell the butler to open the wine in the dining-room, under my own eye. We must give no opportunity for anything like violence; and if necessary I shall not hesitate to tell the Rajah my story. I may be able to learn from his face whether he knows of it already. If he does he will understand that if anything happens to us while he is in the house he will be suspected. For myself, I mean to carry a revolver during his visit."

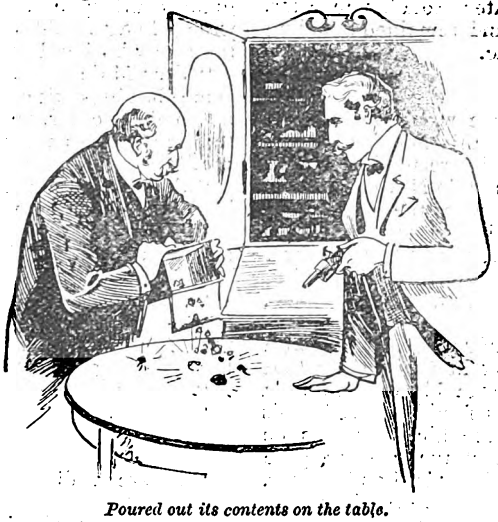
"I will do the same," exclaimed Geoffrey. "I will run up to town to-morrow and buy one."

"You needn't do that; you have only to help yourself," said the General; and opening the door of a closet he displayed a small armoury, containing a variety of firearms.

"What have you got there?" asked Geoffrey, pointing to a small black box which rested on a shelf by itself.

"That," said the General, with a queer look at his companion, "that contains a handful of jewels which I had snatched from the altar before the fusillade in the temple. Somehow I have never cared to have them set. I might have sold them; but as the Seacombe property came to me soon after I left Churruckpore, there was no need. Would you like to see them?"

Without waiting for an answer, Sir Arthur selected a key that hung on his bunch, opened the box, and poured out its contents on the table. To Geoffrey, who knew little about gems, there was nothing remarkable about the stones, many of which were uncut. But there was one exception. This was an opal as large as a blackbird's egg, and marked by this strange peculiarity—it was black! That is to say, it was so dark that at a little distance it seemed perfectly black. Yet the usual iridescent colours—green and red, and orange, and blue were there, glowing in the black depths of the stone as if their light was fed by some invisible fire.



Poured out its contents on the table.

"That is a strange stone; I should think very valuable," said Geoffrey, taking it into his hand.

"Yes, I daresay," said the General.

To Geoffrey's surprise there was an uneasy look on the old man's face. He seemed disturbed until the singular-looking stone was returned and safely locked up.

"Do you share the common superstition about opals?" asked Geoffrey.

Sir Arthur turned aside the question without directly answering it.

"Choose your own weapon," he said, "and be sure that your cartridges fit."

Thus brought back to the business in hand, Geoffrey chose a plain but serviceable revolver, and carried it, along with a box of cartridges, up to his bedroom.

The King's Favour

"ARISE, marquise," said Louis XV., fervently, giving his hand to the young woman prostrate at his feet. "Your name lifts the latch of our hearts as of our door; we have nothing to refuse the daughter of one of our bravest servants, the wife of one of our highest noblemen. Speak boldly; what do you wish?"

"Sire," replied Mme. de Navaille, sorrowfully, but with firmness, "I implore your Majesty's permission to withdraw from the Court and to enter a convent."

"Withdraw from our Court where you have just arrived, to take the black veil of the religious order when the white marriage veil has scarcely slipped from your brow!"

"Might it have pleased Heaven never to have placed it there!" faintly breathed the poor woman.

"What are you saying, marquise? Have you reason to complain of M. de Navaille?" inquired the monarch, in a kindly manner.

"Less of him than of another, sire."

"Has anyone failed to show you due respect, madame?" replied the king, gravely, in a doubting, slightly ironical tone.

"My life has been broken, all my hopes of happiness blasted."

"Who has done this?"

"An august and sacred person, whose humble servant and subject I am—your Majesty."

"I!" cried the prince, with unfeigned astonishment. "How so, if it please you?"

"Alas, sire, by a word, a smile!" answered Diane de Navaille, with a touch of charming melancholy. "Kings are the reflection of God; as He, they give life—and death. Their admiration adorns beauty, their disdain adds to homeliness—and I am homely, sire."

"Oh, marquise!" gallantly protested Louis XV.

"I am homely! I know it; it is not my fault; could I have chosen my face, most assuredly I should have chosen one less disagreeable to your Majesty."

"But it is not disagreeable; on the contrary——"

"Your Majesty is too good! I am homely, it is a fact——"

"Debatable."

"But is it kind of your Majesty, so favoured by Heaven, to make me feel it so cruelly?" continued the complainant, not allowing herself to be disconcerted by this interruption.

"Such a thought is far from me, marquise, you have misunderstood——."

"No, sire."

"Then it is I who am in the wrong," said the monarch, smiling with a pleased assurance. "Let it be so! The guilty one is ready to make amende honorable. Make your complaint, Madame; but first of all be seated, since you are my judge."

Then, with that courtesy towards all women, beautiful or homely, duchess or work-woman, inherited from his ancestor, the king led the marquise to a chair and remained standing before her in the most respectful attitude.

II.

Mme. de Navaille had said truly: she was homely. But till the day of her presentation at Court this homeliness had offended no one, not even the one most interested in her, her cousin and fiancé, the handsome Roland de Navaille, officer in His Majesty's guards. Surfeited with the pretentious beauties of Versailles, whom he disdainfully qualified as so many dolls, he found a new pleasure in the little wild flower that grew for him in the shadow of the old Brittany donjon, thinking as little of comparing her features with other women as the eglantine with the rose.

Besides, Diane was lovable, spirituelle; she dressed with taste, and the harmony was so perfect in the setting that surrounded her that Roland readily gave his consent to a marriage long determined upon by both families, and led his wife to Versailles to present her to the king. It was on leaving this memorable presentation that the new marquise noticed a troubled scowl on the brow of her lord and master. For the first time he was sullen, disagreeable, even forgetting when leaving her to kiss the ends of her rosy fingers, the more unpardonable as Diane had a beautiful hand—dainty, slender, aristocratic, a really lovely hand—proving better than all the parchments in the world her right to the society of the Court.

"Wherefore this cloud in the clear sky of this radiant day?" Mme. de Navaille questioned herself vainly. All had passed off to one's heart's desire; her toilet was irreproachable, her manners, without a flaw, had merited the approbation of the Countess of Egmont, a former mistress of this difficult art; not a breach of etiquette, not a slip in the ceremonial. His Majesty had been perfect, his gracious words still echoed in the ears of the young wife:

"We congratulate you on your choice, marquis; it justifies your motto: Oncques ne crains. Mme. de Navaille will honour our house and our Court."

As a compliment—was it really a compliment? Why, then, had the old nobleman, the Maréchal de France, Richelieu, looked at her with so much scorn, as with a fillip he scattered his snuff over his shirt front? Why had the king, noticing this look, suppressed an almost imperceptible smile? Why, catching the flying glance and smile, had Roland scowled?

III.

Alas! Yonder, in the depths of her own Brittany, Diane was only plain, at Versailles she was homely. This word falling, as was said, from a royal mouth had condemned the poor woman, and she bitterly regretted having come to the Court. With what a charming reception she had met? She had nothing to fear, neither rivalry, nor jealousy, nor backbiting, nor calumny.

"Mme. de Navaille is impeccable," solemnly declared the most viperous prudes.

"Navaille does not need to sleep with his ears open," grinned the young courtiers.

"Do not laugh, gentlemen; honour the unfortunate man's courage," repeated the Duc de Richelieu, cackling like an old dowager.

Some of these remarks reaching the ears of the marquis were acquitted at the point of his good sword. But the wound to his self-love was not so easily healed; he grew gloomy, sullen, reserved, and completely deserted his young wife.

Diane did not complain. Too proud to show her suffering, too brave to abdicate without struggle, too subtle not to divine the cause of neglect, she went straight to the king and demanded a reckoning for her lost happiness with an audacity that amused and interested the monarch. Besides, if homely, Mme. de Navaille was endowed with piquant and expressive features, unusual keenness, added to eyes sparkling with malice, a smile of a demon and the voice of an angel. Her small body contained great self-assertion, knowing perfectly well what she wished and wishing it intensely. The king listened to his virulent accuser with great courtesy and some pleasure; humbly confessed his wrong-doings, and offered to repair them by punishing the refractory husband severely.

"Your Majesty would make me still more odious," sighed, somewhat hypocritically, the disconsolate Ariadne, "love is not made to order, and all your royal power would not suffice to bring back to me the heart your disdain has stolen from me."

"Perchance, marquise—Achilles' lance healed the wounds it made—and if you would but lend me some assistance—"

He told his plan; she listened, as perplexed and blushing as a young village bride.

"Your good taste will be questioned."

"The king's taste is always the best in the eyes of his courtiers," said the monarch with the philosophical irony of the celebrated. "After me the deluge. For my part I fear but one thing."

"What is that, sire?" ingenuously inquired the marquise.

"To burn my fingers playing with fire."

IV.

"I have a disagreeable communication for you, my dear marquis."

"I am at your Majesty's orders," replied M. de Navaille, the towers of the Bastille dancing before his eyes, as he had been called into the presence of the king after the long audience with his wife.

"A bitter sacrifice for a young husband——"

"Now we're coming to it," thought the marquis.

"——as much in love as you must be," calmly continued Louis XV.

Roland winced.

"I have just informed Mme. de Navaille of her appointment as lady of honour to my daughter-in-law. The Dauphine desires it unconditionally."

"Oh, sire! such an honour——"

"Deprives you somewhat of your wife, marquis, but we will find compensation for you; the first provincial regiment at our disposal will be put under your command——"

Roland left the presence of the king with more anxiety than he wished to acknowledge; the perplexity, the evident zeal of the monarch had not escaped him, and the favours falling so abundantly upon the heads of himself and wife moderately reassured him. Distracted, preoccupied, he pondered over the royal words. A compensation? For what? A regiment—provincial. Did they wish to be rid of him? Why? A fleeting idea passed through his mind: was it—Diane? Nonsense! Was it possible?

"My sympathy, Navaille!" said one of the gentlemen equerries, stepping up to him familiarly. "You come from the king looking somewhat sheepish. Has your wife recalled you back to duty—to the conjugal fireside?"

"You are far from the mark, my dear sir," returned the young man, assuming a careless manner. "On the contrary his Majesty has appointed the marquise as lady of honour to the Dauphine and promises me a regiment."

"Hear, hear, hear!" said the courtier, with a peculiar inflection, as he had already noticed with what particular courtesy the king had dismissed the fair suppliant.

"In any case, my compliments, my dear sir; you can but be satisfied."

"Charmed!" replied Roland in a funereal tone.

V.

That evening, as foreseen by His Majesty, the marked attention the king gave the new lady of honour was noticed by all; moreover, it became more pronounced day by day.

Digitized by Google

His eyes did not leave her, he chatted with her familiarly, laughing and joking like a young man. Diane returned his sallies with a spirit worthy of the Mortemarts, bringing to mind the celebrated favourite of the Roi-Soleil. The periwigs turned like so many weathercocks in the direction of the royal breeze.

Mme. de Navaille was soon the object of every eye, Dazzled by this new planet, even M. de Richelieu, so disdainful on the day of her presentation, recited to her his most flowery madrigals. The men, discerning in her a thousand unknown and charming attractions, the women a thousand frightful defects unperceived till now, biting their lips and disdainfully pouting, gave a sure guarantee to her triumph.

As to Roland, furious, vexed, he champed his bit in silence, trying in vain to pierce the circle of courtiers who surrounded her. She was his wife! By what right had they dared to steal his treasure? A furious temptation to snatch her from this crowd and carry her far, far away, penetrated his whole being. Was he forgetting his indifference, his disdain! The old love was born again within his heart. Diane was now in his eyes, as in those of all the Court, the most adorable, the most beautiful, since the king had distinguished her.

This punishment lasted an entire week, for the poor husband could not succeed in reaching his wife; he was obliged to restrict himself to ferocious glances, inordinate pantomimes, which seemed to amuse the marquise very much whenever she deigned to notice them. M. de Navaille tore his lace frills, beat his servants, lashed his horses. His vexation turned to rage; he accused Diane of ambition, of perfidy.

It was even worse when, one morning, he received his commission as colonel from the Dauphin, with an order to join his regiment immediately—at Strasburg! Astounded, he was yet obliged to receive the congratulations of his comrades; to thank the king, making the best of a bad bargain; to leave, after exchanging a simple good-bye with his wife, who replied to him by a gracious bow.

VI.

"Most assuredly, marquise, M. de Navaille does not love you as you deserve to be loved," said Louis XV., noticing Diane's dejection.

"Alas, sire, I fear it is so."

"And hope it is so."

"Oh, sire!"

"To submit so readily, to forsake such a heart as yours, is to undervalue its worth?

"What could he do, sire? The commands of a sovereign must be obeyed."

"Nonsense, marquise! A man really in love braves all for the one he loves. Had I been M. de Navaille I should have wheeled about at the first relay and returned to Versailles."

"Your Majesty would, then, absolve him for doing so?"

"What, has he dared——"

"I did not say that, but in case it should happen that——"

"On my honour, marquise, I do not know, for the temptation would be great."

"Your Majesty is jesting."

"No, madame, I am just as earnest as I am sincere."

"Let his Majesty recall his first impression, the true one!"

"I remember but one thing, and that is that you are adorable and adored!"

"Sire, you are making light of all this. Your Majesty promised me——"

"To return you to your husband on the first requisition; but he does not demand you of us, he leaves without looking back, without a word, without a letter. Let us profit by his negligence."

Diane opened her mouth to reply, but quickly bethought herself as she carelessly toyed with her ruff. She was a clever and resolute little body; if regretting her imprudence, and trembling for having thrown herself into the wolf's mouth, she dissembled her fear beneath a smile.

"Grace, sire. Permit me to await as many days for the return of Ulysses as Penelope awaited years."

"When this time is passed, and he does not return——"

"Then, sire, you may put me to the test—I shall be no wallflower."

"You are delightful."

"It will be fair play, will it not, sire? And if he returns there will be no Bastille awaiting him?"

"I swear it," replied the monarch with some hesitation, consoling himself with the words of the Duke de Guise: "He would not dare!"

VII.

The marquis had dared. Returning at full speed, he has succeeded in sending a note to his wife, begging her, in the name of his honour and his love for her, to accord him an interview. Kneeling at her feet, kissing her hands with the most tender protestations, he besought her to fly with him from the dangerous love of the king.

"But, my friend, you are crazy! The king loves me! I, so homely! I even doubted your love!"

"Do not doubt it, Diane! I love you; for you I would brave exile, prison, death. I love you!"

He meant what he said. Diane listened to him, laughing to herself at the mobility of human vanity. But, being a woman of as much heart as mind, she was indulgent, and allowed herself to be convinced.

. . . . . .

The next morning, on rising, the king found a cleverly written note awaiting him, signed "Penelope," apprising him of the circumstances and reminding him of his promise.

"The little masquerader!" he exclaimed, "she has played us both a trick."

But as he was a good prince he pardoned the "pretty homely one."

M. de Navaille never suspected the truth.

The marquise, judging that discretion was the better part of valour, left him in ignorance, and was happy in his love for more than fifty years.

"Ha! ha! my boys," he would say with his cracked voice, "I was obliged to kidnap your grandmother from the late Louis XV., who was a connoisseur in pretty women and very much in love with——."

THE ACCIDENT AT THE FOUNDRY.

TWENTY years ago I was employed as an inspector of engineering work of various descriptions, chiefly connected with railways manufactured in this country for export to one of the colonies. This occupation brought me constantly in contact with the production and working of iron in all its various branches and in many different parts of the country.

At the time I refer to, a large contract had been placed with a firm in the North of England for the material of an important iron bridge, for the supervision of which I was responsible. This work included the casting of some heavy iron plates of rather complicated design for the caissons of the foundation.

The foundry where my plates were cast was a large open shop, a hundred yards in length and of great height. Across one end of it, at about fifteen feet from the ground, was an iron platform supported on columns, and the mouth of the "cupola," or melting furnace, which supplied this end of the foundry, was on a level with this platform.

In the centre of the platform was a deep bay or recess, to receive the casting-pot—a huge iron cauldron holding some eight or ten tons of molten metal. This was suspended by chains from a massive iron crane erected on the platform. The movement of the crane carried the casting-pot to and from the mouth of the furnace, and enabled it to be placed over any of the moulds within reach, so as to run the metal where required.

The next running was to take place in the early morning, before the breakfast hour, and the last thing at night I went round to examine the moulds and discuss our difficulties.

The manager of the foundry department, whom I will call Mr. Conyers, happened to be an old friend of many years' standing. He had been a foreman at the works in Sheffield where I served my time, and was an excellent fellow, for whom I had the greatest regard. After talking over the coming day's work with him, we went into a small office partitioned off at the end of the shop under the iron platform, and I made one or two sketches relating to the castings, after which we left the shop together.

"I am going down to Sunderland by the morning express for a couple of days," said Mr. Conyers. "Would you mind wiring to me if you want anything special?"

I assented, and shortly afterwards we parted.

The next morning, soon after six o'clock, I was again in the foundry, where a gang of men were preparing for running in the next charge for our plate-moulds. As the operation required prompt movement and separate attendance at each mould, they were standing round in a circle, each man ready to do his own part.

The blazing stream from the cupola was already filling up the great vessel hanging at its mouth, and the men at the crane were waiting to bring the charge out over the moulds. As soon as the furnacemen with their irons had lifted off one or two flakes of scum from the glowing surface, the casting-pot began to move majestically outwards through the recess, when a mishap occurred, of a kind, unfortunately, too well known in these risky operations.

On a small trolly, underneath the platform, there happened to be standing a long cast-iron rib belonging to some girder-work, which had been cleared from the mould, and was waiting to be moved away. Up to the moment of bringing out the present charge from the cupola, nobody had observed that one end of this rib, as it stood in the shadow, projected between the columns just far enough to touch the side of the casting-pot as it passed clear of the platform. It was but a matter of an inch or two; but, as ill-fate would have it, just sufficent to tip the great pot forward on its pivot, and cause the weight of the molten mass inside to overbalance it.

The next moment the whole charge of seven or eight tons of liquid iron was poured forth in one tremendous cataract of fire upon the floor of the foundry.

Of course there was a frantic stampede among the men, every one of whom flung down his tools and made a dash for the far end of the shop. They most of them knew by terrible experience the common results of such accident—namely, that the damp sand of the floor usually causes the hot metal to fly explosively all over the place.

Luckily, although it had been impossible at a moment's notice to stop the crane, its comparatively slow movement had given everybody a chance of seeing what was going to happen, and therefore an opportunity of escape. I, who being specially interested in the casting had placed myself somewhat closer to the moulds than anyone else, sprang back at once with the same intention.

But at the very instant of doing so I saw before me a sight which, even at that moment of fearful peril, seemed to rivet me to the ground.

In the very middle of the veil of liquid fire, which for three seconds streamed from the tilted cauldron to the ground, I saw standing upright, and gazing with a fixed look of astonishment and dismay at me, the figure of George Conyers, the manager!

All power seemed to have gone out of my limbs. The thought thrilled through my brain that at that moment some dire catastrophe had overtaken him also on his journey, and that the mysterious coincidence of our fate had thus brought us in the spirit face to face.

I stood still, gazing at him in like manner; and before I could move again, a splash of the melted metal flew at me, struck me on the shoulder, and instantly burned through my clothes.

For a few wild paces I stumbled back once more; and, amid the agonising pain that followed, fell on the floor, fainting.

I remained unconscious for a considerable time, and on "coming to" found myself lying in an arm-chair in the counting house, with several men around me, and a doctor at my side, whom I recognised.

"Where is Mr. Conyers?" I exclaimed, starting up as the light came back to me.

"Why, here, to be sure!" replied that gentleman, stepping in front of me, "and as hearty as anybody present at this meeting."

"Why—why"—I muttered, sinking back again. "I thought you were going to Sunderland!"

"So I am," answered the manager, "As soon as we've cleared this mess up. But the express is at 8.30, and it isn't seven yet."

"Where were you?" I said, still hopelessly bewildered.

"In the little office under the crane, of course. I rushed out when I heard the shouting, and was nearly as scared as you were when I saw you staring at me over the moulds like that."

"I can't understand it," I replied, still half regarding him as a disembodied spirit.

"Why, bless the man!" said Mr. Conyers, with a merry laugh, "how many weeks have you been mixed up with the foundry trade? Have you been an iron-worker all these years and didn't know that clean molten iron, when it is quite liquid, is transparent like water? I was on one side of the stream and you on the other, and we saw each other through it!"

Such, indeed, was the explanation of the mystery, and with all my years of experience and powers of observation, I had never taken any note of this curious natural fact. But having, as I said before, had it brought home to me in the manner just related, I think the reader will agree that I am never likely to forget it.

Curious Experiments IN CORPULENCY

"A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderate lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2 lb. to even 12 lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetal knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

"Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, price 4d. stamps) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drank as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2 lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for his book, which can be obtained through booksellers, or at the address given above."—Leeds Times, December 1, 1894.

"We were reading in the 'Penny Illustrated Paper' how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Parents will not realize the fatal error of neglecting the first symptoms of delicacy in their children. Looking at the matter from a purely selfish point of view, it is a considerable saving to one's purse, for medical authorities all admit that one single dose of medicine given in time will be worth 999 after the mischief is done. Once allow the seeds of ill-health to sprout, and remember you will have a harvest to cope with.

If there is constitutional weakness in yourself, bear in mind that your children are liable to inherit it, and therefore that their ailments warrant a double amount of anxiety and care. If you attack the delicacy tonically before the child is 15 years of age, and it is a complete waste of time to treat it in any other way, the whole system will be built up and the nutrition of the body renewed and strengthened, and the result arrived at will be a thoroughly sound and healthy organisation.

Because your children are delicate and weak, do not imagine for a moment that they need remain so, for youth responds readily to a tonic treatment.

No matter how undermined the constitution may be, it can be permanently reconstructed by putting new blood tonically into the system.

Delicacy, natural feebleness, and languor in children cannot prevail against the curative properties of Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which contains all the necessary ingredients for rebuilding a delicate constitution. It restores to the blood the vital elements eliminated by fragility, gives the brain its necessary stimulus, and the muscular system a new elasticity; in a word, what is lacking in failing health, it supplies. All delicacy, no matter how chronic or obstinate, will yield before it.

It is useless to patch up here and there; go to the root of the mischief and attack that, every organ will then come under its influence and become healthy. It is too well known that a delicate chest leads to consumption only when the child is imperfectly nourished; germs find no soil in a perfectly healthy body.

Infantina's Syrup must not be confounded with any of the old-fashioned out-of-date oily compounds, for it is quite different. It resembles in appearance and taste a fruit syrup, is pleasant to the taste, and far surpasses such nauseous mixtures.

Infantina Syrup is a perfect tonic for children from 2 to 15 years of age.

It is sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly, remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA CO., 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 327.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 6, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE LOVE OF SISTER MARIA

THERE it was, just as it had been years ago—the long stretch of sand dazzling white in the sunshine, the high grey rocks encircling the little harbour as with a sheltering arm, the broad stretch of ocean beyond, with white caps dancing over it. Two or three fishing-boats rocked slowly in the distance, and an occasional gull swept the blue horizon with its shining wings. He felt as though he had opened a book and come unexpectedly upon a picture known in childhood, and long unseen, save in the mirror of memory.

"It is beautiful," he said slowly, "and yet——"

He did not finish the sentence, but turned and walked the length of the beach.

Strong as he looked, Percy St. John was a victim of disease—a disease which, as yet, his elastic figure, firm cheek, and bright eyes refused to indicate. But his physician's skill taught him the truth, and with feverish anxiety he watched the development of each new symptom, as a man unrolls with his own hand the paper bearing his death sentence. On this, the morning of his arrival in the little seaport, with not an acquaintance in the village, and with the words, "Here for health!" indelibly graven before his mental vision, it was not to be expected that he could look on anything with joy-seeing eyes.

He reached the end of the sandy stretch, passed round a high rock, and came upon a figure of a young girl, standing barefoot in the shallows, with a bunch of seaweed in her arms. Her back was half-turned to him, and she was singing vigorously in a clear, full voice. She saw him directly; the song died upon her lips, the red colour in her smooth, sun-burnt cheeks deepened vividly, and she dropped the seaweed on her feet, which were strangely fair in contrast with her slim brown hands.

"I beg your pardon," he said courteously. "I did not expect to see anybody here; and you—you did not expect to see anybody here; and so I have startled you."

The girl had surveyed him critically and unconfusedly as he spoke. She liked him. A smile dimpled her mouth.

"You need not go," she said quickly, as he stepped back, "unless—you want to."

"Then I will stay, thank you. What beautiful specimens of seaweed you have. Would you care to part with some?" He bent, and took up a piece like a pale pink feather.

"Take it if you like it—take it all," she urged.

"Oh, no; you did not understand me. I thought of collecting some to take home with me, and this is the prettiest I have ever seen. I wanted to purchase the rarest specimens."

"That you can find anywhere. Take it!" she insisted; and at the sight of the coin he had taken from his pocket she stepped quickly from the water and went a little way from him, where she seated herself on a shelf of a rock, and began to draw on a pair of queer little wooden shoes.

"Now I have offended her," mused St. John, "worse luck!" He began to gather the seaweed from the sand. "I am always clumsy nowadays. I wonder why?"

"You should see the place where it grows!" said a soft voice at his elbow; and there she stood beside him again with a childlike smile on her lips.

"Where is it? I will go to it."

"Come, I will take you; I can row," she answered. "Leave that here: there is much more beautiful growing there. That I get to stuff pillows with." She pushed away the bunch he had selected with the broad toe of her shoe; and he followed, feeling strangely glad in this human companionship of hers.

It was while the little boat danced gaily over the waters of the bay that he noticed again how pretty she was in an odd type of her own; her large eyes, as blue as the dark water around them, her little head uncovered save with her thick brown hair, that fell from it in two heavy plaits far below the waist, and her strong, sun-kissed arms waving in rhythmic motion with the oars.

"My name is St. John—Dr. St. John," he said. "I am here for my health. I hope to get strong soon and go back to my work."

She looked at him critically from under her dark lashes. "You do not look ill," she murmured. "You look big and strong."

"I am big," he admitted, smiling, "and I am trying hard to get strong. And your name—won't you tell me what it is?"

"Maria." She pronounced it as though she caressed it—in a slow, sweet fashion that sounded like "Mareeya."

"How pretty it is!" he exclaimed. "I have a little friend who has the same name: but she pronounces it as she spells it. I think I must teach her to pronounce it as you do when I go back. She will be so pleased to hear of you, and your beautiful home, and your boat which you row yourself." A shadow crossed his face.

"Why do you look sad when you talk of her?" the girl asked.

"Because she is a cripple. She will never walk again," he said sadly. "You know, I have charge of a big house, a hospital, where all these poor little sorrowful children are brought and cared for—hundreds of them. I miss them very much, and they will miss me; and that is the reason I must hurry and get well for their sakes."

"A house full of children who will never walk again!" Her great eyes opened wide; never in her free, bright life had she heard of a child who could not walk after it had once been taught.

"Oh, no; many of them are cured, and go out strong and well, and bright for the rest of their lives." His dark eyes glowed with happy memories of these.

Her face beamed with interest; she asked question after question, and he had hardly answered them all when they reached the cavern where the seaweed grew.

A skilful sweep of the oars brought them under the cool, grey rocks overhanging the entrance and into a floating sea of the delicate plants. She watched him in pleased silence as he raised piece after piece from the water and held them in the clearer light.

"Do you know," he said, examining them closely, "they have a deeper interest for me than their mere beauty arouses."

"Yes?" questioned the girl.

"They have medicinal properties; there is a medicine, iodine, made from them. Iodine brings strength and rest from pain to many of my poor little hospital children. I must make a collection of these to carry home with me. Who knows how valuable some of them may be!"

"Oh, may I help you?" she asked breathlessly: "I might find some very fine ones, and that might help the poor children in the home you tell me of."

"Oh, may I help you?"

He smiled softly as he thanked her, and pressed the little brown hand next to him. She had never seen so courteous and gentle a man before.

As they rowed home, with a great wet mass of the delicate grasses piled between them, she was strangely silent, with a wonderful tenderness in her splendid eyes. He saw that the story of the suffering children had sunk deep in her responsive heart.

When they parted on the beach it was as friends, and friends who had at heart a common cause. He wondered how the morning had slipped away, and she dreamed all the afternoon of long lines of snowy beds, from which pale faces looked expectantly, and seemed to feel the thrill that brightened them at sight of a handsome face, a merry laugh, a strong arm, such as she had known for the first time to-day.

Dr. St. John had just finished his breakfast next morning, and started for a stroll on the beach, when Maria came, with sparkling eyes, to meet him.

"Oh, come with me!" she entreated, forgetting, in her earnestness, any greeting. "Such a beautiful place outside the bay—such seaweed! Come!"

She was so excited that she skipped often in her walk with him to where the boat lay; and when they were in it she rowed so fast that her cheeks crimsoned, her hair streamed in unheeded riot to the wind, and her breath came through her parted lips in short, quick gasps. In vain he insisted, entreated, half-scolded; her impulsive spirit could not be suppressed, and quietude reigned not again in her heart until his own delight and enthusiasm in the beautiful spot to which she guided him brought satisfaction.

This was the beginning of a close companionship. St. John revelled in the charm of a nature the pure simplicity of which was unlike anything he had known before; and the girl's heart glowed when the fisher-folk spoke of the fine young doctor as "Maria's friend." "Fine" meant to them bright, generous, congenial. Percy St. John was all of these. He had a way of adapting himself to other people, even the simplest.

The days went by—days that brought no ripple of excitement to the little seaport, the serene monotony of which, calm with sunshine, pure with sea-winds, put new strength in St. John's veins, and, gradually, new hope in his heart. He grew stronger.

To Maria they were a revelation. No shadow dimmed their brightness until one morning, as they floated idly in the boat, the Doctor said suddenly: "Maria, I must go home in a week. I wish I could take you with me."

Her heart sank at his first words and rose at his last. He saw the light in her eyes, and added kindly, "But that would never do. You would pine there, in city walls, for your sea, and your sky, and your boat."

He was sorry he had suggested it, for her lips trembled; she bent her head, and presently a big tear splashed on her round arm.

"Never mind," he went on soothingly: "you must not feel sorry about it, because I am going to leave you something to do for me."

She looked up quickly from under wet lashes.

"I want you to stay here and row and live out in the fresh air, as you have always done, until you are well grown and strong—a woman. And then you will want to leave your boat, perhaps; and, if you do, I will send for you to come to my hospital and help me nurse my poor little children. It would be too much for you now."

She smiled a little at the thought, but looked so grave again that he was afraid for several days to broach the subject of departure.

A "wet spell," as the fisher-people called it, came after this, and during its duration the Doctor kept his room closely; while Maria, accustomed to the chilly dampness and desolation without, haunted the beach like a restless wraith, wondered at her strange discomfort, and watched and longed for the sun again.

At last it came; the sea-fog lifted, the waves danced merrily, and she waited by the boat for her friend. But he did not come, and a sudden terror seized her heart. Perhaps he was ill—and she had not known it—she had not been to see—he would think her heartless. Tears blinded her eyes at the thought. She ran as fast as her nimble feet would carry her to the cottage of old Lois, where he lived—so fast that her breath was quite gone when she reached it, and she must needs gasp hard as she knocked at the door to regain it.

The old woman came, grumbling, to answer the summons. "Oh, it is you, is it?" she called, angrily, as she discovered her visitor. "To come and batter my door till I think the pig is got loose, or the boat swept away; an' I leave all my dinner to burn!" With this she would have shut the door again, but the girl cried imperiously: "Wait! Tell me if the young doctor is ill."

"The young doctor! Ha, the young doctor, is it?" returned the old woman with a toothless grin. "The young doctor is gone!" With which she was gone too.

The girl's heart gave a great thump, and then sank with a sickening thud as heavy as lead in her breast. It seemed to sink quite away from her and leave her without feeling. By some impulse she pushed the heavy door open again and went in. The living room was deserted.

From the back of the cottage came Lois' shrill treble. She was singing as she cooked her dinner of fish and eggs. In front of the girl was another door. She knew where it led, and, with a wild desire to be where he had lately been, she stole noiselessly to it, opened and entered it, shutting it behind her.

Then she stood in the little study that had been Percy St. John's her hands rigidly clasped, and her great eyes staring straight ahead of her. Then a long quivering sigh escaped her lips—a sigh of relief. There between the little windows stood his trunk; on the rough table were his books. He would come back! He was not gone for ever!

The revulsion of feeling that swept over her made her head swim. Her limbs shook; she fell upon her knees and buried her face in her hands, too happy to pray in words. Minutes passed while she knelt there. When she raised her head she looked, still kneeling, about the little room once more. It was barely furnished—scarcely comfortable, it would seem, to eyes accustomed to the luxuries of life; but to her it was holy. In its surroundings she felt the spell of his living presence.

Rising slowly, she crept to the table, and looked at the books scattered over it. One was left open; she had often found him studying it on the beach. She longed to touch it; she felt she must lay her head on it, and sob her heart out; but she could not. She turned suddenly away, and almost cried out in pain, as though she had been struck.

On a chair, before her, hung the heavy jacket he wore in the boat. It seemed an unresponsive part of himself that rose before her, and mocked her with its silent personality. She went to it and bent over it, passing her hands up and down its warm roughness, in lingering caress; she slipped her fingertips into the loose pockets, where she had seen his shapely hands, that shamed her own in their whiteness, so often thrust.

In the button-hole still hung a faded flower; she had seen him put it there, whistling to himself, the last day they were together. The merry whistle rang out for her again.

She buried her face in her hands.

She threw her arm across the chair and pillowed her head upon it, crying miserably.

She was startled by footsteps in the outer room. Shuffling feet, in wooden shoes, approached the door behind her. There was no means of escape save through the open window of the little bedroom beyond. With a swift bound she reached it, grasped the sill with her hands, and, with one agile spring, was through it and on the ground beneath. Then she ran, ran, ran, until, with the tears still wet on her cheeks, she reached the boat, flung herself panting into it, and pushed out far from shore.

She did not return until the stars were reflected in the dark water. Then she crept home, tired out. She lingered in the living-room only long enough to hear them say the young doctor had spent the day at the neighbouring town, ten miles inland, and had returned late that evening to the village. Then she went silently to bed. She did not want to be questioned.

It was early the next morning, when the sun was shining gloriously, and she was stretched at full length on the sand, regardless of the fulness of its power, that Dr. St. John suddenly looked down at her and said, with his happy laugh:

"Well, little salamander, I have found you. What a runaway you are! I looked for you yesterday, to say I was going to run away for the day, but I couldn't find you anywhere."

She listened to him without stirring, and some new expression in her wide eyes puzzled him. Then she sat up, shaking her glossy braids free of the little sand particles. "Did you have a fine day?" she asked.

"Very. I enjoyed my new experiences; but not so much as my new home and the companionship of my little friend here." His tone was full of gentle courtesy. Its very friendliness hurt her. She sprang up.

"Did you come for a row?" she asked abruptly. He did not understand her strange, new mood. But she was a creature of moods; he did not question this one.

"No," he said kindly, "not now. I came to talk to you; I have something to show you. Won't you walk back to the cottage with me? It is there."

They went back together; he talking constantly, and she listening with pleased attention.

Old Lois was out, and the cottage was very quiet. He threw open the study door and stood back for her to enter, little dreaming with what agony she had so recently crossed its threshold. She was thinking of it, with a sudden swelling at her throat, when she stopped abruptly, her hands clasped together, and a long "Oh-h-h!" escaping her scarlet lips.

The small apartment was transformed. Table and chairs, and even the floor, were strewn with bright toys of all descriptions—quaint dolls and birds and animals, fishing-boats and fisher-folk in their native dress, long strings of rainbow-coloured shells, and half-a-dozen seagulls with outstretched wings and eyes as bright as they had been in life.

"Do you like them?" he asked at last, as she ventured a step nearer.

"Ah, beautiful!" she gasped, sinking in childlike abandon upon the floor beside them. "But what can you do with so many?"

"Can you not guess?" he questioned smiling. She shook her head.

"Why, they are for the hospital children—all but those which you like best. I want you to choose——"

"You are going away!" The words seemed wrung from the bitterness of her soul. He looked down suddenly into a white face, with piteous, upturned eyes.

"Poor child, poor little thing!" he said tenderly. "I must. I am much stronger, and my children need me. But, Maria——." He bent and laid a hand on her soft hair.

"You must not! You shall not!" she groaned.

St. John was in despair. He smoothed the thick braids soothingly. "Listen, Maria," he urged; "be sensible——"

"I cannot," she cried. "I will not. I love you—you shall not go away from me!" She raised herself on her knees and threw her strong young arms around him, holding him as though she would never let him go.

He did not speak for a moment, until her wild passion had spent itself in a frenzy of weeping. Then, with the tear-stained face hidden against his knees, he spoke to her again in a low voice that sounded strangely unlike his own. "My poor little misguided child!" he said, and the hand on her head trembled a little. "Listen, Maria! You must listen to me."

The masterfulness of his tone overcame her. She suffered him to unloose her arms and lead her to the armchair, in which he placed her. Then he sat down by her, and took the cold, quivering fingers within his own warm grasp.

"There has been a great mistake, Maria, and it is my fault." He paused an instant in pitying tenderness for the white, set face before him. She was making a mighty struggle to be calm.

"It is my fault," he said again; "I looked on you as a child, when you are a woman. I thought of you as a child, and you did not understand me——"

"I am growing fast—I will be quite grown up soon," she sobbed.

"Yes, you will be fully grown soon," he answered gently, "but you must never think of this again."

"Do you mean I must not love you?" she gasped.

"Yes, child; I mean that. You must not—you cannot——"

She threw herself downward on the table. "Why not?" she wailed. "I must—I must!"

He walked away from her the length of the narrow apartment and into the sleeping-room beyond. When he came back she lifted her head slowly, and he laid a tiny velvet case in her hand. It enshrined the fair face of a woman—a young woman, with a halo of bright curls above her brow and a joyous smile on her lips.

"This," he said reverently, "is my wife."

The girl gave him one wild, despairing look. Then she put the picture from her and got up.

"Let me go!" she said fiercely.

"Then you will not say good-bye to me? You will not let me tell you how sorry I am; you will not let me help you!"

She looked at him helplessly, with eyes the desolateness of whose misery wrung his heart.

As he took both her hands and pressed her into the chair once more, she did not comprehend how it was that all the spell of his old influence came over her and kept her there—kept her great eyes reading his face while he told her gently of the sweet-faced woman who, for a year, had been his own; how she missed him and longed for him with an intensity of love unutterable; how, if Maria would come down to them for a visit, his wife would welcome and love her and make her their own.

She grew quite calm while he talked. Her heart seemed to have broken with that last great blow. She took her hands from him quietly enough.

"I must go now," she said wearily; "good-bye."

She got up and put out her hand to him again without looking at him. He took it in his own, and drawing from his watch chain a little cross, brilliant with rubies, laid it upon her soft palm.

"I want you to have this as a keepsake, Maria," he said. "I have always intended to give it to you when I went away. Won't you wear it and think of me often, and how I will remember you always and hope to see you soon again?"

She watched it glittering for a moment before she said simply, "Yes."

Then she turned to go, without a backward look.

"But this is not really good-bye, you know," he called after her. "I am not going until to-morrow morning, at five; I will see you again."

Soothed the fevered hand within her own.

But the day grew to noon's splendour and evening's shadow, and the night came on unheeded by the girl who lay hidden in a crevice of the rock by the sea—lay with her face half-buried in the spray-kissed lichen, her hands convulsively clasping the little jewelled cross.

When morning came she lifted herself stiffly, and the wan light showed a face which bore the imprint of years of suffering. She had hoped to die in that long, silent night.

She sat shivering—that deadliest of all shivering that is not from cold—and saw the boat come near, and land. She heard her own name called long and shrilly from the beach. She could even see them as they stood in the early light, the group of faithful fisher folk assembled to see the young doctor safely on his journey.

She strained her eyes until the familiar figure came in sight and moved briskly among them, lingering, she knew, for a hearty handshake, a word of thanks, a kindly wish for each one. And she—she would never hear him, touch him, know him near her again! She shrieked aloud, but the remorseless wind beat the echo back upon her.

Once, as he approached the boat, he turned again; not towards the little crowd he was leaving, but in the direction of the tiny hut she called her home; he looked intently, paused, waved his hand, and disappeared. And all was darkness.

Ten years later, and still the long rows of cots in the Hospital of the Holy Innocents were full of patient child-sufferers. For patient the gentle innocents seemed ever to become.

But they were not the same children that had been there ten years before. Some of them had been sent back to happy homes and friends, cured; some had no homes awaiting them, had learned to look upon these rooms as home, and had stayed to nurse, with tender care and tender sympathy, long-sufferers such as they had been.

To these last the little invalids were never tired of turning for the restful tales they told of other children, who, in wretched pain, from which nothing but death could ever bring relief, learned to look forward bravely to that time, and even to welcome it. The beds of these were made in the sweet, old garden, flower-covered; where the little ones, in death as in life, grouped close around the spot where rested their benefactor, their father, their dearest friend and comforter, Dr. St. John.

There was one who never talked of this; who moved about serenely in her soft black gown; whose every touch was calm; whose face was peace itself. "Sister Maria!" the little voices called. And in the night she sought their beds of pain; and, sitting in the shadow, soothing the fevered hands within her own, she told strange, lovely stories of the far-off sea; a strong, bright girl, untouched by pain and care, who lived there once, and rowed her own brown boat, and knew the caverns where the seaweed grew; learnt how to tame the wild sea-birds, and where to find the rainbow-tinted shells that never ceased to murmur of their home. Daylight would come before they dreamed that the long night was gone. And with its cooling balm, soothed by the caressing of her tender voice, the child would fall asleep.

Then Sister Maria noiselessly flitted from bed to bed, drawing the curtains to keep out the growing light. When her last mission for the night was done, she always went to the old window that overlooked the garden, fell on her knees, and offered up her morning prayer to God. And at its close she lifted the rosary that hung ever to her side, and pressed its cross of rubies to her lips.

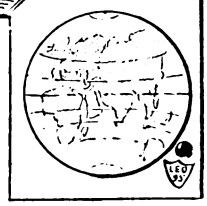
A SIMPLE MISTAKE



AFTER I had received a diploma from one of our venerable universities, I felt that I could not do better than to complete my education on the Continent. As I wished to perfect my already excellent knowledge of modern languages, I thought residence in some continental town would enable me to accomplish both purposes.

Whether I chose the University of Göttingen or Heidelberg, I do not care to state; and, if the ingenious reader can learn from internal evidence that I pursued my studies at neither of these great institutions of learning, let him not be surprised. I prefer not to indicate precisely the scene of the strange happening, about which I am going to tell, for reasons which will be readily understood by anyone who attentively peruses this story.

We were instructed principally by lectures. Some of us took notes, some drew caricatures, or scrawled verses upon the otherwise blank pages of our books; and only a very few became thoroughly imbued with the enthusiasm for learning which animated many of the learned men who expounded to us the accumulated wisdom of the ages, and propounded novel theories of their own.

While I was not equally interested in all of the lecturers, there were one or two of them who deeply impressed me—none more deeply than Herr Schwartz. He was a short, thick-set man, with tightly curling black hair and beard. His nationality I am not certain about, but I think he was a German or Austrian.

He lectured upon comparative anatomy and physiology, and was an advanced and uncompromising evolutionist. By advanced, I do not mean an evolutionist of these latter days—one of the men of science who admit or explain away so much that they state nothing definitely—but one of the old and imperfect disciples of Darwin.

Outside of his lecture hours Herr Schwartz was supposed to spend the greater part of his time in his laboratory—a large and mysterious building situated upon the outskirts of the town. Much curiosity existed among the students as to the nature of the researches he carried on in this gloomy building; but never, so far as we know, had any student been admitted within its windowless walls.

Great, then, was my surprise one morning when the learned lecturer was taking a long walk with me—a thing that he had done once or twice since he discovered my intense interest in his bold theories—to receive an invitation to come with him to inspect his laboratory. My astonishment must have been evident in my expression, for he said:

"Come! Is it so strange that I should ask a student to my laboratory?"

"Indeed, no," I answered, with some hesitation, "but I imagined——"

"Yes," he interrupted, "you thought because I had never thrown open my working room to the general rabble of students that there was some mystery about it—something I wished to conceal. Ah, no! You are different; you have a truly scientific mind. To the ordinary intellect what I am doing would seem but nonsense. Incapable of comprehending me, they would see in my experiments but the vagaries of a lunatic. But once I have shown you the plan, the reason, the theory upon which I work, you will see the logical basis for each wheel and each cog in the whole apparatus."

"I am proud, indeed, Herr Schwartz," I began, but he did not wait for the end of my sentence.

"There is no reason for pride," he said, waving his hand disdainfully. "You cannot help it. You judge all things without prejudice and upon their merits. Will you come?"

"Most willingly," I answered. "When shall my visit be made?"

"To-day," he said promptly.

"But it is your lecture day," I said, looking at my watch; "and, in fact, you will have no more time than is necessary, even if you should go now to the lecture-room."

"Bah!" he answered, with a curl of the lip. "What care I for the gaping of those boobies now? It is true I have spent two years in pelting their dough faces with the crumbs of science which not one of them can receive. But now all that is past. My apparatus is at last ready. To-day it will be put in operation."

"Will it not be better, then, for me to postpone my visit for another time?" I asked, not wishing to inconvenience the experimenter.

"You do not understand," said Herr Schwartz, turning to me with a smile. "I do not ask you to come into the place so long sacred to my deepest musings, my most important researches, merely as a spectator to be amused, nor as a student to be instructed. I need help. For a long time I have been upon the look-out among the young men in the university, hoping that when the day of final proof should come I might be able to secure just the right assistance. Well, I have found the man I sought; and you are he. I cannot perform the experiment, for which I have passed years in laborious preparation, without the aid of the right brain and the right hand."

By this time we had arrived at the top of a slight eminence from which the laboratory was distinctly visible. It was a large, square building, with a hemispherical roof—not unlike an astronomical observatory. As this strange, windowless structure came into view, Herr Schwartz halted, and turning his back upon it, solemnly addressed himself to me:

"Wait," he said. "It is not too late yet for you to withdraw. You have known me long enough to be sure I am of sound mind, and to know whether you can rely upon my good faith. I assure you that in the experiment I am about to make no harm can come to you. I alone will take all risks and be responsible for all the results. That is but right, since I alone shall reap whatever benefit may spring from the momentous trial. Speak, then, and let me know whether I have rightly concluded, that I can rely upon your nationality and your intellect. Are you willing to assist me in this purely scientific experiment?"

"Herr Schwartz," I replied, after a moment's reflection, "only assure me that you will call upon me to do nothing derogatory to my status as a man of science and a—a gentleman, and I will consent gladly to aid you in any way within my power."

"I give you my word, as an evolutionist and as a scholar, that you can safely assist me upon those conditions," said Herr Schwartz.

"Very well," I answered, "I consent."

"There is no time to be lost, then," he answered.

We set out for the laboratory, and after a few minutes stood before the heavy oak door. It was secured by a combination lock. Herr Schwartz gave the handle a few revolutions, the bolt flew back, and we entered the building, and, when the door was shut, found ourselves in perfect darkness.

In a moment, however, I heard a slight click, and the interior of the laboratory was flooded with the radiance of an enormous incandescent light.

I do not know how I can most clearly convey the impression made upon me by the wondrous sight which was revealed to me. Perhaps the plainest and simplest method is the best. I must trust for the rest to the imagination of my readers.

I saw that the enormous hemispherical dome that roofed the edifice had been raised to accommodate a model of the globe—a terrestrial globe. Its dimensions I cannot give; but perhaps it was one hundred feet in diameter. The electric light was so placed as to be a representation of the sun.

A large parabolic mirror seemed to take the place of our satellite the moon; more distant were other celestial bodies, while tiny lamps were grouped like constellations. In other words, I saw an orrery, but such an orrery as man had never before made.

"Go nearer," said Herr Schwartz, "and examine the machinery, It is purely artificial—I make no pretensions to the black art. But do not interfere with any of the mechanism; it is the result of months of careful adjustment."

I was speechless with admiration; for, as I came nearer, I saw that I was gazing on a dwarfed world. I said something of the sort, when I had recovered from my first stupefaction.

"Yes," said the maker of these marvels, "you have comprehended it. As the Chinese and Japanese dwarf trees, I have a dwarfed world. I have made some wonderful discoveries. I have replaced gravitation by electricity; have made an artificial solar body; have produced artificial temperatures, and, in short, have created a world in miniature; but a world that is, save for some few inferior forms of life, uninhabited.

"You see upon this tiny (for tiny it is compared to the world whereon we dwell)—upon this tiny world an ocean rolls, continents exist, vegetation flourishes, and the seasons pursue their wonted round. The animal life is restricted, for a purpose, to a few forms—to such as are necessary to sustain life in the human being. The purpose of this great invention—for modesty over such an achievement would be absurd—will soon be revealed to you."

"It is truly superhuman," I said. "It seems to move as I look upon it."

"It does," he answered proudly. "It is essentially a new world. But let us not waste time in boyish wonder. All this is not a toy, but a piece of scientific apparatus."

"But what purpose can it serve?" I asked, after a few moments of bewilderment.

"After years of investigation," said Herr Schwartz slowly, "I have learned the history of the development of man. I have slowly unravelled the links of the chain extending from man as he exists to-day to the mere potential nomad. You, too, have surveyed a part of that wondrous story literally wrung from the heart of the rocks."

"Yes," I said, hesitatingly; "but the—'missing link'?"

"I have several skeletons of the 'missing link,'" said Herr Schwartz. "That is the very least of my discoveries. My thoughts for years have not been busy with the past of evolution. My dreams—nay, reasonings—my inventions, and my discoveries have dealt with its future. But enough. The experiment will make all clear to you where words piled upon words fail to effect a beginning. A few short explanations and we will proceed to deeds; and you will see for yourself whatever now seems obscure. Sit down."

"Listen," said Herr Schwartz, "and, unless it be necessary, do not interrupt me. You have seen the apparatus. It only remains for you to know that I have discovered a method of reducing my own size to such dimensions as to fit me to dwell upon the miniature earth you have already examined. This method is simple, effective, and entirely harmless. But for the present I shall not reveal it. Suffice to say that I shall utilise this method, and shall then allow you to place me upon that globe, selecting that part of India which is the cradle of the human race.

"Previously I shall have taught you to control and operate the mechanism whereby the little world is actuated. Having placed me, then, in the proper spot, you will by gradual degrees increase the speed of the earth's rotation. The effect, as I know from some minor experiments upon inferior animals, will be to greatly—indeed immeasurably—increase the rapidity with which evolution operates.

"Meanwhile, the tiny being which I have become will devote himself with all his powers to develop all his higher and nobler attributes. The result, I am sure, will be the production of an unimagined type of man. I will become an individual, so highly evolutionised, so supremely developed, and that what I am now, compared to an ape, I will be then, compared to my former self."

"And then——" I began.

"Silence!——for a moment longer," said Herr Schwartz impressively. "I have not done. Then you must stop the revolutions. A bell will strike for a signal. Take, then, the portion of that earth's crust upon which you know me to be—in fact, you might take the whole of India, as it is but a light burden—and carry it into the open air. There you will see the result of this experiment. What it will be, I know almost beyond the possibility of error. But you shall not have the supreme happiness of that moment destroyed by anticipation."

It was now about noon, and we partook of a light luncheon. After the meal was finished, Herr Schwartz took me into the operating-room, and explained to me the use of the electric buttons, the regulators, the governors, the switches and brakes, the dials and indicators which set in motion and controlled the complicated and beautiful mechanism by which his whirling globe was operated.

Mechanical matters had never offered any puzzles to me, and in a short time he pronounced me capable of performing the rôle he had entrusted to me. Then we proceeded to another apartment. He entered a small cabinet, after supplying me with a powerful magnifier, and told me when I should hear the stroke of a tiny bell to enter the room and take from over an alcohol lamp a small retort.

"By examining with the glass," said Herr Schwartz, "you will see that I have become a mere atom of humanity, too small to be seen save by a powerful lens. Place the mouth of the retort over the spot in India, which you will find indicated by a metal pointer, and then retire to the operating-room and set the machinery in motion. The process ought not to take over a few hours, and may be much shorter."

"Good-bye," said the experimenter with a smile, "and remember, whatever happens, the results are mine alone."

With a hand-shake we parted, and Herr Schwartz entered the transforming cabinet.

I do not know how long I waited. My interest and curiosity were so intense that I was hardly aware, all through the experiment, of the time which elapsed.

The bell sounded. I entered the little cabinet, found the retort over the tiny lamp, found the result to be what Herr Schwartz had predicted. There was a microscopic image of the scientific friend to whose lectures I had so long listened.

Realising the responsibility which now rested upon me, I hastened to carry out Herr Schwartz's instructions to the letter. I placed the mite of humanity upon the artificial globe, returned to the operating-room, and set the wonderful apparatus (which had been at rest during the preceding preparations) again in motion.

Gradually I added to the speed of rotation, keeping my eyes upon the dials and indicators. My great anxiety was to keep the speed at just the points which Herr Schwartz had prescribed.

There is no need to dwell upon the anxious time that followed, nor to tell the thousand thoughts and fears that pressed upon my throbbing brain. After what seemed an endless time, the bell sounded the signal—I rushed to the main hall, tore the whole of India from its place, and made my way to the outer air.

It was still a moonlight night. I placed the bit of earth gently upon the ground, and from it there arose a figure! But what was it that slowly took shape before me! Was it the noble figure of a man, grown to some grander, nobler shape?

Alas! no.

On the contrary, it was a diminutive and far from attractive monkey.

I saw at once there was something wrong, and my trained scientific intellect at once solved the mystery. I had turned the apparatus backward.

THE TENTH OF JUNE

By JOHN K. LEYS, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.—Illustrated by RAYMOND POTTER.

SUMMARY.

GEOFFREY DUNDAS, whose life is attempted on the 10th of June, 1883, by a Hindoo barrister at the Law Courts, by means of poison, visits General Sir Arthur Chetwynd at Seacombe Towers, in May, 1884. The General explains that a serious danger threatens the household, and that it will come, if at all, on the tenth of June. The reason for this is that during the Indian Mutiny on this day, in 1853, Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead) took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple, and every Tenth of June afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned or some member of their families is assassinated. It appears that the Rajah of Nagore is now coming to pay a visit to Sir Arthur.

CHAPTER IV.

THE RAJAH.

THERE was, of course, some excitement at Seacombe Towers, as the day fixed for the arrival of the Rajah drew near. The Stoddart girls had practised themselves in private in the art of saying "Your Highness" in a natural and off-hand manner. Leila was not free from the curiosity commonly ascribed to her sex. Sir Arthur and Geoffrey Dundas had very good reason for looking forward to the visit with unusual interest. Only Captain Byngham was, or affected to be, indifferent. He felt inclined to resent a guest of superior rank to himself being brought into the house.

"After all, the man's only a nigger," he remarked to Leila; "I don't see the necessity for all this fuss."

On the evening of the last day of May the expected guest arrived.

He travelled with his secretary and two servants, for whom separate accommodation had been provided in the house.

Sir Arthur, with his family and guests, were in the drawing-room ready to receive him; and when the butler announced in a loud voice—"His 'Ighness the Rajah of Nagore!" every one in the room rose up.

The next moment they all felt that a person of distinction had entered the room. Amavati Sastri—so the Rajah was named—came in without the least pretentiousness or awkwardness, and, singling out Miss Chetwynd instinctively from the other ladies, he advanced and bowed gravely to her in perfect silence. Having saluted the mistress of the house, he turned to Sir Arthur and held out his hand.

There was a dignity, a self-possession, in the Oriental's demeanour which, apart from his rank, compelled respect; and there was also a quiet gracefulness in his every movement which was extremely charming. For the moment Sir Arthur forgot his fears, his suspicions, and only desired to do the honours of his house worthily to so distinguished a guest.

Each one in turn was presented to the Rajah, who shook hands with each; but he performed the ceremony in such a way that one could see that it was to him a formal act of courtesy with which he was not familiar.

"Have you been long in this country, Rajah?" asked Leila, when the party were seated.

"Only a week—ten days," said Amavati in pure, musical English.

"I thought," broke in Captain Byngham, "that people of your religion lost caste when they crossed the sea."

Leila watched the Oriental turn his fine dark eyes on the speaker; and she thought she could detect a faint flush under his dusky skin, as he replied, without a trace of resentment in his voice:

"It is enough that I have come."

"His 'Ighness the Rajah of Nagore."

"I hope your highness had a fair passage," said Geoffrey hastily.

"Very fair, I thank you," was the reply, accompanied by a grave smile.

"And I hope you intend to stay some time in England," said Sir Arthur heartily.

"My arrangements are not yet fixed."

"At all events I hope you intend giving us all the time you can," said Leila.

For the first time a look of animation, of pleasure, came into the Rajah's face.

"It is gracious of you to say so, madam," he said quietly.

Shortly afterwards the dressing-bell rang, and a footman appeared to conduct the Rajah to his room, whither one of the Hindoo servants had preceded him. The other was busy over the fire in a small room which had been given him to use as a kitchen.

"I like him!" exclaimed Leila, when the door had closed behind Amavati. "I like his quiet dignified ways—so different from the vulgar familiarity of our English manners."

Sir Arthur said nothing, but smiled grimly. Captain Byngham's lip curled in contempt.

"I confess he impressed me very favourably," said Geoffrey.

"Why should you say 'I confess'?" demanded Leila, "It almost sounds as if you had made up your mind to dislike him."

Crossing one of the glades in the park.

"Come, Miss Stoddart," cried the General in a purposely loud tone, "you have not yet given us your opinion of our illustrious visitor."

"I agree with Leila," said Emily with some decision of manner. "I think the Rajah is delightful; and as for his skin being darker than ours, I don't think it is Christian-like to think less of him on that account."

"Why, the man is an idolator, a pagan!" exclaimed the Captain.

"He was brought up in that way," said the young lady serenely, as she made her way to the door; "and I daresay some pagans are better, all things considered, than some Christians."

Of course, the presence of the Rajah and his secretary made a considerable difference in the ordinary life of the house; but the General's Hindoo guest made no demand on the time of his host and hostess. He took great pleasure in wandering about the garden and the park. If the General, or Leila, or one of the Stoddart girls, chose to bear him company, he was sure to repay the attention by some graceful compliment; but he seemed to be quite content to go about by himself. Of course, he took no part in the common amusements of the season—boating, riding, and tennis-playing. Probably in his secret soul he thought of those who joined in them very much what we should think of grown men who played leap-frog or rounders. But he was a great deal out of doors.

At any hour, from dawn to midnight, except the sacred hour of dinner, the tall, spare form of the Hindoo prince might be seen crossing one of the glades in the park, or gliding from one clump of laurels to another, followed very often, at a little distance, by the short rotund figure of Ajeer Chunder Sen, his secretary.

As a rule, Chunder Sen, when not in attendance on his master, was to be found in the library; but he was fond of pacing up and down one of the alleys in the garden, and there Dundas often joined him for a chat. He was much more communicative than the Rajah, and Geoffrey found him an interesting companion. He was never weary of extolling the power and greatness of England; and he often declared that the conquest of his native land by British soldiers was the best thing that could possibly have happened to it. This was, in a sense, gratifying to Geoffrey's feelings as an Englishman; yet there seemed to be too much of Uriah Heep's manner about the avowal. A licking often does a man good; but you would not give much for the man who would acknowledge the fact in so many words.

Geoffrey soon perceived that Chunder Sen was a man of high education, and considerable mental powers, and that he had great influence with the Rajah. But, in spite of his cleverness, his smooth and polished manner, and his readiness to please, Geoffrey could not bring himself to like the Rajah's secretary.

With the Rajah himself it was different. The young Englishman felt that Amavati was a prince by nature as well as in rank. But he had been only a short time in the house when Geoffrey made a discovery that made him look on the Rajah with anything but friendly feelings. He became convinced that Amavati had fallen in love with Leila. Every now and then the Hindoo's large dark eyes would wander to the place where Leila sat—and rest there. She was his loadstar: as often as the usages of Society permitted he would steal to her side.

Geoffrey, looking on, was at first inclined to think that the idea of Leila Chetwynd listening to the Rajah's suit was utterly preposterous and absurd. But after a short time he began to ask himself whether this was quite so certain—whether the Rajah might not be a much more dangerous rival than Captain Byngham.

There was a charm about his personality, depth in his great, melancholy eyes, a tenderness in the liquid tones of his voice, which to a romantic girl—such as Leila certainly was—might be very attractive. It could not be said that intellectually and socially he was not Leila's equal; among his own countrymen he would, of course, be considered vastly her superior.

It was impossible to gather anything from the girl's manner. She was invariably gentle and pleasant with the Rajah; but she never allowed her voice to sink even by a semitone when she conversed with him.

There was one other of the General's guests who watched the pair with much interest, and this was Emily Stoddart. She had espoused the Rajah's cause from the first; and more than once she had teased Captain Byngham and Geoffrey into something like anger by predicting a match between the Rajah and Leila, and protesting that she saw nothing objectionable in the idea of such a marriage.

"It's my idea," growled Byngham after one of Miss Emily's outbursts, "that that young lady wouldn't greatly object to marrying the melancholy nigger herself." And for once Geoffrey felt inclined to agree with his rival.

"What! Ask my daughter!"

But the question of the Rajah's admiration for the daughter of his host soon passed beyond the region of mere conjecture.

One afternoon, the afternoon of Tuesday, the 6th of June, as the General and his guest were smoking under a tree on the lawn after lunch, the conversation happened to turn upon the dignity of the ancient races of India; and Sir Arthur, partly from conviction, partly from a desire to please his guest, was drawing a comparison between Eastern races and Europeans, not greatly to the advantage of the latter, when the Rajah suddenly interrupted him.

"Do you believe, then, that all the races which belong to what your scholars call the 'Indo-Germanic family,' are on a certain equality."

"Yes, I think so."

Outwardly the Hindoo was unmoved; but some seconds elapsed before he put his next question.

"Members of these races might, then, intermarry without either party suffering any loss of dignity?"

"Yes—under certain circumstances."

"Would it, then, be displeasing to you if I were to ask your daughter to become the Ranee of Nagore?"

The General started as if he had been shot.

"What! Ask my daughter!" he exclaimed. Like many another man, Sir Arthur entertained some liberal theories; but resented any attempt to apply them to himself or his family. His surprise was so great that he needed time to recover himself; and thus he was able to remember that he had no excuse for being indignant. His own words were fresh in his memory. He remained silent for what seemed a long time, and then said coldly:—

"You honour me, Rajah, by this proposal. Your rank is sufficient to justify it; and I have never heard anything but good of your private life. But this is one of those matters in which a father must be allowed to judge for himself what is best for his child's welfare and happiness. With every respect for you, I beg leave to decline your proposal."

As he uttered these last words the General unconsciously rose to his feet. The Rajah followed his example, bowed, and turned sadly away.

The General followed him.

"May I ask, Rajah, whether you have given my daughter any intimation of your feeling towards her?"

"No, beyond the small tributes of respect which you have witnessed."

"Then let me beg that what you have just now said to me may be forgotten. Let it make no difference between our relations in any way."

The Rajah quite understood that Sir Arthur meant to beg him not to shorten his stay on account of what had passed, but had too much delicacy to refer to the subject directly.

He bowed politely, yet with some haughtiness of demeanour, and answered—

"I accept your goodness, Sir Arthur, on one condition—I have not yet abandoned all hope of overcoming your—your dislike——"

"No, no; not dislike!" cried the General.

"Your disinclination, then, to think of me as your son-in-law. I still hope to win your daughter's hand. May I come back in one year's time? This time next year——"

Again the General started—started in so marked a way that the Rajah instinctively stopped and looked at him.

He had absolutely forgotten the approaching Tenth of June!

In his anxiety not to appear inhospitable he had deliberately thrown away the chance of getting rid of his Hindoo guests before the fatal day. And now the Rajah was actually proposing that he should come back at the same time twelve months hence! There was little wonder that the General threw a quick, suspicious glance at his guest. The Hindoo bore it without changing a muscle.

"What a fool I am!" was Sir Arthur's next thought. "If he wants to marry Leila he cannot be plotting her death, or mine."

"Do you forbid me to come again in a year's time?" said Amavati, with quiet dignity.

"No," answered the General, in some confusion. "No; I'm sure it's of no use, you know. It can't be of any use. But if you wish it, I should not think of forbidding your coming."

"I thank you," said Amavati. "I have already laid my plans for a journey in America. I shall return to this country in the end of May next year. Till then, we will, as you say, forget what has passed between us."

With these words the Oriental again saluted his host, and walked into the house.

CHAPTER V.

SUSPICIONS.

THAT evening the General and Geoffrey Dundas happened to meet in the drawing-room before the others obeyed the dinner-bell.

"Geoffrey," said Sir Arthur, going close up to him, "my apprehensions about the Rajah have been greatly diminished—in fact, I may say, they have disappeared. I think you ought to know, since you, and you alone, have shared my anxiety. The truth is, that this afternoon Amavati made a most extraordinary proposal to me. He wants to make Leila Ranee of Nagore."

Geoffrey suddenly turned pale.

"And you said to him——?"

"Oh, I said it wouldn't do at all. I refused him flatly. But the point is this—feeling as he does towards my daughter, he cannot be a party to any scheme to injure, much less to murder us."

"True," said Geoffrey, whose face had brightened wonderfully at the words "I refused him flatly." "True, sir; and I may say that since I have known the Rajah, I have been unable to believe——"

"Hush! not another word. Here are the girls."

After what he had heard, Geoffrey was not surprised that when coffee had been served, and the three girls had gone out on the terrace as usual, the Rajah did not follow them, though Captain Byngham did, but remained at the dinner-table with the General and himself. But not a sign of what he felt appeared on the Hindoo's delicate features.

Digitized by Google

On account of the good news—for to him it was the best of good news—that he had just heard, Geoffrey had been in better spirits than usual, and had made an uncommonly good dinner. He felt well-disposed towards all men, and especially towards his defeated rival, as the Rajah certainly was. He entertained for his highness much the same sort of feeling that a steeplechaser has for a competitor who, after riding pluckily and dangerously well, has come to grief in a ditch.

He leant across the table and chatted to the Rajah, his friendly feeling being increased as he noticed the manly courage with which the Hindoo concealed his pain.

When the General sauntered out to smoke a cigar, the two young men did not feel inclined to move, and Geoffrey carried his glass to the other side of the table and seated himself beside Amavati.

"This must be a very different scene from the kind of landscape you have in India," he observed as the Rajah gazed silently over the wooded park that stretched before the windows.

"Yes, very different—and more beautiful."

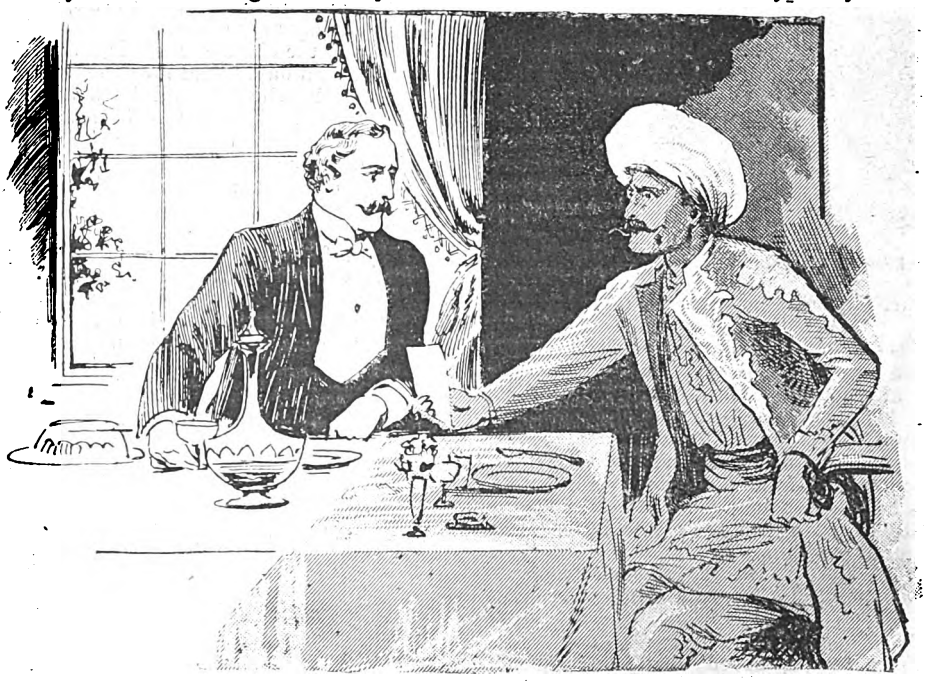
"Ah! But you have yet to see an English country landscape in winter," said Geoffrey with a laugh.

"Is it more beautiful than this?"

"Hardly. I meant that an English country landscape in winter is the dreariest scene conceivable—though I admit that when the snow is on the ground it has a beauty of its own. But I forgot. You have never seen snow, perhaps?"

"Never."

"And I suppose that no matter how you may try to imagine what you have never seen, the reality will always seem very different from the scene you had pictured to yourself."



The hand that held the sheet of paper twitched involuntarily.

"I have always found it so. Life in England is in many ways quite different from what I had fancied it would be, although I had often seen Englishmen, of course, in India. You are different from what they call Anglo-Indians?"

"In what way?"

"You are less proud and stiff, less overbearing, altogether more agreeable at home than your countrymen are in India."

"I can understand your saying that. But it is only natural. You yourself, Rajah, are a very different kind of personage from what I had anticipated." Here Geoffrey helped himself to another glass of port. "Do you know," he continued, "we entertained rather a strange suspicion concerning you before we saw you?"

"Indeed! May I ask what it was?"

The young Englishman did not answer immediately. He had suddenly recollected himself, and was dismayed at the folly he had been guilty of.

"I see you would rather not answer—pardon me for putting the question," said the Rajah. His voice was calm; but his tone was that of a man who has been ill-used, and is too proud to make any complaint. An answer of some sort Geoffrey felt he must make; and, on the whole, judging on the spur of the moment, he thought it better to tell the Rajah what had happened to himself. But he resolved that, for the present at all events, he would keep the General's name out of his narrative.

He laughed rather uneasily, and moved one of the decanters out of his way before speaking,

"Not at all, Rajah," he said. "On the contrary I feel that I ought to beg your pardon for entertaining such absurd suspicions about you as I confess I had in my mind before I saw you."

The Rajah was now listening with the keenest attention; and, indeed, Geoffrey's awkward, embarrassed manner—the manner of a man who finds himself in a false position, and is too honest to get out of it by means of a falsehood—was enough to excite his curiosity.

"One day last year, the tenth of this month in point of fact, I was very nearly poisoned. An unfortunate girl, who, as I believe, drank the wine I had in my glass, did actually die. There was some ground for suspecting that the poisoning was not accidental, and that the guilty person was a countryman of yours. I say I had a suspicion that it was so, but a letter was delivered next day at my chambers which put the matter beyond a doubt. It referred to a 'vendetta,' a scheme of vengeance on the part of some Hindoos, and intimated that I was one of the victims. Clearly I had been poisoned by a Hindoo barrister who had an excellent opportunity for dropping poison into my glass."

Geoffrey had been watching his companion's face closely. He detected no sign in it beyond this, that Amavati's eyes seemed to have a wider, fuller look than they had before.

"Have you still this letter?" asked the Rajah, in his usual calm manner.

"I have it still. Would you like to see it?"

"If you have no objection to show it to me."

"Not the least in the world. I'll fetch it," said Geoffrey, and tossing off the remainder of his glass of wine, he left the room. In less than five minutes he returned with the letter in his hand.

The Rajah took it; and when his eyes rested on the writing, the hand that held the sheet of paper twitched involuntarily. The sign was so slight that Geoffrey never noticed it.

"Of course, it is possible," said Geoffrey, "that the letter may be a hoax, the work of some friend at the bar with more leisure than sense. But I certainly was ill; and then there is the death of the poor girl. That was no hoax."

"I should not advise you to treat it as a hoax," said Amavati slowly, keeping his eyes fixed all the time on the few lines of writing before him.

"But I can do nothing to help myself. I cannot guard myself against a foe who may be lying in wait behind any corner."

"And you believed that I had to do with this outrage?" said the Rajah with a smile.

"No," said Geoffrey, "for when I had that suspicion in my mind I did not know you. It was only because you belonged to the same race; and then the coincidence of the date was remarkable."

"The coincidence! I fear I do not understand."

"Yes," said Dundas, speaking slowly, lest he should unwittingly say more than he intended. "You see, the attempt on my life was made on the tenth of June. I have since ascertained that the affair which gave rise to this long-standing passion of revenge happened many years ago on the tenth of June. So that, when I heard that Hindoos were to be guests in the house in which I proposed to be staying on that very day in the following year"—again the Rajah gave a slight start, so slight that his companion did not observe it—"well, the coincidence struck me as odd."

"Don't you think it possible that a mistake was made—that you were taken for some other person?"

Geoffrey shook his head.

"Why?"

"Because my father was a soldier in India. He was concerned in the fight, or massacre, which happened on the tenth of June. And——" here Geoffrey's voice unconsciously sank, "and he fell on the tenth of June."

The Rajah remained perfectly motionless, still holding the letter in his hand.

"Will you allow me to keep this for a few hours?" he asked.

Geoffrey stared at him in surprise.

"Why?" he asked bluntly.

"I wish to study it."

This answer did not convey much meaning, but Geoffrey felt that he had no good reason for refusing, and answered, "Oh, if you like; but please take care of it; I should like to keep it as a curiosity. Shall we go out and smoke a cigar now? It will be quite dark in half-an-hour."

* * * *

About eleven o'clock that night Geoffrey was roused by a soft tap at his door.

In an instant he was wide awake, but he paused for a moment before answering. He knew that his bedroom door was unlocked, and he thought of remaining silent in order to see whether his visitor, who would suppose him to be asleep, would enter the room. But the next moment he had rejected the idea, and called out:

"Who's there? Come in."

There was no reply, and in an instant Geoffrey had sprung out of bed, and had opened the door himself.

"Who knocked at my door?" he called out.

Geoffrey had sprung out of bed.

"It was I," said a soft voice near him.

"The Rajah?"

"Yes."

"Just wait a minute, till I get a light."

"I need not trouble you to-night. It will do in the morning. I only came because I thought you would not be in bed."

But Geoffrey was curious to know what the Hindoo could have to say to him. He begged Amavati again to wait a moment, lit a candle, got into bed, and then called to the Rajah to come in.

He sprang to his feet.

Amavati came in, and softly closed the door behind him. He then sat down on a chair that stood near the bed.

"I wished to return your letter as soon as possible," he began, laying the paper on the coverlet.

Geoffrey took it and put it under his pillow.

"I suppose you have not discovered who the writer is?" he asked carelessly.

"I have been able to form a guess concerning it; but I am afraid I can say no more upon that point. It is, after all, only a guess. What I wanted chiefly to say to you, however, is this, do not despise the warning that your good fortune has given you. I think it is a real danger that besets you."

Geoffrey was startled by the Rajah's grave tone as much as by his words.

"You have been attacked once," continued the Rajah; "you may be attacked again."

"But what can I do to ward off the danger? How can I defend myself?"

"Your safety lies in flight. I should certainly advise you to leave England at once. Go secretly to some foreign country, and remain there till the eleventh of this month. Then, even if your fears are well founded—and I admit that I think they are—you may consider yourself safe for another year. Or you might shut yourself up in your house until the day is past, and admit no one. I see you are armed."

The Hindoo's glance rested on the General's revolver, which lay on the dressing-table at some little distance. Geoffrey could hardly understand how he had noticed the weapon, for to all appearance the Rajah's gaze had been fixed on him since he entered the room.

"That revolver belongs to the General," said Geoffrey. "But do you mean that I must hide myself, or shut myself up every year on the tenth of June?"

"That is what I advise you, and beg you to do," said Amavati. "I believe you cannot otherwise be safe."

"How do you know?" asked Geoffrey abruptly.

The Hindoo paused a moment before answering. Geoffrey felt convinced that he was carefully preparing his reply.

"I am only giving you the advice that any cautious, any prudent man, who knew the character of my countrymen as I know it, would give you. If you doubt me, ask your friend Sir Arthur."

"The General! Is he in danger?"

"He? No! Why should he be in danger?"

"Because ——."

He stopped; then being unable to see how it could possibly injure Sir Arthur to say what he had in his mind, he went on:

"Because the General has the same reason to fear the tenth of June that I have. And so has Miss Chetwynd. I beseech you, Rajah, if you have any influence, if you can help us to lay hands on those murdering wretches, do so!"

For the first time since the interview began, for the first time since he came to the house, the Rajah showed genuine emotion. He sprang to his feet, and looked at the Englishman with something like horror in his eyes.

"No, no! It cannot be!" he exclaimed.

"It is so, I assure you. There is no doubt of it. Will you help us?"

"Is anyone there?"

"I cannot. I can do very little—nothing out of my own dominions. But what I can do, I will. I will consider what can be done. But you may be mistaken; I trust you are. Meantime, take my advice, and secure your own safety. You have plenty of time to hide yourself. I beseech you not to delay. Now I must go. Good-night."

And before Geoffrey had time to form a reply, the Rajah had gone.

Geoffrey locked the door and blew out the light; but to sleep was impossible. His mind refused to turn from the conversation that had just ended. He could not rid himself of the conviction that the Hindoo knew more than he had admitted he knew. But the main point was—Could he trust him? Ought he to secure his own safety by flight, or stay by the General and Leila? True, the Rajah seemed to think that they were in no danger, but he might be mistaken. Or, the Rajah's advice might be a ruse to get him out of the way.

The loneliness and perplexity were intolerable. After lying awake for an hour, Geoffrey was seized with the desire of seeing the General and talking over the difficulty with him. Quietly getting out of bed he threw on his dressing-gown, opened his bedroom door, and stepped out into the passage. All was quiet; all was in darkness.

On his way to Sir Arthur's room, which, like his own, was on the first floor, he paused a moment at the head of the stairs, and stopped, listening, for he fancied his ear had detected a slight sound in the library. So sure did he feel that he had heard something that he glided softly downstairs to see if anyone was there. In crossing the hall, however, his foot struck against a chair, which moved, giving out a loud grating sound against the tiles with which the hall was paved.

Opening the library door Geoffrey found the room in total darkness.

"Is anyone there?" he called out.

There was no answer.

He moved cautiously to the windows and examined them. They were both securely fastened.

"I must have been mistaken," he said to himself, "or perhaps there is a mouse behind the skirting-board. I am getting nervous and foolish. I had better get back to bed. To-morrow will be time enough to talk to the General. Why should I disturb his night's rest?"

He went back to his room, and once more tried to sleep; but sleep would not come. Perplexed thoughts, vague fears, and gloomy forebodings kept him awake till dawn.

HONOUR AVENGED

It was at the club, and we were all young fellows, gathered around the white-haired old Colonel who had found a refuge in Marseilles from his debts and his tyrant of a wife and the new customs that were pouring into Paris. More than any other man I ever knew, he had, what we call the grand air, a certain condescension to those he regarded as his inferiors, a sweetness and a simplicity of manner that those whom he liked found it impossible to resist. He belonged to the old régime, and the elder members of the club ill brooked his bitter tongue and sarcastic comment, but we lads of twenty-five and less hung upon his words, and would have liked to model ourselves on his pattern.

Fortunately that was impossible—heredity, early association, education, had all formed the Colonel.

"Ah, well"—he began, "for the story of revenge that I promised to tell you. It was in the year 1836 that old Detrouville died a ruined man, and to the amazement of us all old Baré married his daughter. I call him 'old Baré' because he was a grave and taciturn man, whose silent though courteous intercourse with his neighbours gradually won him that appellation while he was still young.

"Time did not tend to improve it when it gave him iron-grey hair and bent shoulders, although other men older by several years, still considered themselves gay gallants. But on one opinion all of us were unanimous: Jean Baré was a man of strictest honour, and the warmest though the most undemonstrative of friends.

"He was fifty when he astonished the world by his marriage with Blanche Detrouville. She was about twenty, a fair-haired little creature with the most innocent of blue eyes. Le Bon Dieu never made any woman as innocent as Blanche Detrouville looked. How it happened that she fascinated old Baré is a mystery—but fascinate him she did.

"He fell desperately, passionately in love with her—as one of you young blades would fall in love, and he married her, and took her out of the howling nest of her father's creditors, whose mouths he stopped with a bonne bouche. He set her up in his great mansion at Nouvre and loaded her with fine furniture, fine dresses, jewels, gew-gaws—what will not a man give for love?

"Old Baré had had a charge, a near neighbour, one Phillipe Doucet. This Phillipe had been old Baré's ward, and he turned over to him when he came of age a decent property. A fine fellow was Doucet: dark, slender, handsome, gentle, brave, a tremendous favourite with the women and many men.

"With all the men, in fact, except those with whom he had money dealings. They found him—to their infinite surprise, for he was courtesy itself—singularly hard to bargain with. He was gracious, complaisant, but as hard as a granite wall when it came to real concessions.

"But perhaps only old Baré knew the extent of his avarice; he who had seen it when Doucet was a little dark-eyed boy cherishing his belongings with the passion of a miser when he was hardly out of the cradle, and throughout his well-regulated studious youth saving, twisting, and turning to keep his allowance untouched from quarter to quarter, and happy only when he could return a goodly portion to his guardian for re-investment next year.

"Blanche Baré née Detrouville, as I have already said, was treated by her husband as if she were a queen, an Eastern queen, at whose feet he poured jewels, gold and precious stuffs. And she loved them with a passionate love.

"For several years his gifts so utterly filled her heart that she was entirely happy as old Baré's wife. For all his taciturnity the man must have discovered the secret of her content, for he continued to heap them upon her, and in return she gave him smiles and her little cheek to kiss, and perhaps a more tender embrace when something she had coveted cost a sum great enough to demand this exceptional concession.

"But the empty fool could not continue to let her trinkets and her stuffs fill her heart and mind to the exclusion of less dangerous idols. She began to crave flattery, excitement, homage, all of which she might have had from the silent, throbbing heart that was lawfully hers. Phillipe Doucet, the dark, handsome ward, soon supplied it. It was easy for him to ride over to Nouvre and spend the summer days, especially when old Baré had gone on his monthly visit to Paris.

"There were uninterrupted téte-à-têtes in the long, cool salon, sweet with roses and jasmine gathered in the terraced garden on which it looked; there were strolls in this garden at night-fall when these dreamy odours ladened the air, and the nightingale sang in the orange groves, and the moon waxed pale.

"Old Baré was a loyal friend, and his friendship was returned with equal fidelity. As it has happened before, the Bon Dieu gave the task to that friend who loved to break his heart.

"It was said in as few words as possible, but it was said. Instead of staying a week in Paris at his next visit he must return unexpectedly to his wife, in two days. No one but the friend was to know the change of plan.

"Old Baré did not look at his wife when he told her that evening he must leave on the morrow for the city. He did not touch her or address her except to make the statement, and when she gaily asked whether it was to be for a week, he simply bowed, but she was used to few words from him. Perhaps that was a fault—the authors of your recent novels make a silent husband an excuse for the severing of all wedded ties—but I do not believe had he been a Cicero of eloquence it would have made her different. She wanted first luxuries, then forbidden fruit.

"It was in the early morning of the third day that old Baré returned. The birds were singing in the garden; all the air was heavy with the perfume the dew extracted from the flowers. It was a fair mansion; he had guarded his jewel well, if beautiful things and tender care for her caprices were good guardians. He entered; down the winding stair with their shallow mahogany steps a man was coming. He started back repressing a cry.

"'Good day, sir,' said the master. 'You are welcome; I am glad to see you. Come with me to the dining-room.'

"Could he trust his ears? Phillipe was no coward, and he had prepared himself in that fleeting instant, when their eyes met, for the worst, which was, of course, a challenge.

"'The man is mad,' he thought, 'crazed by the blow.' Did he regret it? He was a tender-hearted, fair-speeched man. We are forbidden to judge.

"Old Baré drew nearer. 'You will come with me, and we will have our coffee?'

"There was something in old Baré's eye that commanded Doucet as he had never before been commanded. He obeyed.

"Baré rang for coffee. 'And say to your mistress that I particularly desire her presence,' he ordered the wondering servant.

"With that he led the way into the dining-room.

"'But, sir,' said Tontine, Madame's maid, coming into the room breathless. 'Madame could not at once obey Monsieur's summons. She sleeps; she is not half awakened. It will be necessary to make her toilet.'

"'Say to Madame, with my respectful compliments, it is necessary that she should come, and come at once.'

"The power in the man's eyes subjugated the woman as it had subjugated Doucet. She returned to her mistress, who appeared almost immediately after. It is evident to you, of course, that she had been listening at the keyhole.

"Old Baré bowed over her hand, and led her to her place.

"'You will make coffee for us, will you not, my dear? And drink it, and eat at least a few little cakes, of which you are so fond.'

"But she was not hungry! How troublesome! She must eat, whether she was hungry or not.

"You have the picture. The early, dew-laden morning; the woman robed, with hair awry, unkempt, a sorry sort of spectacle for a lover's eyes, especially as he must pay so dearly for it; the sun shining mercilessly on her pale, frightened face, and she sitting at the head of the table, serving viands to the husband opposite her, who, carefully dressed, cool, collected, was playing elaborately the part of host; while at the place of honour—her right hand—was her lover, with burning cheeks and downcast eyes, bewildered, confused, and cursing his strange place.

"Old Baré talked almost uninterruptedly, telling stories and making merry over the escapades—if so they might be called—of Phillipe's youth. Then when the weary meal had dragged itself far beyond its accustomed length he arose, and, with extraordinary civility, invited them into his own library, a room his wife seldom if ever visited.

"The cringing, trembling creature obeyed his first words, though Phillipe hung back, but there was something in the look of old Baré which compelled him to follow her, and with much cordiality, but quite an air of ceremony, old Baré ushered them into the dark, richly-furnished room with its books, and desks, and severely business-like air which betrayed the character of the master of this house.

"He then seated himself at his desk, opened his bank-book and wrote a cheque. Rising, he handed it to Phillipe.

"'I will trouble you to sign,' he said with an unfamiliar amiability. Half dazed at the whole proceedings Doucet read the words inscribed on the slip of paper, 'The National Bank of Paris will pay to the order of Blanche Detrouville Baré £10,000.'

"'I refuse, I utterly refuse to sign,' cried Phillipe, in an agony. 'Sir, I am at your service at any day, any hour you please. As the challenged party you may choose the weapons, but I will not sign the cheque.'

"Old Baré walked up to him and laid his hand on his arm. The look, sweetly smiling, transfixed him.

"'It is my whole fortune,' cried Doucet; 'the savings, the accumulation of years.' The miser had entered the soul of the gallant and driven out courage and self-respect; he who would have gone gaily to the field of honour was broken like a whipcord at the prospect of resigning his gold and his silver. Ah, well did his former guardian know his man and where his treasure lay, and his heart also.

"'Nay, if you will pardon a contradiction, not your whole fortune, but your pinchings and savings and extortions from the poor. It will not ruin you, monsieur, this £10,000; it will simply break your heart.'

"He did not take his eyes from the white, convulsed face. Something in them drew the man to the table, he signed, and then he turned towards the crushed, trembling creature who stood between them, understanding nothing except that she whom the winds of heaven had not visited too roughly, she who had known only petting, caressing words, respectful admiration, silent though consuming love, was suddenly alone in the world, stripped, despoiled, despised.

"The man who had robbed her of all she held dear looked at her. His mask of courtesy, knighthood, impassioned romance had fallen from him. He was haggard and old with suffering—although it had only been five or ten short minutes since he had heard his doom. He looked as he would look fifty years after, a greedy miser, his fingers clutching at his gold, his gold!

"She swayed her body to and fro. 'Phillipe!' she cried, in an agonised voice; she could not bear his look of consuming hate. 'May evil come to you!' he said, and he shook his fist in her face. Then suddenly he seemed to bethink himself. 'I will go,' he muttered, and stumbled out of the room.

"Old Baré looked at him, then a light broke. 'It is unfortunate that Monsieur walked from his house to ours, for it is a hot morning,' he murmured, in his strange, new, courteous voice. 'Jules,' as a servant answered the bell; 'a fresh horse at once.'

"Then he addressed the creature he had cherished. 'Since what has been mine has been yours,' he said, 'luckily we have the power to sign each other's names. I always arranged it. I never wished you to feel any difference between yours and mine.' His voice did not break, though, perhaps, the tender care he had given her, and the untrammelled liberty for those days may have occurred to him. 'I could not keep you in honour. The church of which we are all three devout members,' and he smiled, 'will not admit divorce, so that you cannot marry him and share his dearly loved fortune. Nor should I permit a divorce. What you are to do is to leave my house immediately, and with it leave all except what you brought with you. What you care for most is comfort, luxury, even, and as far as ten thousand pounds, which you have justly earned, can bring it to you, you shall have it. In two hours I will return with your money.' Then he mounted his horse, rode at full speed, and presented the cheque at the Bank.

"When it was cashed and he was, in his deliberate way, descending the steps, he met a frantic, exhausted man with a wild light in his eyes, who, having flung himself from his panting horse, was rushing into the bank. Old Baré lifted his hat. 'Too late, monsieur, by half a minute. I have cashed your cheque, so it will not be possible to draw out your capital before I arrive.'

"That," continued the Colonel, "was the way to punish—the reasonable, just way, too, for the woman should not have borne it all, as is now the custom. Old Baré accepted the fact that her betrayer owed her something, and he made him pay it, and he had the joy of turning the sword round and round in his heart. An encounter! Bah! Duels are for blunderers, neophytes, the indiscriminating, common herd. But for an artist, for a student of character, he will learn his man and hurt him in the secret, tender spot. This I rank as genius."

There was a murmur of dissenting voices, but the Colonel had already donned his overcoat and was limping out of the room.

ADRIFT ON A BELL BUOY.

WHEN I was twelve years old, during the summer vacation of 1860, I spent the month of August on the Government schooner Ranger, then charged with the duty of supplying oil and provisions to the lighthouses on the South Coast. Sometimes the Ranger set buoys and assisted revenue cutters in taking soundings; so we had a busy time on the whole.

One day early in the month our captain, whose name was Gardner, learned that the bell-buoy at Shellham had gone adrift, after having been run into by a vessel. Next morning we sailed from Shellham to look for it, and found it before long near Vineyard Sound. But it was not now adrift. It was in tow of the Sea Hawk, one of a class of vessels that go in search of derelict ships, securing their chains, anchors, or anything of value that can be taken from them.

The skipper of the Sea Hawk said that he had found the buoy. He objected to surrendering it without receiving pay for it. Our captain ended the dispute by ordering him to take the buoy into Portsmouth, where we would call for it.

"You'll have to pay for it," cried the Sea Hawk's captain, in a squeaky voice, across a wide space of water, as we left him. "You'll have to pay for it yet," was what he squeaked late that evening when our skipper was leaving the Sea Hawk, after taking the buoy without having made any payment. Whether Trinity House did or not admit the squeaky captain's claim I know not to this day.

The buoy was to be hoisted to our deck and taken to its former position at Shellham bar. But instead of hoisting it that evening our captain, as the hour was late, resolved to leave it all night moored to the Ranger's stern by the same rope the Sea Hawk had used in towing it.

Somehow it had fascinated me. What a weird, dismal-looking object it was, bobbing up and down. Then I wondered why its bell did not ring, though there was movement in the water about us. In the dusk it seemed like a human being; and, indeed, the round, cage-like basket on its top, which was its distinguishing mark in the daytime, was very suggestive of a person's head.

An impulse to try to make its bell ring took possession of me. Once I crawled half over the stern, meaning to lower myself to the buoy by its rope, but of this I thought better, and crept back to deck. Then I went to my berth for a while. Still I could not sleep.

"What is the reason that bell does not ring?" kept running in my head. So after a long time I went up and sat down on the cabin skylight. Glancing at the clock within it was one o'clock in the morning.

The night was beautiful, though breezy. Our Ranger's mast and rigging was clearly shown against the sky. I lay back and watched the black painted end of the mast as it traced all sorts of fantastic figures in and out among the stars; for there was a gentle ground swell, and the schooner was idly rocking on it.

The tide was running out, and I could plainly see the Sea Hawk some distance astern, for there was a clear, waning moon. The surf, as it broke on the beach, could be plainly heard.

Going again into the steerage, I took a blanket and pillow from my berth, and spreading the blanket on the deck I lay down and tried to sleep. But all was of no use; my thoughts would revert to the buoy and why the bell did not ring.

Giving up all thoughts of sleep, I arose, walked aft and looked at the buoy. There it was, tugging at the hawser, for the tide had swept it across the stern and off the quarter of the schooner.

Taking hold of the rope, I found I could draw it up closer. The bell was there all right—why did it not ring? I must know. So, tying the rope to a cleat that was close at hand, I slid down the hawser until my feet touched the ball-like basket on its top.

The cold, damp iron chilled my bare feet; for when I last arose from my berth I had not stopped to put on my shoes and stockings At first I thought my courage would fail me, but the sight of the bell so close at hand renewed my curiosity. Letting go my hold on the rope, I clambered down the iron cage that held the bell.

The buoy, which was made of iron in the form of a hollow pyramid with its apex in the water, had a top surface which was flat and about five feet in diameter. Over this was the pointed lattice framework in which the bell was hung.

Digitized by Google

A large hole had been stove in the lattice framework by the vessel which had set the buoy adrift. As the frame was about five feet high, I had no difficulty in crawling inside. Putting my hand on the tongue of the bell, I found that it was tightly covered with canvas sail-cloth, which the men on the Sea-Hawk had tied there to stop its constant ringing.

For some minutes I was so enraptured with my strange surroundings that I paid no attention to the Ranger. When I did glance towards her I was amazed to find the buoy adrift.

The rope that held it to the vessel had been much worn by the constant chafing it had received while the Sea Hawk towed the buoy. It had let me pass down safely, but when my weight was added to the tossing buoy, after the rope had been drawn up taut, it gave way, and the tide was sweeping the buoy out of the harbour, with myself a prisoner on it.

Terrified at the idea of being carried out to sea under such strange conditions, I screamed. But the Ranger was now a hundred yards away, the surf was roaring, and no shipmate heard me. The buoy moved on a course right past the Sea Hawk. Oh, how sweet would that old skipper's squeaky voice have sounded, could I have heard it reply to my screams! But everybody seemed asleep on the sloop.

I thought of throwing myself overboard and trying to swim to the vessel, but the sight of the phosphorescent water frightened me. The buoy had a piece of cable attached to its sunken end. This, in the shoal water of the harbour, dragged along the bottom, and a bright streak in the water marked its course. This scared me, because I could not imagine what it could be.

The land and lights ashore appeared like a huge black cloud, with here and there a little star peeping out. It was useless to call for help to that distant vision. God seemed nearer. In the agony of my heart I knelt and prayed fervently for aid.

After that I felt better, and remembered the bell above my head. Could I call some boat by ringing it? I quickly clutched at the canvas covering and tried to tear it off. But my little fingers bled as I tore my nails in vain attempts to loosen the hard cloth.

By this time the waves had grown larger, and they were continually washing over the buoy. I was wet to the skin; and as the morning air was cold I was soon chilled through.

Just then I saw something alight on the top of the buoy. One of the owls from the mainland, in its flight across the harbour, had sought a resting-place over me. As I half-rose from my sitting position, the bird gave a hoot and looked down on me with its large, bright eyes. Then it rose from its perch, circled round for a moment, probably wondering what strange creature I was, and flew away. I was glad to see it go, for its eyes seemed to pierce me through.

When out in the Sound, and fast drifting towards the open sea, I made another attempt to loosen the canvas. Standing upright, I caught sight of a bright object in the water, which seemed to be following the buoy. What could it be?

It was long and looked like a snake as it followed wriggling after. I shut my eyes, for I dared not look at it. Still groping with my hands on the canvas, I found a knot at the top that in the darkness I had not felt before.

It was easily untied, and the muffle was soon removed. As I struck the tongue of the bell on its side it rang out a sound that caused me to fall flat on the buoy and cover my ears with my hands. Now with the tossing the ringing continued.

Oh, how its deep tone did strike into my ears! Dong, dong, dong, dong!—would it never stop? Sometimes for a moment it remained quiet, and I would uncover my ears, then it would start to ringing again, and its awful sounds penetrated my brain. It seemed as though I must faint.

With the swash of the water, the deep dong of the bell, my wet clothing, my numb limbs, and an occasional screech of a sea-fowl my senses were fast leaving me. Then I caught sight of the fiery serpent again, and lost consciousness.

When I regained my senses I was lying on the after hatch of a fishing vessel, and the captain and officers stood around me. They had seen the buoy at the first streak of daylight, with my unconscious body lying across its top. They had sent a boat and brought me on board. Late in the afternoon, after a long, warm sleep, we reached Southsea. Just as we were moored I saw the Ranger coming to anchor.

She lowered a boat, and soon it was drawn up on the beach. As Captain Gardner stepped out I reached out my hand, which the amazed man clasped with joy. He and his crew had supposed that I had fallen overboard.

As he took me back to the Ranger in his boat we passed the buoy, and the memory of the fiery serpent was brought back painfully. Captain Gardner inquired the reason of my emotion, and I told him of the last few moments before I had fainted.

"Well, boy," he said, "your story has a strange sound, but let's pull the boat up alongside of the buoy, and perhaps I can explain the mystery of the fiery fish."

When beside the buoy he pointed his finger and said, "Yes, I am right. There is your snake, boy."

Down beneath the water, and hanging idly to the broken cable below the buoy, was a long string of kelpish seaweed. It was alive with a fine species of animalculæ, that had shone in the darkness with a brightness that might well have deceived a more experienced person than I was then.

The Face of Flame

IT was the sacred hour of the pipe, and the men who sat in the verandah of the chief hotel at Scarborough were worshipping in concert.

"Craddock," said the physician, breaking a long silence, "I am a believer in the evil eye."

"And a man of science!" exclaimed his friend in an exaggeration of despair. "To what are we coming?"

"I am a man of science," retorted the other firmly, "and therefore I do not doubt that the phenomenon is capable of some simple solution. The trouble is to find the key. Anyhow, I have myself witnessed lately not less than two very curious and interesting manifestations of the phenomenon."

"Besides the Eternal Feminine?" suggested the lawyer.

But the other man said slowly: "I was travelling in America a year ago. At one of the stations on the way from New York to Chicago two people entered the sleeping-car—a man about my own age and a woman some ten years younger, evidently his wife. The habit of observing without staring becomes second nature to the physician, and an apparently casual glance told me all I cared to know. He was just the ordinary, peevish, masculine invalid; while her every movement told of patience learned in a hard school.

"I turned in rather late, and during the night I had a call for professional aid. Hastily obeying the summons of the conductor, I followed him to the private room occupied by this couple. We went in and he locked and bolted the door. The porters had not observed us; the passengers were presumably sleeping. The conductor, whose peculiar expression of countenance had struck me earlier in the night, sank on the couch like one whom despair had bereft of his senses, whilst I glanced hurriedly round. On the floor, almost at my feet, was stretched the woman, apparently in a state of collapse; on the bed lay the husband—dead!

"I saw that she held tightly clenched a small empty phial. It was labelled 'Strychnia.'

"A suppressed groan at my side startled even my professional nerves. 'For goodness sake, doctor,' said a harsh voice in my ear, 'keep this thing quiet for awhile!'

"I turned and beheld the conductor in the act of opening the door. He went out, leaving me alone in a situation which was unpleasant even for a physician. The sight of the phial in the hand of such a woman had given me a strange shock. I proceeded to make as careful an examination of the dead man as circumstances could permit. 'Poison—the vehicle, strychnia,' I muttered. A hand was laid on my arm, and in shifting my position I confronted the woman. Though handsome, she was no longer what is termed a young woman, yet she had the air of an innocent child.

"'Doctor,' she whispered, holding out the phial, 'I tried to take it from him, but I was too late.' Her lips trembled, and in a moment her cheeks were wet with tears.

"'Tell me what you can,' I said quietly. She began to speak in low uncertain tones:

"'My husband is—was—an invalid. Some physicians said that there was serious trouble; others, that he was chiefly hypochondriac He thought he would like to try California, and we were on our way to San Diego. I did not mind where we went, so long as it helped him. That was all I cared for—all I have cared for—for years!'

"'He—my husband—was restless, and about midnight called for the strychnia, of which he was in the habit of taking a dose when suffering from nervous exhaustion. As he had already used the prescribed quantity, I suggested that he should wait awhile, and that meantime I would ring for boiling water and prepare him a cup of beef-tea. He consented, but grew impatient and opened the door to hurry the porter.'

"She paused again, as if her task were a hard one, then proceeded: 'Suddenly he fell back on the bed, with his hands before his face as if warding off some evil thing. Alarmed, I, too, looked out, but saw nothing but the porter awaiting orders, and heard only the departing footsteps of the conductor in the passage. What my husband saw, Heaven only knows. After awhile I quieted him.'

"She shuddered, and closed her eyes for a moment, then opened them and fixed them on mine, probing them as one who is confident of her facts, but seeks contradiction for peace of mind's sake.

"'He always saw one thing when a death was going to take place in the family. It was a face—a face of flame, with dead eyes. The flame was white, and composed of little fiery tongues. He had been asleep—and so, I think, had I—when he clutched me by the wrist, shrieking: "The face! the face! Don't you see it, Alice? Here—pressed against the window? Heavens, he has killed me! I am a dead man!" In vain I tried to persuade him that what he saw was merely the effect of flying sparks from the locomotive on the darkness of the night. He grew wilder—lost his mind, I believe—seized the strychnia bottle, and before I could prevent him——ah! you know the rest!'

"She sank back upon the cushions, her extraordinary power of self-control exhausted. Before daylight the conductor returned. I observed him narrowly, for a strange idea, evolved from the woman's recital, had taken possession of my mind. Could it be that I had stumbled on one of those phenomena, the question of whose existence has been for centuries a subject of dispute between scientific men?

"The corpse was removed to the baggage car, and there I went in search of the conductor.

"The remnant of humanity, rigidly outlined beneath its shrouding sheet, appeared to be the only occupant of the car. The lamps were out, and daylight was streaming through the half-open door, revealing the piled-up trunks, and—what was that in the corner by the dead man? I stepped over. There, hanging from a hook in the roof, in close proximity to the corpse, and with the wan light of morning on his face, was the conductor—a suicide!

"I found a note addressed to me, pinned on the conductor's coat. I had the presence of mind to possess myself of it before making known this fresh tragedy. You can believe that for the lady's sake I spared no pains to prevent her husband's death going into the papers under sensational headlines. I succeeded. 'Death by misadventure' was a true bill; the sick man had taken an overdose of strychnia by mistake. That was the simple truth, yet not the whole truth. For the conductor's relatives I could not thus provide; but the real cause of his death must for ever remain unknown to the world, or at least until science claims her own, as she will, as she must, some day.

"That note said:

"'Doctor, I can bear my life no more. When these spells come upon me I am better dead, as my father, who was similarly afflicted, thought before me. I felt one coming on last night, and as I was hurrying away to my quarters I met that poor sick man face to face. I could not help myself, doctor. Whoever meets my eye when I have one of those spells is doomed either to death or some terrible misfortune! You won't believe me, I know, but I have the Evil Eye—not always, but often enough, Heaven knows! Explain this if you can, doctor, for the sake of some other poor wretch who may be in the same fix as I am.

A WONDERFUL MEDICINE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Are universally admitted to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For Females of all ages these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them carry off all humours, and bring about all that is required. No female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found equal to BEECHAM'S PILLS for removing any obstruction or irregularity in the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box, they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

For a Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, and all Disorders of the Liver, they act like magic, and a few doses will be found to work wonders on the most important organs of the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action, with the rosebud of health, the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are FACTS testified continually by members of all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is,

BEECHAM'S PILLS have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

BEING SIX MILLION BOXES PER ANNUM.

BEECHAM'S COUGH PILLS

Persons suffering from Coughs and kindred troubles should relieve their minds of the idea that nothing will benefit them unless it be in the form of a lozenge, or taken as a liquid. Let them try BEECHAM'S COUGH PILLS, and they will never regret it. These Pills are made from a formula differing entirely from that which guides the manufacture of BEECHAM'S PILLS (Yellow Label), but like them will be found reliable. On the first symptoms of a Cold or Chill, a timely dose of BEECHAM'S COUGH PILLS will invariably ward off all dangerous features. For years many families have used no other Winter Medicine. Every householder and traveller should avail themselves of this good, safe, and simple remedy for Coughs in general, Asthma, Bronchial Affections, Hoarseness, Shortness of Breath, Tightness and Oppression of the Chest, Wheezing, &c. Each box bears a GREEN label.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 328.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 13, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

I.

"AMBITION has been my curse," said Arkell. "All my hopes have faded like sickly incense fumes of unreality."

He broke off with a short laugh.

"Disappointments are inevitable," answered the girl at his side, gazing into the fire through half-closed lids.

"Your life," he declared, "has been one of happiness, and mine of sorrow. From my youth up ill-luck has followed me. My aims have been frustrated and cramped at every turn."

"How so?"

"As a boy I devoted myself to study, and eventually went to college; but there my health stepped in to run all hope of success, breaking down when I most required physical strength. A friend—a very eminent man—while I was still weak and nerveless, dealt me the cruelest cut of all. He had followed my progress, struck by my dogged perseverance.

"He told me most forcibly that I had not the mental capacity to distinguish myself, at the same time advising me to leave college before taxing my brain further. I felt the wisdom of his words, and, in a frenzy of disappointment, left the University to seek fresh fields. Crushed and woe-begone, still I craved for success. Thirsting for excitement, I joined a company of strolling players, with whom I travelled in the provinces for three years. All that time I worked hard upon a play, with which I intended to checkmate fate and triumph.

"With this idea firmly implanted in my mind, I sought out a rich uncle, my father's only brother, who had recently returned from America, and induced him to provide me with sufficient capital to start a theatre on my own account. This he gladly did, fully believing in the ultimate success of my venture. It is gall and wormwood to remember now the rhapsodies in which I indulged. At last I was to pacify my craving for distinction! The game was in my own hands, and I felt confident of scoring a success. Alas! for the lame blunder—the date is not so far distant but that you can recall the shame and humiliation which fell to the lot of that unfortunate actor, manager, and author—Adrian Arkell!"

"It was a crime," she said. "Do not let us talk of it."

"You mean the criticisms?" he asked eagerly.

"No," she replied, unswerving from the truth; "the play."

"Candour is sometimes difficult to digest," he muttered, kicking the fender. "My folly has received its final death blow at your hands."

"Then at least you owe me some gratitude. I cannot fall down and worship before false gods."

Alys smiled a little bitterly as she spoke. If he only knew how it hurt her to pain him! Why had he been mad enough to court the sneers of the public, when his lines might have fallen in pleasant places had he curbed his ambition!

She felt something more than pity for him, as she watched a bright flame wreathing itself round a pillar of smoke, comparing his life to the dark vapour, and hers to the flash of fire enveloping it in a warm glow. How dearly she would have loved to lift the heavily burdened soul to her own sphere of light. An almost irresistible impulse seized her to tell him that she had given him her heart unasked; but while the thought flashed through her mind,' the sound of voices reached them.

"That is Julia," she said uneasily. "I do so dislike Julia."

"You mean your sister-in-law, Mrs. Fergusson?"

"Yes. She is a worldly type of woman, frivolous to her finger tips! I get saturated with her frivolity. I find myself repeating Julia's sayings and trading on them. I even copy Julia's dresses; isn't it hateful of me?"

He ignored her remark, and rose mechanically.

"Must you go? Perhaps it is as well. I have to run the gauntlet of Julia's criticism."

"You need fear no one, Miss Fergusson—much less a woman."

"But women are more formidable foes than men."

"Ever since Eve tempted Adam, men have repaid his wrongs with interest."

He held out his hand, and in another moment he had gone.

"You are to be congratulated!" said Julia, entering the room like a petticoated whirlwind.

"Why?"

"For making a conquest of that bear, Arkell. Everyone knows he is a woman hater. Play with him, my dear, but do not love him."

"Why not?"

"Love brings sadness, Alys. If you marry the object of your affections he disappoints you, and if you don't marry him he worries you."

"But you are happy."

Julia sank down before the fire and laughed. "Oh! don't take me for an example. I married your brother, and he is a man in a thousand. Ring for some more tea—here is Doctor Musgrave."

Julia, kneeling on the hearthrug, nodded to the Doctor as he entered. He was too familiar a friend to be greeted ceremoniously. His eyes brightened visibly as they rested upon Alys perched in the window-seat, and after exchanging a few conventional words with Julia, he joined her.

"I wish you could cure a troubled spirit," she said, leaning her head against the curtains with a sigh.

"First I must know the trouble," he replied.

A slight flush rose to the girl's face.

"I am miserably restless and dissatisfied. When I desire a thing greatly I cannot wait for it—I want it at once, or not at all."

"At the present time, then, you require—what?"

"The moon—but I do not ask you to procure it for me."

"Everything is possible where there is a will."

"You think so?"

"I am certain of it."

Julia glided between them, laying her head on Alys' shoulder. "Are you looking at the sunset?" she said, assuming a dreamy expression. "I love the going down of the sun! It makes me think of the eve of life, when in our hoary age we too shall wane and sink behind the veil."

"She is trying to harrow our feelings in artistic language," laughed Alys, turning to the Doctor, "but to tell you the truth no one has a greater horror of growing old. She declared only the other day that she would commit suicide at the first sign of a crow's-foot."

"Alys can afford to laugh," was the retort, "since she is in the hey-day of youth."

"My horse is tired out with a long day's rounds," said the Doctor, "and I must not keep the poor beast standing. I only ran in to leave a message for your mother. Good-bye and good luck to you, Miss Alys. This is my advice: Dare all, hope all, venture all, but, above these three things, never despair." Then he was gone.

"What did he mean?" asked Julia, sharply.

"It was only a prescription," replied Alys, laughing.

II.

The following night Alys met Adrian in the full glare of a ballroom. She was pale, and her lips trembled as she greeted him.

"I thought you never danced," she said.

"I came here to see you," he replied, "and my presence has caused some comment. I am a novelty on such an occasion."

"How delightful to meet something original! But I guessed your reason." She lowered her eyes, breathing hard. "Mr. Arkell, I must speak to you alone."

"Come this way."

She followed him to the conservatory, while her heart beat high with expectation. She glanced nervously round, as a blush of embarrassment rose to her cheek.

"What do you wish to say, Miss Fergusson?"

"You ask me that?" cried the girl, raising her eyes indignantly to his. "Can it be possible that I have been the victim of a trick?"

"I—I do not know," stammered Adrian.

With a swift movement she drew a letter from her dress. A strangely pathetic look crept into her eyes as a sense of immeasurable distance seemed to rise between them.

"What troubles you?" he asked eagerly. "For Heaven's sake, don't look like that!"

Alys clasped her hands imploringly.

"Here is your letter," she said.

He took the paper from her, though she pretended to hold it back, with a gesture of mute horror at his action.

"If it is not yours," she whispered in a strained voice, "for pity's sake return it without a word."

"Do you rebuke me for reading?" he pleaded, drawing closer to her side. "I would that I could claim the authorship! Had some angel of God intervened to plead my cause, it would have been in no better language. My mysterious representative has put into words what I should not have dared entertain in my heart."

Alys trembled from head to foot, and a blaze of triumph flashed from her eyes. In a moment her hands were grasped by Adrian, while he drew her head down softly on to his shoulder.

The sheltering palm trees seemed created to veil lovers in a temple of foliage.

"I feel," he whispered, "as though I had often held your hands and kissed your hair."

"Yet you never thought of me before to-night?"

There was a long, sweet silence. At last Adrian broke it with the thought uppermost in his mind.

"Who could have written this letter?"

"Ah! who indeed!" she answered slowly. "Yet after all, what does it matter?"

"It was Julia," he said, tightening his grasp on her hand; "your sister-in-law."

"Why should you suspect her?"

"She is jealous of your youth and beauty, and thinking I was indifferent, hoped to slight you."

"That is a very unpleasant thought, but do not condemn her upon suspicion."

As she spoke, the perfume clinging to Julia's chiffons pervaded the air.

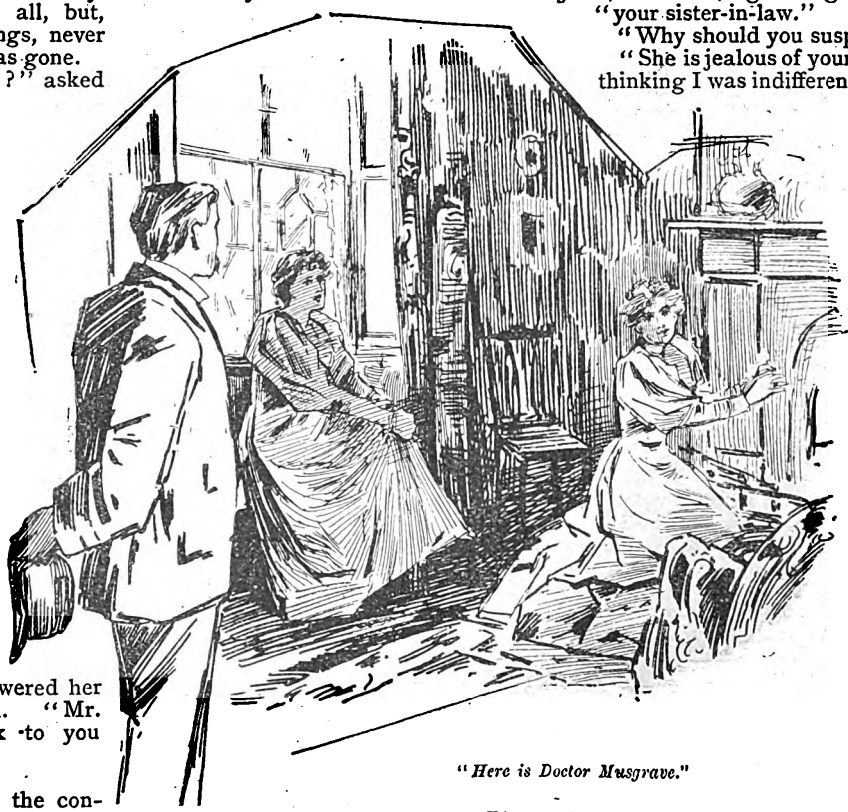
"Are you not going to dance?" she cried as she rustled by. "There are a score of people waiting to be introduced to your partner, Mr. Arkell."

She laughed half mockingly, and, waving her fan, passed out of sight.

"I wish we could go away," he said. "I dread the talk an engagement creates."

"You do not deserve to be married, for you are a hermit at heart still."

"Any publicity is hateful to me, since the finger of scorn has been so often pointed at me."



"Here is Doctor Musgrave."

"Please forget that unfortunate play. Come to the ballroom and see what a rush there will be for my programme."

Adrian tried to detain her, but she rose and left him watching her disconsolately, as Doctor Musgrave claimed the dance.

When the music ceased she confided to him the news of her engagement.

A few moments later the doctor escaped from the ballroom, and dashing out into the night, hurried home scarcely able to breathe.

III.

Time flew quickly, but love had not kept pace with its wings. That of Alys somewhat waned ere the wedding day approached, though her dogged nature refused to admit the fact even to herself. Before the important event she wrote to Doctor Musgrave wishing to see him.

"I was afraid you would not come," she said somewhat shyly, as he arrived in answer to her summons.

"I am entirely at your command," he replied, "to serve you faithfully to my dying day, if you would only give me the chance."

"How delightfully loyal!" motioning him into a chair; "I have been longing to unburden my soul to someone, and you are the only living creature to whom I can speak. I have done a mean despicable thing!"

"Impossible!"

"Not at all. Unfortunately sometimes 'all things are possible.' But I will explain. When I fell in love with Adrian, I could not wait to see whether, in time, he would ask me to marry him. So I wrote a letter to myself, disguising my hand like his. I conceived the idea of acting a little comedy for my own amusement, laying my heart bare to the man who had only to ask to receive it. But ever since that night my deception has troubled me. The worst of it was, he determined to discover the mysterious correspondent, and finally attributed the deed to Julia."

"It is late to reproach yourself now."

"And you despise me?"

"I could think no ill of you," he replied, turning his face away. Alys fancied his voice trembled.

"Then give me a word of seasonable advice. Ought I to tell Adrian?"

"Your wedding is to-morrow?"

"Yes."

"Then say nothing about it. You have left it too late."

"Why?"

"Mr. Arkell is not looking well, and is easily provoked. I do not want a cloud to hang over your marriage feast. He probably would love you more, but possibly might love you less. Why own to a man that you sought him?"

Her cheek paled, and she trembled slightly. "I wanted a man's opinion," she said.

. . . . . .

It was the morning of his wedding-day, when, contrary to custom, Adrian rushed into the house and inquired anxiously for Miss Fergusson. He was hot with running, and carried an open telegram and letter in his hand.

"Read these," he exclaimed. "Read! read! read!"

Alys glanced at the telegram first.

"Mr. Arkell passed peacefully away this morning."

"Your uncle?" she asked.

"Yes."

"I am sorry," she began, but Adrian interrupted her.

"The letter is from him to me," he continued, thrusting it into her hand, "dictated last night with his dying breath, during an hour's consciousness after a paralytic stroke."

She scanned it slowly.

"Before daybreak I shall have gone. You will get this letter on your wedding morning. I have loved you, Adrian, as a son, and it is to you I leave my entire fortune. Accept it as a wedding gift, and use it well."

Alys touched the paper reverently, gazing at it in solemn silence. Adrian waited for her to speak, then pointed again to the pages with fingers trembling from excitement.

"Don't you take it in? Look! It is as clear as daylight: 'To you I leave my entire fortune!' I hardly know the amount, but it is something enormous, and I always believed he had bequeathed it to charitable institutions."

"Let us try to remember his last words," she said. "Use it well."

Adrian chuckled to himself as he mentally calculated the sum. Alys drew away from him with a sudden sense of disgust, for not a word of sorrow had passed his lips.

"How shall you like marrying a millionaire?" he asked. "We ought to be the happiest couple in creation. I love filthy lucre." He laughed loudly and tried to kiss her, but she withdrew from his embrace.

"After the ceremony," she cried, with an attempt at merriment. "It will be all the sweeter for waiting," and with these words she left him.

As he wended his way down the drive he picked up a handful of shingle and tossed it in the air. "As I throw these pebbles to the wind," he cried, "so shall I be able to scatter my money broadcast. How easily we shall glide through the world, since we can pave our path with gold."

IV.

A CERTAIN gloom overshadowed the wedding ceremony owing to the bridegroom's bereavement; and the bride looked deadly pale as she left the church on her husband's arm.

"How strangely his countenance had altered!" thought Alys. His eyes glistened with a feverish light, and there was a look on his face that she had never seen before. Half inclined to cry, she made a dash for the carriage, turning to Adrian with a deep-drawn sigh of relief as it whirled them away.

"So it is all over!" she said, toying with her flowers; "the crowd of gaping faces and the solemn service, and we are man and wife."

To her surprise, he did not answer, but gazed before him, wrapt in meditation.

"What are you thinking of, Adrian!"

Still no reply. Alys grew alarmed.

"Are you ill? Why do you not speak to me?"

He looked up, smiling, as though he had only just heard, and, snatching at one of the flowers of her bouquet, pressed it to his lips.

"You shall have beautiful flowers like these every day of your life," he said. "Our money shall flow like water. You see that beggar—I will fling him my gold watch and chain, for it is no more to me than a copper yesterday."

Before she could stop him, he had let down the window, and thrown the trinkets in the street.

"Adrian! Are you mad?" she exclaimed, biting her lips with vexation, as the carriage dashed on, leaving the astonished tramp clasping his prize.

As she left the church on her husband's arm.

A horrible

Too late—the fatal second had passed, and Adrian lay lifeless below.

dread crept over her, freezing the blood in her veins. She had heard of sudden and unexpected good fortune turning people's brains. What if his uncle's generosity had unsettled Adrian's reason! The thought turned her sick and dizzy, but she had no time to dwell upon it. The door was flung open, and a moment later she had entered her old home.

Alys uttered no word of the suspicion in her heart as loving hands adorned her for the journey. They were bound for a country seat in Wiltshire, lent for the honeymoon.

"I must speak with Doctor Musgrave alone," she said, "before I go."

Julia was her confidante, and carried the message with unusual good humour.

"Have you noticed anything odd about Adrian, Doctor Musgrave?" she asked, as he joined her.

"Yes," he replied reluctantly; "Mr. Arkell seems rather strange."

"I am frightened to death of him," Alys declared. "That money has turned his brain. How shall I dare go away with him?"

"You must now," he answered, almost sternly. Then, seeing her terror, added, "Heaven help you, poor child!" and, taking her hand, kissed it reverently. They had no time to linger, for her mother came between them, and escorted the bride downstairs.

Though Doctor Musgrave did not speak to her again, he kept his eye on Adrian with professional keenness, alone knowing her trouble as the carriage whirled away.

The newly-made husband talked wildly on the journey; but not until they found themselves in the old family mansion, with its gardens bathed in the glory of sunset, did the bride's heart sink with the bitterness of desolation. She felt entirely alone in her distress. They were standing together in the library, a room paneled with dusky pictures, old books, and wrinkled tapestry, relics of a former age.

"Come into the boudoir," she said, "this place is so gruesome."

She led the way to a more cheerful apartment, where lounges embroidered in damask roses blended with brocaded chairs and tall flowering plants.

"Do you see that shadow?" he asked suddenly. "It has a death's head, and there are gold coins in its mouth falling out as fast as rain and rolling across the floor." As he spoke he dropped on his knees and groveled at her feet.

"Adrian, if you talk like that I shall send for a doctor."

He did not notice her remark.

"I am going to look for gold in the attics," he continued, with a nod of satisfaction. "I shall not be long, Alys, and you have the shadow to keep you company."

She tried to follow him, but the effort proved fruitless. Helpless and terrified she gave way to her grief, sobbing bitterly in the silent room. As the tears coursed down her cheeks, she fancied she heard the sound of footsteps on the gravel path without. She clasped her hands over her heart to still its beating, and strained every nerve to listen. Her attitude was one of despair as the window leading to the garden opened gently, and Doctor Musgrave walked in. He made no apology for his presence, nor betrayed surprise at Alys' condition. If the circumstances had been of everyday occurrence he could not have appeared more thoroughly at his ease. At first she feared that her eyes deceived her, doubting the balance of her own brain. Then the revulsion of feeling was too great, and, with a cry of joy, she rushed towards him.

"You have come to save me," she whispered eagerly, grasping his hands.

"I foresaw events, and dared not leave you unprotected, so I have strolled about the grounds like a spy ever since your arrival, waiting my time. He is standing now at an upper window, and the look on his face is unmistakable."

"The worst seems over now that you are here," she murmured.

"Poor girl!" he thought, "you do not realise your life-long misery has only just begun."

"Listen! Adrian is calling."

"Alys! Alys!" His voice resounded through the house.

"Let us go to him," said the doctor gravely. "He must not be left for a moment."

Adrian beckoned them as they appeared on the upper storey.

"Come out upon the leads," he cried, "and examine the treasure; you will see it better there. I have found a wonderful ladder of solid gold, with rungs inlaid with precious stones."

Alys shrank back, and covered her face with her hands.

"There is no such thing, Adrian," she cried. "Do you wish to kill me?"

He shook his head.

"I will prove the truth of my words," he shouted, dashing through the window. "See!—it is there—strong and firm. I will descend to the garden below."

For the moment Alys remained rooted to the spot. She felt her own senses deserting her, though she took in the situation at a glance. Adrian was hanging over the balcony, unknowingly courting his death, while Doctor Musgrave rushed forward to catch him. Too late—the fatal second had passed, and Adrian lay lifeless below. Above stood the man who would have saved him, tenderly clasping the fainting form of the woman he loved.

THE FRESH-AIR FUND.

In order to get ahead with the necessary arrangements, I think it is quite time to begin asking once more for subscriptions to the Fresh-Air Fund. The programme that I have decided upon for the coming summer will be carried out upon precisely the same lines which proved in every way so satisfactory last year. That is to say, I shall aim at taking a definite number of children for a country holiday from London and every provincial centre with a population of over 200,000. If the money still continues to come in towards the end of the summer, as I expect it will, the balance is to be spent on the metropolis. There is no limit to the number of little children thirsting for a breath of fresh air, for one day's freedom from the dust and heat and pestilence of the slums.

Ninepence is sufficient to pay for each little one's outing, including the double railway or tram fare and two substantial meals of large meat pies, and cake, and milk, and bread, and jam, and butter.

Subscriptions, however small, will be gratefully acknowledged by the editor of Short Stories, Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, London. Collecting forms may also be had by application at the office.

AN IMPORTANT LETTER.

JOHN FORMBY, of the firm of Formby and Wilton, was walking down Piccadilly on his way to see a colleague in Chancery Lane. He was a decidedly striking-looking man, and not at all like the usual type of a respectable family solicitor. He was considerably above the average height, and very dark. His forehead and nose were quite of the statuesque order; the rest of his face was hidden by a black, bushy beard. He was about forty years of age, and unmarried.

This morning the traffic seemed greater than usual, and blocks occurred every two or three minutes. John Formby noticed a private brougham, which drew up at the pavement close to where he was standing. It had scarcely stopped when the window was opened quickly, and a young girl leaned out, and thrust a letter into Formby's hand, exclaiming as she did so, "For God's sake, post this."

John Formby took it. A few strides led to the pillar box, and he dropped the letter in, just as a burly, coarse-looking young man hurried up as though to intercept him. This individual looked hard at Formby, who surveyed him coolly from head to foot, and then, with a muttered execration, went back and jumped into the brougham, which presently moved off.

Prompted by an influence he did not stop to analyse, Formby jumped into a hansom, and with a brief direction to the driver to follow the brougham he whirled after them down the Haymarket, and along the Strand and Fleet Street, into the heart of the City.

On and on they drove, until it began to occur to Formby that a hansom was rather an unusual object in this neighbourhood, and that he was beginning to be observed by the passers-by. Just as he had realised this, the cabman attracted his attention, and remarked, "I don't know whether you have noticed it, sir, but the party in front has looked back at us twice."

John had not noticed it. He stopped the cab at once and took a hasty glance round. A baker's covered cart had stopped a few yards in front of them. In an instant his mind was made up. He paid and dismissed the cab, and went up to the driver of the covered cart. "Did you see that brougham pass just now?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," the man replied, looking at him in some surprise.

"Just drive me after it," said John, springing into the cart. "Follow wherever it goes, and I will make it worth your while," he added.

For some minutes they rattled after the brougham, which finally drew up before a dingy looking house in the street, and John saw a woman come out and aid in assisting the man he had seen at the pillar-box to half drag, half carry a young girl into the house.

"Well, that's a rum go," observed the driver of the baker's cart.

"Do you know who lives there?" demanded John.

"Yes," replied the man; "a very respectable party. I leave bread there every evening."

"Will you try and find out for me who that young lady is, and where she comes from?" pursued John eagerly.

"Well, I'll try, sir. But how am I to let you know?"

"Where is your shop?"

"Oh, a long way back."

"I will be there at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning. Can you drive me there now?"

The man assented, and they returned the way they had come, and finally stopped before a small baker's shop. John gave the man a sovereign, much to his amazement, and walked off, hoping to find a cab a little farther on. He was very late for his appointment, a circumstance which very much surprised his friend, who had never known John Formby unpunctual before.

At about four o'clock he got back to his office, where he found a letter awaiting him, the contents of which were as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—My father died last night. Will you come down at once? My step-brother is here, and is causing me much annoyance.

"Yours faithfully,

"MARION HARRINGTON.

"Messrs. Formby and Wilton."

John Formby laid the letter down and reflected for a moment. Major Harrington had been a client of his for about four years. He was a widower with two children, one a son by his first wife, the other a daughter by his second wife.

A short time ago his son had offended him, and he came up to London and made a most extraordinary will, in which he left everything to his daughter, with the provision that she should allow her brother not less than three hundred a year. He had informed his solicitor that he had told his son that he intended doing this, and that he need expect nothing more from him.

John took up the letter and read it through once more. Then he glanced at the envelope, and saw to his surprise that it had been posted in London that day, although the letter was dated the day before.

He went into his partner's room, and consulted him.

"I should go down at once," advised Mr. Wilton, after perusing the letter. "You can just catch a train which will land you there in a couple of hours."

Accordingly, John set out, and reached his destination about half-past eight. He asked for Miss Harrington, and was informed that she had gone away that morning.

"But her father is just dead," exclaimed John in surprise.

"Yes, sir," returned the maid, tearfully. "He is lying dead upstairs now; and oh, sir! I am sure Miss Marion would never have gone away like this of her own accord."

"Just tell me all you know about it," said John. "I am the late Major Harrington's solicitor, Mr. John Formby."

Thus encouraged, the maid proceeded. Briefly, her story was as follows: Major Harrington had been taken very suddenly ill, and died within a few hours. His son was telegraphed for, but arrived too late to see him alive. He had a long interview with his sister, who came out of the room crying, and told her maid that her brother had been very violent, and that she was afraid to be left alone with him.

The next morning she ordered her carriage, saying she was going up to London to see her solicitor, and would return the same evening. "That was yesterday, sir," continued the maid, "and she has not come back, nor Mr. James Harrington either."

"Did he go with her?"

"No, sir; but we think that he must have followed her."

John was silent for a few moments. Then a sudden inspiration flashed across him. "What was Mr. Harrington like?" he inquired. "Have you a portrait of him or of Miss Harrington?"

"Oh, yes, sir," answered the maid, "I will get them for you."

She went out of the room, and returned a moment afterwards with two photographs, in which John instantly recognised the lady who had asked him to post the letter, and the man who was with her in the brougham.

"It is all right," he said to the maid; "I know where they are."

He hurried back to the railway station, only to find that the last train had departed. He spent the night at the hotel close by, and started off by the first train the following morning. He went straight to his office, and after taking council with his partner, they proceeded together to the baker's shop. Here John found his friend of the day before, who informed him that he had found out all about the young lady.

"The poor young thing is out of her mind," he said, "and her brother has brought her up here to hide her from those who wish to put her away in an asylum. He brought her up from the country the day before yesterday."

John and his partner waited to hear no more, but proceeded to the house without delay. The door was opened by a woman who looked at them suspiciously, and inquired their business.

"We wish to see Miss Harrington, the young lady who is in your house now," said John sternly.

"There is no such person here," replied the woman.

"You are telling me a lie," returned John. "Miss Harrington was brought here yesterday by her brother, who has tried to pass her off as a lunatic. We are her solicitors, Messrs. Formby and Wilton."

The woman hesitated.

"My orders were to let no one see her," she said doubtfully.

"You will get yourself into serious trouble if you try and prevent our seeing Miss Harrington," observed Mr. Wilton.

"The gentleman is out," said the woman, "and he has left the lady locked up in her room."

The next instant John Formby strode past her, and went upstairs, the woman following, and protesting strongly against this invasion.

He opened the doors of two of the rooms easily, but the third one was locked. The key, however, had not been removed, and John turned it, and then knocked.

"Come in," said a voice, and he entered.

Marion Harrington was standing near the window. She glanced at John with a look of alarm, which quickly turned to one of half-puzzled recognition.

"You are the gentleman who posted my letter," she said.

"Yes," answered John, "and, oddly enough, it was addressed to myself. If I had only looked at the envelope then, I might have spared you this disagreeable experience. I am Mr. Formby, and my partner is waiting below. We have a cab and, with your permission, will take you home at once, and deal with your brother afterwards."

On the way back, Marion related her adventures.

It seemed that her step-brother had tried to make her sign a deed of gift, investing him with half her property. On her refusal to do this until she had consulted her solicitor, he became very violent, and gave utterance to various threats. She then wrote the letter to Messrs. Formby and Wilton, but reflected after she had done so, that under the circumstances it would be better to go in person to see them.

Accordingly she started, intending to get them to come back with her by the next train, if possible; but at the London terminus, she was seized by her step-brother, and forced into a cab. He took her to an hotel, and announced that she was a lunatic, feigning great distress at her condition.

The next morning he engaged a private carriage and removed her. Fortunately she had the letter in her pocket, and when the block in Piccadilly arrested the progress of the brougham, she noticed John, and a sudden impulse prompted her to snatch the letter from her pocket, and ask him to post it, the result of which was, as we have seen, her ultimate deliverance.

The heiress of Mascot Hall made what her friends called a very bad match, for she married her solicitor, Mr. John Formby, about six months after the events just related. But, as she described herself in a letter to a friend, written some years afterwards, "the happiest woman that ever lived," we may assume that, as far as she was concerned, the union was a thoroughly satisfactory one.

The Two Fausts.

FROM THE ITALIAN.

CHAPTER I.

"GOOD evening, Giacomo; what is the matter?" The other sat down moodily on a chair and did not answer, but gazed with frowning brow on the floor. His friend did not disturb him, but went on calmly with his evening meal. At length Giacomo roused himself.

"Matter enough," he said, despondently, "I've just seen Valeria."

"Well," said his friend, "I shouldn't look so despairingly sad if I had seen her," and then relapsed into silence.

"You are a fool, Petruccio; I warrant you would be downcast if you were in my place. Why! she laughed at me!" he exclaimed, angrily, stamping his foot on the ground, and blushing at the remembrance. "She actually burst out laughing when I told her that I loved her as nobody ever did, or will. Sapristi! You are laughing too! It's too bad! I shall not be in a hurry again to confide in you, Petruccio."

"Tell me all about it," replied his friend, soothingly, and becoming grave again. "What made you tell her of your—love? No, no; I don't mean to laugh, upon my faith I don't!"

"She was singing her parts for her début in Faust, you know. Ah, what a voice. I went mad, and fell on my knees before her, and asked her to do what she liked with me—only to let me tell her that I adored her!"

"And——?"

"And she stopped in the middle of a high C to laugh at me! I implored, but she only laughed the louder. Such a musical laugh! But it felt like a hot iron on my heart. I got up and almost wept as I asked her just for a flower from her hand. But she would not give even that. It was too cruel, Petruccio!"

"What did you do?"

"Oh, I got angry."

"And told her that you would have your revenge. Was not that the way of it?"

"It was. I said that some day she would not refuse me a flower when I asked it—or my hand either, when I offered it."

"Yes; I thought that would be what must follow—the usual way. And how are you going to get her to your feet now, Giacomo mio?"

The other did not answer, but looked at his friend with an assured air, as if he had no apprehensions on that score. Then he changed the subject, and picked up a guitar from a chair beside him.

"You haven't been playing lately, Petro, have you?" he asked, using the familiar nickname for his friend.

"No. I have been devoting all my time to singing with the maestro, who says I may come out in two years or so. He can get me any part, but my favourite is Faust. I must get him to give me a primo in that."

"You may sing with Valeria."

"True; I look forward to that, I must say. Don't be jealous, you know. Somebody must be primo tenore in it, and surely you would prefer me to some greasy little man of forty to make love to Valeria. I can put in a good word for you while I seem to be wooing and winning her," he finished, with a twinkle in his eyes.

"As you please," Giacomo answered, indifferently. "I must be going now, my friend. I am sorry to have interrupted you in your dinner. Thanks, no; I cannot join you in it to-night; I have another engagement. Good luck to you with Valeria. Good night."

Giacomo threaded his way out of his friend's apartments, and, wrapping his cloak around him, took his homeward road.

CHAPTER II.

ALL Florence was excited. The Italians are proverbially a nation of quick and changeful moods, and this mood was having full sway. It was no new opera, Faust; but then there was not always such a Marguerita as Valeria di Karro. Besides, she was a Florentine herself, and after earning the praise of all Europe, she was coming back to Florence to sing in her native city, and to charm her fellow-citizens as she had charmed the world. She was talked of in the streets, in the shops, in the palazzos. Her voice was discussed, pulled to pieces, put together again, and pronounced the finest in the world. Her dramatic talent was as great as her talent for singing, and she was so lovely! Even in her own sex she had unqualified worshippers.

It was more than four years since she had made her début in Florence, and she had simply taken her audience by storm from that hour. She had been constantly travelling from one capital to another, leaving glory and enthusiastic newspaper critiques in her track.

So that her reappearance in Florence was eagerly looked forward to, none the less so that the part of Faust was to be taken by their idol, who had first sung to them two seasons ago, and whose voice was familiar to every theatre-lover in Florence, namely, the young Petruccio Lalli.

He was congratulated in public, envied in private, and talked of in both. He was known to be devoting all his energies towards preparing himself for the momentous occasion. He was scarcely ever seen in the streets now; but a few strollers would occasionally group beneath some window, from whence they could hear the delicious, though faint notes, of the great tenor. Of course he still sang in the opera, but evidently he was reserving his powers for the supreme effort.

The day wore on, and at length the divine Valeria was seen in the streets of Florence, looking pleased and happy. Early on the night of the performance crowds assembled before the doors of the theatre eager to get a good seat at all costs.

On that same morning Valeria was visited by Petruccio, who was enchanted at the opportunity which he at last had got, and for which he had worked so desperately hard for the last few weeks, perfecting every note and fixing every aria in his mind to his own satisfaction. The cantatrice greeted him warmly.

"Ah, my friend!" she said, cordially, when he entered, "it is such a time since we have seen each other. I have heard of your success—who has not heard of it in all Italy?—and I assure you I was delighted when I read of it; and I am so glad that you are to sing with me to-night—it will be quite like old times, when we used to practise our solfeggios together, and bring down the maestro's wrath on our devoted heads at not opening our mouths enough."

They both laughed at the remembrance.

"The maestro couldn't laugh at you now, Valeria, could he? Those days are past."

"Nor at you. By the way, my friend, how is little Giacomo? He will be a man now."

Petruccio shook his head.

"He is not as he used to be. We seldom see each other now, and when we do, he is taciturn. I don't know what he is doing."

"Strange," answered Valeria, in a tone which meant that she didn't want to trouble over the matter.

After some light refreshment, Petruccio retired, after wishing Valeria all success.

From the opening of the doors of the theatre that night, till the rising of the curtain, there was a perpetual buzz of conversation and of excited whispers. The house filled to overflowing, and fashion and beauty were no less represented than the crowds of the middle and lower classes.

Behind the curtain the excitement was tremendous, though not so loudly expressed. Despair was visible on every countenance, and poor Valeria was as white as a sheet.

A message from Petruccio, almost illegibly scrawled, had told her that he had been struck down with a violent fit of sickness, which had utterly prostrated him! He had tried, he wrote, to prepare and pull himself together for the trial; but it was of no use. He felt ill in mind and in body, and would have preferred to die rather than live the wretched wreck that he found himself Giacomo had visited him that morning, and was so kind. He prayed Valeria to forgive him and to pity him, and besought her to try to get another Faust—he did not know anyone else to take the part though.

The consternation of the artistes at this letter could be imagined. Even now the angry calls of the audience told them that they were already behind time, and were being impatiently waited for.

The house wondered at the delay.

The calling ceased, and anxious whispers took the place of angry murmurs.

Could anything have happened? the people asked each other—could Valeria have fallen ill? Why didn't the manager tell them, then? It might be fire!

Loud voices were heard behind the scenes, and then a silence, and the curtain ran up. The house gave a sigh of satisfaction. All was well, then, and they would hear Valeria.

The first few notes of the opera was listened to with profound attention and silence, then a sensation ran through the house, and voices began here and there, the men looked at each other, and the women put their heads together and spoke.

It was not the voice of their idol, Petruccio, and the jealousy of the house at his place being taken by anyone else, expressed itself by angry mutterings and gestures. But these were soon hushed as the conviction forced itself upon them, that Petruccio's voice was but as nothing compared to that of the man before them. Full, rich, and glorious the notes fell from his lips, till the whole building seemed to be blendings of delicious harmonies. A dead silence of expectation reigned as the sage was about to appear as the young Faust.

He came. And the stillness of the house was broken by a short cry, and a name indistinctly pronounced. A woman fainted, and was carried from the theatre. Between the acts the excitement was tremendous. The face was familiar to all of them, and he was a Florentine. Yet who he might be they knew not. One woman could tell, but she was gone, in a faint; so they had to content themselves with speculation.

As the opera went on the excitement increased. Even Valeria herself proved a secondary attraction, though she seemed absolutely inspired, and played and sang as no one present had ever seen or heard before. She seemed almost frenzied, while Faust himself sang with passion rivalling hers.

His high notes were clear and full as those of an instrument, and his low notes rolled forth in perfect splendour. The audience was entranced, stupefied, and when the curtain came down for the last time, the thunders of applause continued for recall after recall.

Valeria retired to her room in the greatest agitation and exhaustion.

At last a step approached her door. She sat up in a tremor of agitation. "Would it pass?" she thought with a pang. No; it paused at her door, and a gentle tap asked admittance. It was granted; the door opened, and Giacomo entered, still in his costume of Faust. His face was pale, but firm.

"Can you refuse me just a little flower, now, Valeria?" he said, pleadingly, kneeling by her side.

She took one of the splendid bouquets which she had received that night, and tearing off a flower, pressed it to her lips and handed it with a trembling arm to Giacomo.

He stood up smiling, and, looking with a kind of bitter amusement at her face to mark the expression, began slowly to tear off the petals of the flower one by one, scattering them about the room. Then he lightly threw the broken and stripped stalk into her lap, again bowed, still smiling, and left the room.

THE TENTH OF JUNE.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas, whose life is attempted on the 10th June, 1883, by a Hindoo barrister at the Law Courts, by means of poison, visits General Sir Arthur Chetwynd at Seacombe Towers, in May, 1884. The General explains that a serious danger threatens the household, and that it will come, if at all, on the tenth of June. The reason for this is that in India on this particular day, in 1853, Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead) took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple, and every tenth of June afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, who subsequently refuses His Highness's request for his only daughter Leila's hand in marriage, but gives him permission to repeat his proposal in a year's time. Geoffrey tells Amavati of the danger which threatens himself and the General's household.

CHAPTER VI.

GEOFFREY TAKES COUNSEL.

By half-past five Geoffrey was up, and dressed.

In the quiet morning hours he had thought over the matter again, and had resolved to say nothing to Sir Arthur of his conversation with the Rajah. It could only add to the General's alarm to let him know that the Rajah believed that the danger that threatened them was imminent; and obviously he could hardly consult the General as to whether he should take the Rajah's advice and leave the country for a few days; or remain at Seacombe Towers over the Tenth of June.

But he felt it to be a necessity that he should take counsel with some one. His natural instinct prompted him to remain with his friends. The idea of quitting the General's roof while the shadow of danger still hung over him was intolerable. But, on the other hand, he feared that his presence might be a source of peril rather than a safeguard. If he were to leave the place he might divert the attention of the invisible enemy.

Often, when one is in perplexity, one feels an irrepressible longing to open one's mind to a friend; not so much in the hope of getting new light on the subject, as from a natural impulse to seek companionship and sympathy. So Geoffrey had resolved, as he lay awake during the night, that he would at once go up to London, and talk over the whole matter with his friend Linton. He knew that Jack Linton had for him a more than ordinary friendship, and that he possessed that invaluable quality in an adviser—a stable, well-balanced mind, not likely to be led astray by fancies or prejudices.

Of course, before going, it would be necessary to see the General and make some excuse for his sudden visit to town; but he thought it better not to say anything of the object of his journey.

Knowing that Sir Arthur was an early riser, Geoffrey went, shortly before six, to his dressing-room door, and tapped lightly.

"Come in!"

Geoffrey went in, and found the General finishing his toilet.

"I beg your pardon, sir, for disturbing you," he said; "but I want to take a run up to town this morning, and I have just time to catch the early train. May I tell Davis to let me have the light dog-cart?"

"You had better take the mail-phaeton. But why this sudden start? You are not leaving us for good?"

"Oh, dear, no! I merely want to see a man on business. It is rather important; but I expect to be back to-morrow, perhaps, even by the late train, to-night. You will make my excuses to Miss Chetwynd?"

"Oh, yes. Don't stand on ceremony."

"Good-bye, then, for the present."

Geoffrey was in the act of leaving the room, when a sudden thought occurred to him. He closed the door, and went back.

"General," he said, "will you forgive me if I ask a very personal question, one which, under other circumstances, would be impertinent?"

The General nodded and smiled.

"It is this: Don't you think that, in view of the danger that menaces us, it would be as well to have everything in readiness for—for the worst?"

"In what way?"

"For example—pardon my asking you—have you made your will?"

Sir Arthur frowned, threw himself into a chair, stretched out his legs, and thrust his hands deep into his pockets. The subject was to him a very unpleasant one. He had a strong opinion that to leave a large fortune to a young girl whose future was uncertain was to do her a very questionable kindness. It was simply making her a target at which adventurers might aim their arrows. How could he feel sure that some unworthy fellow might not succeed in winning her heart after he himself had passed over to the majority?

He would infinitely have preferred to settle his property upon Leila by way of a marriage settlement, hard as it would be to part from his child; and a year before it would have given him great satisfaction to have seen Captain Byngham come forward and declare himself to be Leila's lover. But now he was not so sure. He had not much liked several things in the Captain's talk, and in his manner, during the present visit.

Found the General finishing his toilet

Unconsciously he had been comparing the Captain with Geoffrey, and Geoffrey had been appearing to great advantage by the side of the selfish, arrogant Byngham; he liked Geoffrey ten times better; but then, Captain Byngham was his own relative, and the idea of a marriage between him and Leila had been in the General's mind ever since Leila was ten years old. So he was by no means prepared to throw Byngham over. And yet he hesitated.

"If you have not made your will," said Geoffrey, "let me urge you to make it at once. You can revoke it at any time, you know."

"I have not made my will," answered the General; "and the worst of it is, I don't know how to make it. But you are quite right. I'll take a run into Plymouth, and see my old friend, Quinton, the solicitor. I'll take his advice about it."

"Why not come with me now as far as Plymouth? To be sure, you will arrive rather early, but——"

"On the contrary, I shall just be in time for breakfast at the 'Duke of Cornwall,'" cried the General, starting to his feet. "Run and order the phaeton. I'll be with you in five minutes."

In less than ten minutes the two travellers were on their way to the railway station. At Plymouth they parted, the General going to the hotel, while Geoffrey, too anxious in mind to care for any breakfast beyond a cup of coffee, pursued his journey to London.

He reached town while the afternoon was yet young; and as he had telegraphed to his friend from Exeter, he was hardly surprised, though he was very much pleased, to see Jack Linton's face peering into the carriage as the train glided alongside the platform at Paddington.

"This is awfully good of you!" he cried, as he jumped out of the carriage and grasped his friend's hand.

"Oh, not at all. I got your telegram; so, as I had nothing particular to do, I thought it might save time if I came on here."

"You have done me a real favour. Now, instead of spending time running half over London, we can go to the hotel and have lunch. I can tell you what I've come up to see you about, and after having a comfortable rest I shall be in time to catch the five o'clock express back."

"You're not going back to Devonshire to-night, Geff?"

"Yes, I am. But come along. I've no luggage."

A cold bath, a good meal, and Jack Linton's society made such a difference in Geoffrey's inner and outer man that he was half inclined to think that he had given himself a good deal of unnecessary trouble in coming so far to consult his friend. The danger to be apprehended did not now seem half so great as it had appeared to be the night before. However, he felt it would be a comfort to talk the thing over.

Throwing himself on a couch by an open window, he took out his cigar case, invited Linton to select one, and then lit one himself.

"Do you remember," he asked, "how I was nearly poisoned—as I supposed—about this time last year?"

Linton stopped in the act of striking a vesta, and looked at his friend curiously.

"I remember it very well," he returned. "You don't mean to say that you have reason to dread another attack of the same kind?"

"Not exactly. But listen."

Geoffrey then went on to tell his friend the whole story, everything that he himself knew, including all that the General had told him, and his conversation with the Rajah. He did not even conceal the fact that he was in love with Leila, in order that his friend might understand that her safety must be the paramount consideration. And he also told him that Captain Byngham, as well as the Rajah, was his rival.

"By Jove!" exclaimed Linton, when the narrative came to an end, "it is difficult to believe that such things as you dread could take place in England at the end of the nineteenth century!"

"You forget that we have to deal with Orientals," said Geoffrey. "Centuries count for little in India."

"True."

"And since I have no evidence against any one—no proof even, that we are in danger, except the anonymous letter—if you can call that proof—I cannot apply to the police."

"No; and they could be of no use if you did apply to them. You can't arrest a man simply because he is a Hindoo, even if a Hindoo did try to murder you twelve months ago. Besides, you say you believe this Rajah to be friendly?"

"I believe so."

"I wonder what he wanted with that letter?" said Linton meditatively. "He can't have touched it up with some chemical, which would destroy the writing in time? Have you it with you?"

"Here it is," said Geoffrey, taking the letter from his pocket.

"It seems all right," said Linton, after closely inspecting the writing. "Besides, I don't see how it could help the conspirators to destroy it, now that you know its contents. No doubt they are very sorry it ever was sent. The writing of it was quite 'too previous,' as the Yankees say."

The train glided alongside the platform.

"It would have come in pretty effectively if I had been lying dead in my chambers, as they naturally thought I was," observed Geoffrey. "But the main point is this—ought I to take the Rajah's advice, and clear out of the country while there is time, or stay with the General and his daughter. Of course I would rather stay with them; but I confess I felt inclined to trust the Rajah, and he seemed to know what he was saying; and then, I thought that perhaps my going away might cause a diversion in the General's favour. They can hardly intend attacking us all this year, unless we are all together under one roof."

Linton took one or two turns up and down the room before replying.

"No," he said at length. "I advise you to follow your natural instinct, and stay at Seacombe Towers—isn't that the name of the house?—till the Tenth of June has gone by. If the Rajah is to be trusted, your staying won't make it any more dangerous for your friends. If he is not to be trusted, obviously his advice is not to be taken.

"Besides, it seems to me that the General, rather than you, is the man in peril—supposing always that they know him to be one of those who destroyed their temple and killed their priests, and that danger is to be apprehended from the Rajah. It was for his sake, certainly, not for yours, that the Rajah went to Seacombe Towers. His visit had been planned before you were so much as invited to stay at the house this summer. No; if I were in your place I should remain in the General's house till the Tenth of June is over."

"Good!" cried Geoffrey, springing to his feet, and throwing the stump of his cigar out of the window. "That's what I should like to do. But it has been a great comfort to me to talk the thing over with you. I'm awfully obliged to you. How long shall you be in town?"

"Till the beginning of August, at all events."

"Then I shall look you up as soon as I get back from Devonshire."

Soon after this the two friends parted, and Geoffrey set out on his return journey.

It was midnight before he reached Plymouth, and there were no local trains that night; but the traveller did not feel inclined to go to a hotel. He had been asleep the greater part of the time since he left London, and felt he should enjoy a long walk in the cool night air. The distance to Seacombe Towers was about fifteen miles, and, by taking a cab for the first four or five miles, he could make sure of reaching his destination in time to finish the night in bed.

To be sure, there was the difficulty that he would have to rouse someone in order to get into the house. But Geoffrey knew that one of the grooms slept in a small room over an outhouse in the rear of the house, and that there was a communication between his bedroom and the interior of the main building; so he felt sure that by awaking the groom he could gain admittance without disturbing anyone else.

The night was fine, and there was a full moon, so Geoffrey found his ten-mile walk delightful. When at last he entered the General's grounds it was broad daylight. By dint of throwing pebbles at the groom's bedroom window, he managed to wake the lad; and in a few minutes he found himself inside the house.

He was passing along one of the corridors on the first floor, his footsteps being quite inaudible on the thick carpeting, when he distinctly saw a shadow flit across the stairs which led to the second floor. Someone, he understood, must have passed before the window which lighted the staircase, or some window above.

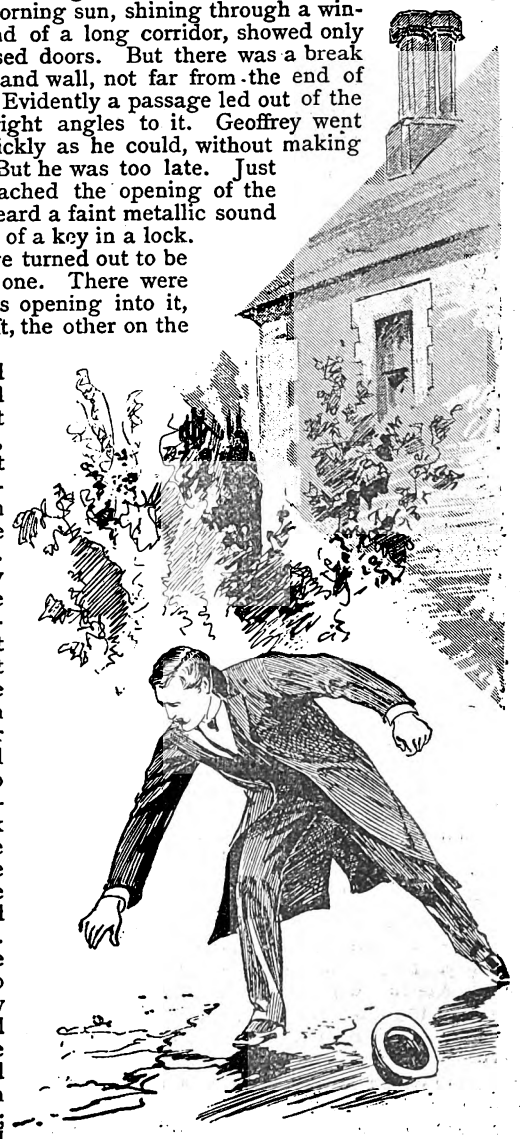
Geoffrey's first thought was that burglars must be in the house. But the idea had barely entered his mind when he saw that it was absurd. He had seen no sign that anything was wrong when he approached the house; and no burglar would be likely to seek the upper floors, where there must be little worth stealing.

With rapid, noiseless steps Geoffrey sped up the stairs.

No one was in sight when he reached the upper landing. The bright morning sun, shining through a window at the end of a long corridor, showed only a row of closed doors. But there was a break in the right-hand wall, not far from the end of the gallery. Evidently a passage led out of the corridor at right angles to it. Geoffrey went along, as quickly as he could, without making any noise. But he was too late. Just before he reached the opening of the passage he heard a faint metallic sound—the turning of a key in a lock.

The passage turned out to be quite a short one. There were only two doors opening into it, one on the left, the other on the right.

Geoffrey had half a mind to knock at these doors, and insist upon the persons within giving some explanation. But clearly this would be an absurd proceeding. It would not take more than ten seconds for the nocturnal wanderer to get into bed—not to speak of the time that might be gained before the door could be opened. Besides, there were two doors. How could he tell which was the one which had just been closed. No; nothing could be gained by making a disturbance at present. But the young man determined that he would be awake and watching at the same hour on the following morning.



By dint of throwing pebbles.

He did not feel quite certain whether he should mention this little incident to the General. It was suspicious, certainly, yet capable of a perfectly innocent explanation. One of the servants, for example, might have been awake, and hearing the noise made by admitting Geoffrey, might have gone downstairs to see what was the matter, and then gone quietly back to bed. On the whole, Geoffrey came to the conclusion that it would be better to say nothing to the General, but content himself with keeping a good look-out next morning.

He met one of the housemaids.

He went to bed, and in three minutes he was fast asleep.

Tired out with his long journey and his walk, Geoffrey slept till late. He was on his way down to breakfast when he met one of the housemaids coming down from the second floor.

"Just come upstairs for a moment," he said to her. "I want to ask you a question about one of the rooms."

Leading her to the end of the short passage which opened out of the corridor, he pointed to the door on the right, and asked:

"Can you tell me whose room that is?"

"That's a lumber-room, sir," answered the girl with a look of surprise. He went on a few steps, and opened the door. The room was quite empty, but for some empty boxes and disused furniture.

He next pointed to the door on the left.

"And do you know who sleeps there?"

"It's one of the Indian gentlemen."

"You don't mean the Rajah?"

"Oh, no, sir; it's the one they call Mr. Sen."

CHAPTER VII.

SIR ARTHUR VISITS HIS LAWYER.

MR. SILAS QUINTON, Sir Arthur Chetwynd's solicitor, might have been taken for the head of a large and prosperous retail business, for an auctioneer or a horse-doctor, or a minister of an unusually cheerful type—for anything rather than a lawyer. His little, sunburnt, beardless face was perpetually wreathed in smiles.

He wore a suit of rather shabby black clothes, an old-fashioned stuck-up collar, and an enormous gold watch secured by an antique watch-ribbon. His hat was always inclined towards the back of his head, sometimes towards the left as well. He was fond of standing with his small legs pretty far apart, his hands under his coat-tails, and his head stuck on one side.

But with all his oddity, and with all his simplicity of character, Silas Quinton was a first-rate man of business, and an excellent lawyer. Some few men were able to boast that they had got the better of Mr. Quinton in a business transaction; but no man was ever heard to say that he had circumvented him twice.

As the General was aware, Mr. Quinton kept early hours. Soon after nine he called at the office; and he had not to wait long before the solicitor made his appearance.

"You are very early in town, Sir Arthur," said he, as he shook hands. "Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"Nothing whatever. Only, I have been reminded that I have never yet made my will; and I have decided to get it done at once."

"Quite right, my dear sir. Better attend to all those things while we are in full health, and have plenty of time to attend to it."

"I don't know that I have much time, Mr. Quinton. I have a particular reason for wishing to get the thing done to-day, or to-morrow at latest."

"I daresay it can be managed," said Mr. Quinton, as he took a sheet of foolscap from a drawer, and made a memorandum in one corner of it.

"My chief difficulty," said Sir Arthur Chetwynd, slowly, "is that, having no sons, my daughter must be my heiress; and yet I have made up my mind not to leave the bulk of my property to her by will. That means, in all probability, adopting some man whom I have never seen as my heir. My idea is to provide a small annuity to my daughter in any event, and to leave the bulk of what I have to her, on condition that she marries a man of my choosing or remains unmarried. Can that be managed?"

"In an indirect way it can. But, my dear General, suppose your daughter were to meet with a perfectly eligible suitor some time after your death?"

"Then I should wish her to have a moderate income—say five hundred a year. Don't begin protesting, my dear sir, my mind is quite made up. If the eligible suitor who turns up after I am gone is a rich man he won't want money with his wife. If he is a poor man, he will think five hundred a year a very fair dowry."

"Perhaps. But Miss Chetwynd? Won't it be rather hard upon her?"

"If she does not think the eligible suitor worth the sacrifice she needn't have him," said the General.

It was plain to Mr. Quinton that the old campaigner was absurdly jealous of this supposed husband who was to step into his shoes some day.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said he after a pause. "I'll authorise my trustees to pay my daughter a yearly sum equal to any independent income her husband may possess beyond five hundred a year. If she marries a man of substance she will keep the bulk of her income; if she marries a poor man she will have a small but sufficient income. In either case there will be no great temptation for fortune-hunters."

Mr Silas Quinton.

"Unto him that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance," was the quotation that occurred to the lawyer, but he did not utter it.

"And the bulk of the property — in case your daughter marries a poor man or dies without issue?"

"I should like it to be spent in building and endowing schools for the sons and daughters of officers in the army," said the General, after a pause.

The lawyer answered by a bow. He was busy jotting down the General's instructions, and there was silence in the room for some minutes.

"I suppose," said Sir Arthur carelessly, "if I write to any one who may ask for my daughter's hand, and give my consent to the marriage, that would be sufficient to secure to them the whole of my property?"

"Yes, it would. But, to prevent misunderstandings, it may be as well to give notice of your approval to the trustees. By the way, who are to be the trustees?"

Bumpus.

"Yourself, for one, if you will accept the trust. I couldn't have a better man."

Mr. Quinton bowed gravely, but with a very pleased look in his eyes.

"For the others, Lieutenant Stoddart, of the Royal Navy; and my neighbour, Lord Lavington. I got his consent in joke one evening after dinner; but, by Jove, I'll keep him to his bargain."

"This will be an awkward will to draw," said Mr. Quinton, regarding his sheet of instructions with his head very much on one side, and a look of dissatisfaction on his jolly face. "However, I daresay Mr. Bumpus will be able to put it into shape for us."

"Who's he?"

"Bumpus? He's a clever conveyancing counsel, who does most of my London agent's work."

"Then you mean to send that will to London?"

"Certainly."

"And how long will that take—I mean, how long will it be before it can be ready for signature?"

"Oh, ten days; perhaps a fortnight."

"But that won't do at all, Quinton," said the General earnestly. "I have a particular reason for having my will made in the course of to-morrow, or next day at farthest. I would prefer that it should be to-morrow."

"But it's impossible. Who's to draw it?"

"Draw it yourself."

Mr. Quinton shook his head.

"I've drawn plenty of wills," he said, "but in a case of this importance—— However, I will draw it myself in the meantime. You can sign it, and then it can be submitted to counsel; and if he doesn't think it carries out your wishes beyond the possibility of a doubt, he can draw it over again."

"Very good. Please yourself about that. Only I want to sign the thing to-morrow."

"It would be easier," said the lawyer in a jocular tone, still looking at the memoranda before him, "to deal with the matter by way of marriage settlement; but I suppose that is impossible?"

The General fidgeted in his chair.

"The fact is," said he, "I delayed making a will partly for that very reason. I would prefer greatly that my daughter should be married before my death; but my cousin——"

He stopped himself.

Mr. Quinton looked at him curiously; but the General said no more.

The solicitor considered for a moment, and then put the question he had in his mind:

"As I am to be one of your daughter's trustees, Sir Arthur, I confess I should like to know whether these elaborate precautions have any special aim? In a word—is there any person whom you object to Miss Chetwynd marrying?"

Digitized by Google

"No," answered the General, pulling his moustache thoughtfully; "I can't say that there is. I had long thought my cousin, Captain Byngham, and she might make a match of it——"

"Captain Byngham!"

"Yes. Why not?"

"I am glad I spoke; otherwise I might have misunderstood you altogether. The fact is, I was under the impression that you particularly wished to forbid or prevent, as far as was in your power, your daughter from marrying Captain Byngham. Or, at least, that you wished to prevent his getting any considerable fortune if he succeeded in persuading Miss Chetwynd to have him."

"That was not in my mind. But what made you imagine such a thing? Do you know Captain Byngham?"

"No; I do not. But the provisions of your will seemed aimed at someone who might wish to marry your daughter for her money. You know, I suppose, that your cousin will have to part with his estate in Yorkshire?"

"What!" cried the General, starting, and bending forward in his chair.

Mr. Quinton nodded.

"I know it for a fact," said he; "for the solicitors for the third mortgagees——"

"My cousin never mortgaged the Crosdale property!"

"Indeed you are mistaken, General. As I was saying, the solicitors acting for some of the mortgagees tried to get a client of mine to pay them off, and take a transfer of their mortgage; but as it was only a third mortgage, I advised him to have nothing to do with it. That was some time ago. I believe all the mortgagees have given the usual notices; and the property must be sold shortly. My belief is, it won't realise the money advanced, with interest and costs."

"What!" cried the General.

"So my cousin, Captain Byngham, is practically ruined?"

"Unless he has other resources, of which I know nothing."

The General's face had grown very dark within the last minute or two, and not without reason. More than once since his arrival at Seacombe Towers, Captain Byngham had spoken as if Crosdale were still his own in every sense of the word. He had deliberately thrown dust in Sir Arthur's eyes; and the General had no doubt that his intention had been to conceal his difficulties till he could get married to Leila, and then pay off his mortgages with his—the General's—money.

Now, this scheme did not at all recommend itself to Sir Arthur's mind. And it was not merely the fact that his cousin was poor that weighed with him. If the Captain had become penniless through no fault of his own, Sir Arthur might have hesitated about giving his consent to the match, but he would hardly have forbidden it (considering the relationship) if Leila had been bent on marrying her cousin. But Sir Arthur was convinced that Captain Byngham must have been recklessly extravagant, if not worse. And, besides, his sense of honour revolted from the deception (as he considered it) which the Captain had practised.

"My mind is made up," said the General abruptly, sitting bolt upright in his chair, and folding his arms across his breast. "I see that Captain Byngham is no fit husband for my daughter. He has never asked her, so far as I know; but it is well to be prepared for what might happen after my death. Please strike out what you have written—all these troublesome precautions—and put this down:

"All my property goes to my trustees. If my daughter remains unmarried, or marries with my consent or that of my trustees, the income is to go to her for her life, and to her husband if he survives her—the capital to her children, or, if she has none, to the founding of the Schools. But if she marries without my consent, or yours, she is merely to have an annuity of three hundred a year."

"That won't be enough temptation for a man like Byngham."

"And you had better put him down for an annuity of two hundred, paid quarterly. He may come to poverty, poor fellow. I shouldn't like him to starve. But the annuity is to cease if he marries my daughter without my consent, or that of my trustees. That's plain enough, I think?"

"Perfectly clear and plain; and, if I may say so, a very sensible will to make. But, if you desire your trustees not to consent to a marriage between your daughter and Captain Byngham, you had better give us these instructions in writing."

"Very good. I will write the letter now, and date it to-morrow. Can you let me have a sheet of paper? It is, as you say, advisable to have it down in black and white."

The letter was written; and then the General added a few instructions for legacies to servants and to local charities, besides a thousand pounds to Geoffrey Dundas.

"When can you let me have the will for signature?" he said finally, rising as he spoke.

"It will be ready by noon to-morrow."

"Then you had better send it by train to Torwyn—that's our nearest station. If you will let your clerk give it to the guard of the 1.40 train, I will send over to Torwyn for it. Then I can sign it the same afternoon, and send it back to you by post. I had rather you kept it in your safe."

Mr. Quinton promised that the will should be despatched by the specified train without fail; and the General, having finished his business at Plymouth, went home by the next train.

A HALT at DAWN.

MARGARET DANVERS stepped into the Edinburgh express one stormy March evening, and as she walked composedly to her seat in the middle of the corridor train, the eyes of every person present were riveted upon her. She wore a closely-fitting garment of Russian sable, which enveloped her completely, and a large beaver hat with drooping plumes, and from the single fine diamond flashing at her throat to the tips of her dainty Suéde boots she looked the model of a fashionable beauty.

She was the only woman in the carriage, and before she had settled herself comfortably, all the men had mentally pronounced their opinion of her looks and style, and hazarded a conjecture as to her age. Her attendant, a florid man of middle age, received the slight degree of attention justified by his seeming only an adjunct of the moment. As he left her, he put into her hands a bunch of costly roses, which she received with a smile, and laid upon the opposite seat the instant he was gone.

Of the score of passengers, two or three knew her by sight, for she was, in a way, a public character; but, as it happened, none were really acquainted with her, and before long, even those most deeply interested in her appearance yielded to the apathy peculiar to railway travellers at night, and subsided into their newspapers or their rugs, preparing to wear out the evening hours.

Margaret amused herself in watching the flying snow, and in reverie. Too used to travelling to even care to look about her, she yielded to the prevailing somnambulistic influence, just enough to dream without sleeping.

At first, there was in her mind a confusion of events—past, present, and to come. Incidents of no importance mingled with greater ones, and her reflections became mixed with little fanciful suggestions of things long since forgotten, or, rather, voluntarily put out of mind.

She tried to think of her career, to recall her triumphs, and to dwell upon the possibilities of the future. She told herself that music was her life, that all she had to do with was the beautiful and the divine in art, and that the every-day existence she had struggled to rise above was, henceforth, nothing more than an unpleasant memory.

At twenty-eight she was her own mistress, earning an independent income through the use of her beautiful voice. The teaching days and the drudgery of the class-room had passed, and as a concert singer she was already famous. After a successful winter in London, she was now upon her way to fulfil several provincial engagements, which promised more than anything in which she had yet engaged. She was in the heyday of her powers; admired, in radiant health, conscious of her beauty and talent, and entirely satisfied with life.

What did it mean that, as she looked from the window with a proud smile upon her lips, some tantalising thoughts would intrude themselves, and the mind, so entirely self-poised, should feel, for the first time in years, the weakening influence of some emotional fancies? It was her boast that she was never lonely, never sad; that her whole heart was in her work.

In front two men were talking.

"Never saw a promise of a worse storm," said one. "Shouldn't wonder if the line was blocked as we go farther north."

"Comes from the north-east," suggested the other. "If necessary, they'll put on another engine. We're bound to go through on this train, that's one comfort."

By nine o'clock Margaret, enveloped in a downy wrapper of dark red, lay back on the cushions courting sleep. Over her was spread the fur ulster, none too warm above the rugs, even for her warm blood. The thermometer outside was standing below zero, and whiffs of icy air found their way every now and then into the carriage.

Everything was quiet save her thoughts, which began to utter themselves with loud, importunate voices, as if answering some call without, independent of her control.

"I have happily been able to say all my life that I didn't know what nerves were," said Margaret to herself, "but I begin to think that from some inexplicable cause I am nervous."

"Richard Allen!"

She started as if the words had been spoken in her ear. Swiftly memory flew back ten years, and she saw herself standing bareheaded at the gate of her father's house in the Highlands, where her childhood had been passed; and beside her, bending tenderly to catch her lightest word, the form of her first lover, then a poor, obscure young lieutenant in the army.

With an indifference scarce tinged with pity, since it hardly occurred to her in those days that men could really feel, she had met his pleading affection with an enthusiastic outburst of her ambition to lead the artiste's life, to spend her energies in self-development, and show what a woman wholly devoted to an intellectual and artistic life might become.

"You must not think that I am deficient in womanly sensibility," she had said to him, with one of those soft glances, of the meaning and effect of which she was entirely careless and unconscious. "But some women must remain spinsters, you know, and I think I am meant to be one of the sisterhood."

"You do not know yourself. The day will come when ambition will seem nothing to you; then the homely things, the real things, will take on their true value to your eyes, and a 'career' will seem a mere artificiality that has nothing to do with what is best and sweetest in life."

The words had passed her by as an idle phrase, evoked from disappointment. And she and Richard Allen had parted, he going to his post on the line in India, and she to Italy to study. And yet nothing passes from us entirely.

Here, without warning, without her intention, the little scene came up before her eyes; and she saw again the apple-orchard in blossom, the red brick chimneys of the school across the way looming up in the moonlight, the hills in the distance, the strong, proudly-carried figure at her side. And then scene after scene came up before her, always with the two figures present—the manly, devoted lover, the self-absorbed girl.

She tried to be cynical, to laugh, to think of something else; she tried her best to get to sleep, but only her will could sleep, and fancy still rioted. Richard Allen had had the making of a fine man in him: what had become of him—why had nothing been heard of him? The woman whose religion was success, had little patience with patience; it seemed to her that all virtue was embodied in some sort of action.

A man, who at forty—he must be forty—was still obscure, was not worth a thought. And yet he had possessed a sort of strength she had been forced to admire in old times—a suggested moral superiority—a higher point of view than she considered practical. If he had brought himself to live up to his own standard, he must have been unable to make necessary concessions.

And then, as Margaret recalled some "concessions" she had herself made to success, she felt her cheeks burn in the darkness. How often she had traded upon her own attractions; how often made use of the influence of her personality to bring about certain ends! If she had not lied in words, she had in acts. Her present status had not been attained without some sacrifice of scruples.

Long after midnight she lost consciousness, and passed an hour in fitful slumber. It was cruel that she should have to dream of Richard Allen; dream that they were together in an open boat drifting out to sea, and that his arms were round her, his eyes looking into hers. And she cared for nothing, thought of nothing, but that he held her close—how strangely sweet it was!——

A jar, a shock, a sudden stop, as if the train had run against a wall of rock, and Margaret started up and drew the curtains aside instinctively. A fall through space—what was it, oh, where was she? Had the train fallen down an embankment?

After a minute she realised that she had been thrown from her seat across the corridor; that other persons lay about, some groaning, some hastily picking themselves up. She shut her eyes; there was a sharp pain in her left arm, and a weight upon her side. A falling lamp had struck her, and from some cause she could not rise; her leg must be broken. There was a terrible confusion, much talking, and half-a-dozen people bending over her pityingly and asking her questions.

"What has happened? Is anyone killed?" she asked.

Several persons answered at once. They had run into a goods train. The engine driver on the express was killed; no one else. Many were hurt. Could she bear to be moved?

"I must," she returned, setting her lips, for agonising pains began to shoot through her foot, and the thought of being touched was suffering.

"Fortunately we are just on the outskirts of Frith—there are houses near."

It was the guard who spoke now, and he at once took charge. She was lifted carefully, wrapped in rugs, and carried out. Their carriage had sustained less damage than any other, being in the rear, and there was no difficulty in getting free.

"If she could stand it to be taken over yonder," said someone, pointing to a house some distance away, "she'd be more comfortable, I think."

"Where are we?" asked Margaret, bravely, suppressing her pain.

"Somewhere across the border—a little town called Frith," a man answered her.

"If she could stand it to be taken over to the doctor's house," said the persistent first speaker.

"I can stand it," she interposed. "Take me there quickly."

They improvised a sort of rough litter of carriage seats, and carried her across a field in the open country. The dawn was just breaking, and the pale moon was slowly fading out of sight before the great coming light.

The air was clear, cold, and crisp; and, though there had evidently been a heavy storm during the night, it had cleared completely, and the first ray of sunlight glittered upon banks of frozen snow.

The house before which they stopped was a plain, two-storeyed structure of brick, which seemed at first sight, peculiarly barren-looking. Clean white curtains hung in straight folds at the windows.

The door had been drab in colour; but the paint had been so assiduously scrubbed that one now took its presence on trust. There was a brass knocker and a rush door-mat, on which lay a large black cat with bristling white whiskers.

The door was opened by a girl, whose starched cap and apron suggested careful housekeeping, as her suspicious countenance suggested inhospitality. She made no objections to admitting them, however, and Margaret was carefully deposited upon a couch in the sitting-room, to wait the coming of the doctor, who, the maid said, had just left the house to go to the scene of the wreck.

"We'll send him back to you, ma'am," one of the men assured her. "You ought to be 'tended to first."

The ungenial-looking maid proved herself to be not deficient in skill, even though sympathy was, in a measure, lacking. She made her guest as comfortable as she could. The shoe was cut from the swollen ankle, which was bathed and bandaged, and the hurts upon the shoulder and side were pronounced to be only bruises, which "the doctor would soon make all right." And then Margaret was left to herself while the girl went to make the inevitable "cup of tea" which was to set everything straight.

At first she lay perfectly still, seeing nothing and caring for nothing. Her mind was full of vexation and impatience over an accident which must delay the fulfilment of her engagement. It did not occur to her that it might have been worse; anything was bad enough.

After a while her eyes began to wander idly round the room. It seemed half sitting-room, half study. Folding doors divided it from the consulting-room at the back. There was a book-case, well filled; some good engravings on the walls; a few easy-chairs, covered with raw silk of a dull hue, much worn; and a writing-table between the windows, half covered with books and magazines. There was something agreeable to her taste in the air of the room. She could imagine it the abode of a man whose very poverty would never become squalid.

Upon the mantelpiece were a bronze clock and a pair of fine vases, dainty in tone and finish; they were the sole womanly touches about the place. Noting these details half indifferently, she lay back again and closed her eyes.

When she opened them again, they happened to glance directly over to a corner of the room which had before been dim, but was now illuminated by a shaft of sunlight. A carved bracket hung there, and on the shelf lay a singular-looking little instrument, shaped like a dagger, of Moorish device, the handle inlaid with gold, left rough and unpolished.

When Margaret saw this small object, she gave a little cry and tried to rise, but finding that impossible, she dropped back upon her pillows as if she had been shot, her eyes fixed upon the little instrument with a look of recognition that was half pleasure, half alarm. What strange trick was fate about to play her? How could this thing be possible?

There was a noise; the front door opened, and someone came along the hall with a firm, measured step. Margaret's heart, that well-regulated organ, beat to suffocation. She hardly dared listen or look. She threw her arm up over her forehead, nearly concealing her face. Someone entered the room, and paused beside her.

A well-remembered voice, graver, deeper than of yore, yet with a cheery ring in it, said, "Let me see what I can do to help you, madam." A chair was drawn up to the side of the couch, a gentle hand took her own. Her pulse was beating furiously; the hand was held rather long, as if something perplexed him. She felt searching eyes bent upon her face, and suddenly threw down her arm. The doctor drew back, his face turning pale, and the two looked at each other for a minute in silence. She spoke first, putting out her hand timidly.

"Richard, don't you remember me?"

"Remember you? As if I were likely ever to forget you."

She softly touched his empty left sleeve, pinned over his breast, two tears standing in her eyes.

"In Afghanistan," he said. "I have got over minding it. Don't cry."

"You left the army?"

"Yes, four years ago. My health gave way. I studied medicine in India, was invited here by an old friend to become his assistant, and shortly afterwards he died. That is all."

"You never—never——"

"Yes; I married."

The words were an unexpected stab. Margaret gasped, amazed that she should care. Her face suddenly became suffused with colour, and she turned it away.

"She only lived a year, Margaret," said the doctor, bending down to study the fair flushed face suddenly pain-smitten.

"My arm!" said Margaret faintly, drawing his attention to the lesser hurt.

He was the doctor again at once, and for the next half-hour all professional gravity, and as impersonal as the sphinx; yet the woman felt through every nerve, like a musical vibration, the thrill of his firm warm fingers, the scrutiny of his eyes.

He was changed, worn through suffering rather than years, his face lined, his hair grown grey; with nothing young about him but his eyes, which sparkled with a cheer and brightness no grief could dim, for they mirrored a mind above all personal considerations, concerned with those large loving interests belonging to humanity.

The doctor came and went quietly, her eyes following him. When he intercepted the look she blushed like a school-girl. Too busy all that day to give her more than necessary attention, he yet lost nothing that passed, and she had a sense which was oddly pleasant that he understood something of what was passing in her mind. It was terrible too.

There were moments when she wished herself miles away. Besides all the physical pain which she endured that long day, Margaret's soul was the battle-ground of a struggle far more exhausting. Ambition, pride, and love of the world fought hard against a tender, newly-born impulse, which it seemed that a single breath of reason ought to chill to death.

The coals burned red in the grate; a little tea-table was set in the middle of the room, and in the easiest chair in the house, piled with all the available cushions, the doctor placed Margaret, taking his position opposite her. The solemn girl brought in supper, which was well cooked and served with a scrupulous cleanliness that almost atoned for the absence of a more dainty service.

The doctor's face shone with satisfaction, but his manner although genial, was ceremonious. Margaret felt that, in the few feet intervening between them, there lay years of care and grief and disappointment. She felt a yearning to bridge the chasm, to draw nearer to him, even though she herself had to take the hard steps towards understanding.

Thought the woman: "Does he love me still?" And, thought the man: "Is she tired of the world, and could she learn to love me now?"

But they spoke of music; of camp life on the Eastern frontier; of what they had seen, what they had read. Not a word of what they felt. A few hours later, the doctor stood in his bare soldier's bed-room, and looked in his glass. For five minutes he studied himself, and then he turned away, resolved to let no new hope spring up in his heart But Margaret slept to dream of him, woke through the night, thinking of him, as she could not have thought in the old days, when he wooed her in the confidence of his fresh, hopeful youth.

There was no hotel in the village, and the few scattered houses were crowded with the wounded passengers, waiting until they were well enough to proceed with their journey. Margaret was not sorry that there was no other place for her, than the refuge she had been taken to. "I am thinking that I am singularly fortunate in being in the doctor's house, where I get special attention," she said to him, with a little fluttering smile.

In time these shy looks wrought upon the doctor, and his stern resolution wavered. He found himself sounding her preferences and attachments, with the unconfessed design of extracting some unguarded word that might indicate a change in her old convictions. Carrying on together these two processes—determination to refrain and resolution to pursue, which often accompanies some course of action embraced in accordance with a natural, unworldly judgment, he managed to betray to the eager girl all he wished to conceal and she wished to know.

She had telegraphed to Edinburgh that she would be there in ten days. Four of them had passed, and she was free from pain and able to put her foot to the ground. The doctor persisted in helping her from the couch to the chair and back again.

"But I can walk alone now," she objected.

"We must be careful. Not until to-morrow."

She protested with greater earnestness.

"True, I have but one arm," he said, with the first accent of bitterness she had heard from him. Her lips parted to give utterance to a sudden rush of words, but she only looked at him, with eyes so eloquent that he answered the look.

"Margaret, do you care? Dear, I have always loved you, I love you now—can you care?"

She drooped her head on his shoulder, but said nothing. The doctor held her close for a minute, and then, leaving her, began to walk up and down the room.

"It is impossible."

"It may be impossible," murmured Margaret, with a little blush, "but it is true."

"It is cruel to ask it, dear. You are young, beautiful, brilliant—with success at your feet, and I——"

She put up her hand imploringly. It was caught and held. "And I am poor, obscure, and—old," he finished, his eyes upon her face.

"I have come to you, Richard. It seems strange to me, I cannot explain it; but it seems as if everything the world has to offer me is nothing beside——"

"Beside my love?" he bent on one knee beside her chair and put her hand to his lips.

"I want to share your life," she said, and a new expression grew upon her face; a high, devoted look which was half heroic, all womanly. "I want to learn something of the great things, the true things."

"You have had greater things than I can give you. Think of all you are leaving!"

She made a gesture of renunciation. "It does not seem much to leave——for you."

"Ah, my darling, I am afraid you will regret it. The work-a-day world will be a trial to you. And mine is a veritable work-a-day world."

He kept his eyes on her face, half dreading to see her shrink away. But what woman is not won by an appearance of self-renunciation? Richard could not have let her go now. At the last instant he would have snatched her to his breast, had she drawn away. But the misgiving that rushed over him so fiercely was a real one, a sensible one. He felt it profoundly, and tried to read in her eyes a shadow of this coming regret. But her eyes were clear, loving, radiant. She pressed herself against his breast, and gave him the great gift of her life and her future. Would the shadow ever come?

The moon looked softly in an hour later, and, finding the lovers in that delicious dream which once in a lifetime comes to most men and women, drew over her face a grey cloud-veil, and left them to dream on.

FAR beyond the lights of the château, where the Countess de L—— was receiving the tributes of the most noble families of France, stood two persons. One was Mme. D'Abrant and the other Louis Condrac.

"Thank heaven, Clarette, we are alone for a moment. I began to think you could never get away."

"So I thought also; my husband grows more and more suspicious every day. I have hardly been out of his sight for a week."

"Oh, my poor, poor darling! How you can stand it I could never see. Clarette, why don't you do as I have wished? I have asked you, begged you, again and again, to leave this man who is so odious to you. Come with me. Surely, you love me enough to dare to attempt this?"

"Yes, Louis, I love you," she answered, taking both his hands in hers; "love you more than words can tell, and you know it, dear. Yet when I think of this—of leaving him—my husband—oh, I don't know——What was that?" she whispered, breathlessly. "I thought I heard a step on the gravel."

"There is nothing there," answered Condrac. "See, the whole path lies bathed in the moonlight."

"I could have sworn—but perhaps there was nothing. It is too late for me to stay longer; we shall be missed——"

"Promise me, Clarette, before you go, that you will leave this hateful man, and become mine for ever. Darling, will you promise?"

She extended her arms and whispered:

"Yes, Louis, I will."

"Scoundrel!" shouted a hoarse voice, as, white with passion, M. D'Abrant sprang into the pathway confronting Condrac "Rascal! Villain! Dog!"

There was a short struggle; the two men fell to the ground. Then came a flash, the report of a pistol, and Louis Condrac rose pale and trembling, with the perspiration rolling in great drops from his forehead.

. . . . . .

The celebrated trial was ended at last, and Louis Condrac was found guilty. There had been but two witnesses, Mme. D'Abrant, who swore that she had heard the pistol shot, and hastening to the spot had found her husband alone and dead; and the officer of the police, who had seen Condrac leaving the grounds of the château.

Other evidence than this there was none; no sound had been heard by the guests at the château. The weapon used could not be identified as Condrac's, and all through the trial Condrac had protested his innocence. Popular sympathy was with him, for D'Abrant was disliked by everyone; but justice could not be satisfied by this, and Condrac was condemned to die.

. . . . . .

The first faint beams of light gilded the sombre walls of the huge prison-house. The day will pass quickly, and when the sun rises again the massive gates will be thrown open, and Louis Condrac will walk forth for the last time on earth.

In his cell the prisoner paced rapidly to and fro in great mental anxiety. Then, stopping, he looked round at the huge walls and unyielding bars, at the heavy locks, at the convict who had been placed in the cell to bear him company in his last hours—and then—throwing himself upon his cot, fell into a troubled sleep.

Waking suddenly he rushed to the bars, and shouted loudly to the keeper:

"Tell M. le Commandant that I must see him at once—that I have important news to tell him."

It seemed to Condrac, sitting on the edge of his cot, almost an eternity before he returned.

"Well, M. Condrac," exclaimed the commandant as he entered, "is there anything I can do for you this morning?"

"Sir," began Louis nervously, as he started up, "you know that I have always asserted my innocence. It was true that I loved the wife of M. D'Abrant, yet, knowing this, what possible benefit could I achieve by killing him? None at all. You have yourself believed me to be innocent, and for that I thank you.

"All last night I paced my cell in despair, as yonder poor wretch can testify.

"Wearied with the exertion, I threw myself on the bed and fell into a deep sleep. I thought that I mounted the fatal scaffold; the sea of faces surrounded me.

"Suddenly, a man standing at the foot of the steps cried out, in a loud voice: 'Look! Behold the murderer of Monsieur D'Abrant!' so vivid was the dream that I can see him as well as if he stood before me now.

"He was of a very pale complexion, wore a light grey suit, with a pink and white tie. In his button-hole was a flower, which was white. He had a silk hat, gloves and gaiters; his hair was dark, and he had a trimmed beard tinged with grey. It was so real that I cannot rid myself of the impression that it made."

"Still, M. Condrac, I am unable to aid you. Although I do not believe you guilty, I see no way to save you. If you wish to see me again during the day, or if there is anything more that I can do for you, let me know."

As the cell-door closed heavily behind him, Louis Condrac breathed a sigh, almost, one would think, of relief.

. . . . . .

The morning of the execution! The bell has already begun to toll, and the spectators are getting impatient. Ah! the prison doors swing open, and the crowd peers forward eagerly to get a view of the prisoner. At each side walks a gendarme; a clergyman in his robes precedes him, reading the last petition for mercy.

As Condrac mounts the platform he turns, staggers backward, and almost shrieks out:

"Look! Behold the murderer of M. D'Abrant!"

The commandant, though not a superstitious man, turns pale as he hears the words of the dream.

"There! He stands before you! The murderer!"

At the foot of the scaffold stood a man, dressed in grey, exactly as Condrac had described. The commandant leaped down from the platform, and seized the stranger roughly. The man, who was white and trembling at the words of Condrac, broke down.

"It is true," he cried, "all too true, that I, and I alone, am the murderer of M. D'Abrant. See! Here are the letters and papers saturated with blood, that I had only time to secure. Hearing steps, I turned and fled. What fatal impulse has led me here I know not. But I pray you have mercy on me, a poor, guilty wretch!"

And the miserable man fell upon his knees, tears streaming down his face.

A great shout came up from the excited crowd. "Let Condrac go! Condrac is innocent! Free him! Release him!" One, more agile than the rest, sprang upon the scaffold, and with a single thrust cut the bonds.

Pressing his hand to his head Condrac walked down into the crowd as one dazed. They, more interested in the new prisoner than the old one, let him pass by unmolested and he disappeared. Nor was he ever seen again. Three days later the self-betrayed criminal was examined before the officers of the police.

It was Mme. D'Abrant.

Curious Experiments IN CORPULENCY

"A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderate lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2 lb. to even 12 lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetal knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

"Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, price 4d. stamps) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drank as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2 lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for his book, which can be obtained through booksellers, or at the address given above."—Leeds Times, December 1, 1894.

"We were reading in the 'Penny Illustrated Paper' how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

ALL THROUGH ONE GATE.

LET us fancy a state of affairs like this: Suppose that nothing to eat could be raised or produced in England; suppose a war, in which all the ports of England were so effectively and continuously blockaded that no food whatever could be imported for a year. What would become of the people? At best only a few could leave the country; the vast majority must remain. The question answers itself. Such a situation is not likely to occur; God forbid that it ever should, but the grim fancy may teach some of us a lesson that we can use to advantage.

For example, a lady is speaking of an occasion when she was very ill. What her ailment was she did not know. It first appeared in November, 1890. Up to that time she says she had been healthy and strong; never needed a doctor. At that time she felt, not so much that she had been attacked by illness as that she had lapsed into it. She was languid, tired, and weak, without perceiving any reason why she should be so. "At first," she says, "my appetite failed me, and I had no desire for food. I could partake only of liquids, and after the simplest diet I had great pain at the chest. Sometimes I was seized with giddiness, and had pain across the forehead and temples.

"I became so low and weak that I was confined to my room for a fortnight, and could barely walk across the floor. I continued to grow worse, losing strength daily. In the early part of December, 1890, I thought I would try a medicine that had greatly benefited my two daughters, one of whom had suffered from weakness and indigestion, and the other from poorness of the blood.

"The name of the medicine is Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and I procured it from Mr. Shirtcliff, the chemist, in Goldhawk Road. After I had taken the Syrup two days I found myself a little better. My appetite returned, and what I ate digested and gave me strength. By the time I had taken two bottles I was completely cured, and have since been in the best of health, not requiring medicine of any kind. I have recommended Mother Seigel's Syrup to many of my friends, and they have found benefit from its use If by publishing this letter other sufferers may come to know of the curative powers of this medicine, you are at liberty to make it public. I will answer any inquiries. Yours truly (Signed) Mrs. S. Buckingham, 23, Oaklands Grove, Shepherd's Bush, London, September 16th, 1892."

The reader will notice that Mrs. Buckingham speaks of her two daughters, one of whom had been cured of weakness and indigestion, and the other of poorness of the blood, by the Syrup. On this point we merely desire to suggest that both the young ladies were (as their mother knew) troubled with the same complaint—one perhaps in a stage a trifle more advanced than the other. Poverty of the blood means simply a lack in it of the vital elements, which food alone can supply; and no food can supply them unless it is perfectly digested. Thousands of women are thus afflicted, and are being constantly saved by the effect of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup on the stomach and the other digestive organs.

Then, what do we make of the illustration which introduces this article? This: The human body is like the population of a great country—it must be fed. Every muscle, bone, and bit of flesh is merely food altered into that form by the digestion. Yes; even more than this. Our illustration goes deeper than we thought. While it is not supposable that England could fail of assistance from her own soil, the human body in no way helps itself. All its support must come from the outside, and all pass through one gate—the stomach.

We thus see the great work done by the Syrup in keeping this gate always open and available.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 329.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 20, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Only a Story

NO one would ever have imagined that the Hon. Douglas Shilletoe, author, humourist, raconteur, and cosmopolitan that he was, loitered on at Eastbourne for the express and only purpose of telling a young lady that he loved her. His intention at first was to remain only two weeks, and then go back to town. He was introduced to the Dinsmores, and promptly fell in love with Mabel Dinsmore, and stayed where he was.

Miss Dinsmore's manner indicated that she tolerated the Hon. Shilletoe's attentions, but that was all. He was a general favourite in the hotel, and his anecdotes and good-humour always made him a most desirable guest at one's table. He was never at a loss for something appropriate to relate. His stories were generally introduced with this short preface, "That reminds me," &c. Everybody would crowd round him except Miss Dinsmore, and evince by hearty laughter genuine appreciation of his anecdotes.

Mabel Dinsmore, however, had ideas which her parents considered more romantic than practical. These ideas had the effect of driving away young men. She measured them by her romantic standard, and invariably found them wanting.

"The men of to-day are negative, and never achieve anything great," she said in sadness to her parents. "Why should I be sacrificed to the modern society men? He knows how to lead a cotillon and how to drive tandem. But how few of them would do anything heroic? and least of all such a man as the Hon. Shilletoe."

However, our hero was in a gay humour the evening he called at the Dinsmore cottage to challenge his fate. The cold hauteur of Miss Dinsmore as she entered the drawing-room did not check the exuberant feeling in him. He related an anecdote of club life, but the young lady did not smile.

"I fear you do not understand me, Miss Dinsmore, any more than you appreciate my poor jokes," he said, rising and looking out of the window.

All Rights Reserved.

"I belong to a Browning Club, and have assisted in unravelling many alleged riddles," she replied, half laughing.

"I hope I am not as complex as Browning?"

"Oh, no; your anecdotes are all newspaper prose. They are for the masses. I confess that my father and mother often recall your jokes after you are gone and laugh heartily. They will miss you when you go."

"Will you miss me?"

"No."

He was silent for a moment and began in a broken voice: "I came to tell you that I loved you. I shall go away and never speak to you on the subject again. Once I thought of relating to you something——"

"That reminded you, no doubt, of this episode in your career; I really begin to appreciate your humour. It is equal to any occasion. For once I desire to hear your joke, and when the climax is reached I trust you will give me the proper cue so that I can join you in laughter."

He left his position by the window and sat down by the centre table. A bouquet of roses in a china vase filled the room with sweet fragrance. Carelessly picking out a large rose he held it in his right hand, slowly turning it round between his first and second fingers.

He began to speak in a low voice: "There is a page in every man's history which he wishes to conceal from the public. Miss Dinsmore, I was once almost as melancholy as Manfred. I was born in America, in an unhealthy locality, and my boyhood was one of chills and fevers. I shall pass over the vain struggle I engaged in to acquire health and education.

"At the age of nineteen I was thin, almost emaciated, and my parents had been told by the doctors that only the most drastic remedies would restore me to good health. It was finally decided that I should go West and lead the life of a cowboy. I was perfectly reckless, and it did not matter to me where I went or what I did. In a few weeks I found myself at Santa Fé, New Mexico. An Englishman, Major Randall, who owned a ranch some distance from Santa Fé, engaged me to herd cattle at the munificent salary of £5 a month in gold."

"Then you really went to work on the ranch, Mr. Shilletoe?" she asked in a tone that seemed less sarcastic than her usual way of speaking to him.

"Yes; but do I bore you by my recital?"

"Oh, no, not at all, for you have not come to the anecdotal part of it yet."

He did not notice, or pretended not to, the cut in her remark. Still holding the rose in his hand he continued his narration:

"The Major had eleven cowboys, I made the twelfth. They were disposed to guy me; but when they saw that I was a good rider and could handle a revolver quickly they soon accepted me as one of them. They mistook my reckless dash for true courage. In a week or so my health began to improve rapidly, and at the end of two months I could ride all day and all night, rope cattle, and swear fluently in Spanish. I talked of shooting vacqueros, if the chance should occur, in a way that raised me in the estimation of all the cowboys.

"Little did I dream then that I should play a part in a tragedy, the recollection of which, at times, almost drives me mad. For years I have cultivated the art of relating anecdotes in order to cheat myself into the belief that I possessed a jovial nature. The world knows me as a jester, and thinks I am laughing with it. If I could forget, I would laugh until my heart swelled with joy. But I am wandering.

"The nearest ranch to Major Randall's was Peralto's, five miles distant. He was a rich Mexican bachelor, thirty-five years old, and noted for his hatred of Americans. He had some forty vacqueros, Mexican cowboys, or greasers, and many cattle. After I had had an experience of four months on the ranch, Peralto, our hated neighbour, journeyed to Monterey and married the daughter of a proud, but poor Mexican.

"It was said that Inez did not love him, but her parents persuaded, or, to be accurate, forced her to marry the wealthy ranchero. Instead of taking her on a bridal trip to the City of Mexico, he brought her to his bleak ranch. The Major was a widower, and there was no woman at our ranch to call on Mrs. Peralto. She was never seen out riding, and it became current rumour that her husband was maltreating her, if not actually keeping her a prisoner. Every cowboy felt that he would like to perforate the body of Peralto with bullets, and rescue his unfortunate wife. But they could not act upon rumour.

"Returning from a round-up one day I had to pass Peralto's ranch, and, being in a hurry, I spurred my horse to a fast gallop. When I was directly in front of the ranch a great Danish dog leaped the fence, and in a few bounds was at the side of my horse, ready to spring up and tear me from my saddle.

"I drew my revolver, and, without a moment's hesitation, shot the dog dead as he was preparing to leap. It was all done in a second, and the loud report of my revolver seemed to echo for miles round, the afternoon was so quiet and dreamlike.

"I reined up my horse at the gate, kept my smoking revolver in hand, expecting to see Peralto appear and exchange shots with me. I knew he was a dead shot, and my idea was to shoot first, if he had a weapon in his hand.

"A fiendish, diabolical joy took possession of me, but it was short-lived. An apparition of loveliness opened the door and advanced down the walk to the gate. Instantly my pistol was in its holster and my sombrero was doffed. Mrs. Peralto's dark hair was somewhat disarranged, but that did not detract from her beauty. She was young, not over eighteen, and, to me, she seemed a Hebe.

"I saluted her in Spanish, but my pronunciation was bad, and much to my delight she said she spoke English. My apologies and regrets for killing the dog were profuse. I told her I would buy her another dog at Santa Fé, the boys would join with me and purchase anything she wished. She said the dog did not belong to her, but to her husband. She asked me how far I lived from her husband's ranch and the direction. Then she wished to know my name and by whom I was employed.

"Her voice was low and sweet, and seemed to vibrate chords in my soul that had never been touched before. I leaned over the pommel of my saddle and gazed in admiration upon her. She saw and felt that I was sincere. She knew that I would be devoted to her cause from that time. She also knew that if her husband arrived before I departed it meant death to him or me. In a few hurried words I told her that should she ever need protection and friendship to come to our ranch.

"She extended a small, shapely hand; and leaning far over from the horse, I took it in mine. A gentle pressure and asking her not to forget that she had friends near by, I rode away, her soft spoken 'Adio, señor,' sounding in my ears."

The Hon. Shilletoe paused and bowed his head as if he saw and was communing with a departed spirit. He seemed to be thousands of miles away from the woman he had only a few moments before tried to tell that he loved. But she was nearer to him than she had ever been before. His story was a revelation to her. He was not the man she knew when she greeted him so coldly that evening. She almost felt jealous of the Mexican woman.

He appeared handsome to her for the first time. She was dimly conscious that she was excited, and longed, but almost feared, to hear the rest of his story. She moved nearer to him, and though his face was bent down, she imagined he looked sadder than the picture of "Sorrow" she had once seen in an art gallery. And yet the face in the picture of "Sorrow" was that of a hero's, a man who had loved and lost.

"Mr. Douglas," she said softly, "I hope you do not suffer?"

The voice recalled him, as if from a sad reverie, and not answering her question he continued his narration: "I informed Major Randall of everything that had occurred when I arrived at the ranch. In his bluff, hearty way he said I had done the square thing. It was not my fault, he added, that I had not killed Peralto as well as the dog. It was Peralto's luck not to draw up at the right time for a funeral. The Major swore a big oath to the effect that if Mrs. Peralto should ever crook her little finger for aid, she would get it.

"In a week's time the Major was not in a condition to help anyone. His horse fell with him and hurt his left leg. His limb was not broken, but his ankle was sprained, and had swollen to such an extent that he could not leave his bed. He had been in bed a week when the time came for him to make good his promise to Mrs. Peralto.

"It was a moonlight night in August, just such a night as this, when I heard the clatter of the horse's feet on the prairie. I was sleeping on the piazza, my saddle for my pillow, but being restless I lay awake thinking of her. She had been in my thoughts ever since I had seen her and held her hand in mine. I wondered whether I should ever see and speak to her again.

"The galloping horse came nearer, and soon I was up with my weapon in my hand, ready for any emergency. Several of the other cowboys had also risen. I recognised a fine iron-grey horse owned by Peralto, but at first I did not know the rider. He was a boy attired in a Mexican guerilla costume, with a red serape twined loosely round his neat waist. Dismounting at the gate he hurried to the piazza. Lifting his sombrero, the moonlight shone full upon the lovely face of Mrs. Peralto. In an instant I was at her side, leading her up the steps.

"'Señor, I have come for aid, for protection,' she said quickly. 'I must fly, and this very night. My husband will kill me. I have escaped from prison.' In brief, her husband had kept her locked in a room since the day I had killed the dog. His treatment of her was cruel and malicious.

Mrs. Peralto.

"He had tied her to the post of her bed, and lashed her bare back with his heavy riding whip. He had deprived her of food and drink for two days, and had then offered her the cooked flesh of the dog I had shot.

"The inhuman brutality of his conduct had aroused the sympathy of even old Emanuelo, a grim servitor of Peralto; and his compassion being even more deeply affected by a heavy bribe, he had given her the means of escaping in such a way that no blame was attached to himself.

"We all of us gathered round her to hear the recital of her story. As she rapidly pointed out the facts, each of us gripped his revolver, and muttered a resolution that Peralto should never pass him alive when next we met.

"The suit she wore was one her younger brother used to don on festal occasions. Several years before she married he died, and his request was that she should keep his gay brigand clothes. She desired an escort to a point on the Pecos River where she had a relative living, who would protect and see her safely home.

"Major Randall was roused, and the situation hurriedly explained to him. He sat bolt upright in bed, a sheet round his shoulders, and invited Mrs. Peralto to come in. In a few seconds twelve cowboys stood in line in the Major's room. He asked her to select five of us, and said we would accompany her or die in the attempt.

"She selected me first, because she knew me, and then she picked out Utah Bill, who had been a scout and was noted for his bravery and his kind heart. Utah Bill had killed eight or ten men, but always in self-defence or in a fair fight. Three others, all experts with the revolver, were selected and Utah Bill was made the captain.

"It required only a few minutes for us to saddle our horses and mount. The Major thrust his head out of the window and said: 'Boys, I do not ask you to take an oath that you will see Mrs. Peralto safely to the Rio Pecos, because I know you will, if you are alive.' As the cavalcade started Mrs. Peralto thanked the Major, and said, 'Adio, señor.'

"We rode three abreast, Mrs. Peralto between Utah Bill and myself, and the three other cowboys were in the rear. We dashed along over the rolling prairie, the bright moonlight making it easy for us to follow the trail. Over an hour had passed when Utah Bill turned in his saddle and muttered: 'Carambo, the greaser devils are coming.'

"Far in our rear, black specks could be seen moving rapidly. They were Peralto's greasers in hot pursuit. They kept gaining on us, and yet Utah Bill did not ride faster. Soon we could hear their yells, and we knew that something had to be done. Utah Bill said three of us would have to stop and face the gang. The three cowboys volunteered and Utah Bill told them that they knew what to do.

"One of these cowboys, a superb specimen of manhood, rode up to me and handed me an envelope, with the request that I would open it and write to someone named therein if anything happened to him. Our farewells were short, and a second after we parted they dismounted, shot their horses, and got behind them for breastworks.

"In a little while we could hear the yells of the greasers, and the quick discharge of firearms. It was a fight to the death. They were all three slain, but not until they had killed ten Mexicans, and wounded five or six. They died game, neither asking nor giving quarter.

"Our only thought was to save Mrs. Peralto, and spurring our horses we rode for our lives. As our steeds, in a long, sweeping gallop, carried us swiftly from our cruel pursuers, Inez leaned over towards me and said she had a favour to ask. She desired to fight and die with Utah Bill and myself. I had two revolvers buckled round me, and taking one which had a pearl handle I handed it to her. I could see tears in her eyes, and she said that she had been saying prayers for the brave boys fighting her battle. She did not know then that they were dying to save her.

"I hardly know how far we had gone, but we felt that we had escaped. We checked our horses to a slow gallop, when suddenly, right in front of us, two well-mounted horsemen barred our way. I knew Peralto's horse, with a big white blaze in his forehead, and his chief vacquero, a cruel, murderous greaser. Utah Bill commanded Mrs. Peralto to check her horse and ride close behind us.

"In a cool, matter-of-fact way he said to me: 'You shoot Peralto and I'll kill the greaser.' Four reports, almost together, rang out, and down went Peralto's horse, carrying him with it. The greaser fell from his saddle, shot through the head, and his horse dashed away. Peralto's bullet passed through my coat, and mine, aimed for his heart, lost its mark by penetrating the quickly raised head of his horse. I hoped the bullet had passed through the horse's head and lodged in Peralto's body, for as we rode by he lay prone upon the ground with his dead animal. He was not hurt, but lay still to save his life.

"We had gone a mile or more, when Utah Bill said in a husky voice: 'The game is up, Doug, old boy, I'm done for.'

"He got off his horse, and I was at his side in an instant, just in time to save him from falling.

"Mrs. Peralto quickly came to my assistance. She tore her reboso from her waist, and with it I did my best to staunch the blood flowing from his breast, already covered with the scars of many encounters. Mrs. Peralto put his head in her lap, kissed his brow and wept.

"'Bill, brave old boy, don't give up,' I said, holding the reboso to his flowing wound.

"'Doug, I am on my last round up, and it ain't no use to hold on any longer,' he said. 'I never thought I'd go out with a woman's kiss and tender arms about me. I ain't a bad man, Doug, and I never shot any one in the back. Promise me that you will not let those greasers get my pistols. And Doug, swear to me that you will see her safe. I know you will. Pray! No one has asked me to pray since I was a boy, and she was my mother. Ah! listen! Doug, they are coming, the greaser devils! Shoot Peralto! Aim for his heart! Ah, my boy, he is dead! But what is this that I feel? It is my mother's kiss, . . . the last one she ever gave me when I said good-bye.'

"The sun rose, but Utah Bill saw it not. We placed the serape over his body and rode away carrying his weapons and leading his horse. We reached the Rio Pecos and I remained a day, leaving Mrs. Peralto with her relatives. We parted with many promises and vows for the future.

"She was to write to me often, and in a month's time I was to join her. I thought then she was a widow and my affection for her was not concealed. She kept my pearl-handled revolver and she gave me a lock of her hair, and the crimsoned reboso which contained some of Utah Bill's life-blood. Why should I go over that last day of parting love?"

"Oh, don't go over it, brave boy, my Douglas," said Mabel Dinsmore, in tears, and touching the sleeve of his coat. "I know there is a barrier between us. That—that Mrs. Peralto is somewhere in this wide world claiming your first love. But, see, I am calmer now. I am ready to hear the worst."

The Hon. Shilletoe looked at the rose he held in his hand, and in a faltering voice began:—"We buried Utah Bill and the other brave cowboys in one grave, and each of us on the Major's ranch took an oath to shoot Peralto on sight, and also the greasers who pursued us on that fatal night. Peralto never returned to his ranch. He sold it to an Englishman, and we learnt that the Mexican had become a professional gambler.

"I waited in vain for a letter from Inez, but the weekly post brought down from Santa Fé contained nothing for me. I wrote to her that Peralto was not dead, and urged her to come to the States and get a divorce.

"Weeks passed, weeks of anxiety to me, and no line came from her. At the end of two months I could stand it no longer, and I resolved to go to her, if I had to travel the wide world over. I suspected that her parents had somehow prevented her from writing to me.

"I held in my arms Inez Juarez."

"Major Randall accompanied me to Santa Fé, where we were to part, perhaps for ever. The cowboy instinct to see the town got the better of us, and when evening came we visited the gambling places. With me it was anything to pass away the time until morning, when I should begin my journey to Monterey.

"We entered several gambling dens, where Spanish monte was dealt, and lost a few dollars in careless betting. Late in the evening we started to our hotel, when the sound of music from a large gambling saloon attracted our attention. The familiar strains of 'Auld Lang Syne' caused us to pause, and with one impulse we entered. Away at the end of the long room a piano, violin, and flute were making the music, while cowboys, vacqueros, and teamsters stood round the tables betting.

"We passed several tables, when suddenly my eyes fell upon a face that caused my heart to bound into my throat. I had seen that face before. It now belonged to a man with a small black moustache, who sat behind one of the tables, dealing Spanish monte. The Major was startled, too, and whispered, 'Be patient.'

"We stood at the side of the table because a small crowd in front was betting. Suddenly, from the centre of the crowd, a man pushed his way to the front of the table, and sat down by one of the chairs reserved for those who were staking heavily. In an instant my hand was on my revolver, but the Major caught my arm, and said in an undertone: 'Shoot him when he goes out, but not here.'

"Peralto's dark hair had streaks of grey in it, and his face showed signs of dissipation. His fierce black eyes, though, were as bright as ever, and when he contracted his eyebrows, he resembled a fiend. He bet heavily, and, for a time, luck was with him. Then his good fortune deserted him. He grew nervous, and occasionally putting both hands under the table, rolled cigarettes, and smoked them.

"His pile of twenty gold-pieces dwindled until only £40 was left. In the next deal, he staked all his money on one card, and lost. The dealer pulled the pile of gold to his side.

"Peralto put his right hand under the table, and when it came out a stiletto gleamed in it. In a second he leaned over the table and plunged it into the bosom of the youthful dealer. The latter seemed to have anticipated the attack, and quick as a flash exploded a pearl-handled revolver in his face. He fell backwards dead. I sprang to the youth and caught him, as he fell sideways from his seat, the stiletto to the hilt in his bosom. The false moustache on his face was brushed away, and I held in my arms Inez Juarez.

"Looking up she recognised me and whispered my name. 'Will you forgive me, dear Douglas?' she said. 'I could not drag you down with me. I was driven from home. They called me a murderess. I have prayed for you night and day. When I am gone think of me, dear, and forgive me.'

"I held her close to my bosom and kissed her white face. Tears filled my eyes and grief choked my utterance. But she knew I had forgiven and loved her still. Her head resting on my breast, her hand in mine, she muttered with her life's breath, 'Death, after all, is sweet.' Do you wonder now, Miss Dinsmore, why I make my life a jest, a mockery?"

The young lady had both hands to her face and was weeping. She did not answer his question. He stood up for the first time since he began his story and said: "I know that my past will stand between us as a shadow. You will turn from me and think only of my bloody record. I have opened my soul to you as a book, and you have read my heart-words. Again I throw away happiness as easily, it seems, as I fling this rose from me."

Suiting the action to the word, the rose described an arc and fell against the long lace curtains just as an idle gust of wind through the open window swayed the curtain forward. The rose was borne back to his feet.

"Happiness has come back to you, Douglas, just as the rose has?" cried Mabel, and rushing to him threw herself into his arms.

"Mabel, I feel for the first time a serene holy joy. Are you mine, all mine, even after my confession?"

"Yes, Douglas, I shall marry the joker, the common-place man, after all. No one could say anything against you now to shake my faith in you, my hero."

In a week after the engagement was announced the brother of Mr. Dinsmore visited Eastbourne. He was delighted with the choice Mabel, his niece, had made, and told her he knew of no other man he would rather have marry into the family than the Hon. Shilletoe. Late that evening when the two brothers, who had been discussing the Hon. Shilletoe at length, were about to part for the night, Mabel's father said: "I hear that Mr. Shilletoe is a well-known man about town."

"Yes, he is president of the celebrated Storytellers' Club," replied the brother, "and when he marries Mabel and has an interim from love-making, you induce him to tell you the story that elected him president of the club. It is called 'Peralto.' He thought it out one night when he had the toothache."

THE OTHER WAS HANGED

IN the little town of Oxbridge everyone knew the business of everyone else. And everyone assumed the right of criticism in connection with all the acts—so far as known—and all the plans—so far as guessed—of all his fellowtownsmen. That sort of thing involves heart tragedies in many unfortunate cases.

When Frank Laddon became engaged to Belle Brandon the gossips were pleased to accord what was practically unanimous approval. But when they learnt that Frank and Belle had quarrelled—learnt that she had torn up and burned his letters before his eyes; learnt that she had flung him his ring, in anger and scorn, across the great Brandon drawing-room, and screamed that her voice had become so loud and passion-filled as to reach the ears of curious passers-by in the street—they had nothing to say.

Frank Laddon went home from that stormy interview about as angry as the woman he had left. He couldn't quite recall how the quarrel commenced; he believed that it was commonplace and trivial. The way it had ended was quite enough; memory could never dismiss the disgrace of that.

He should never forget the bitter things she had said. He must always remember the look of hate that had usurped the place of love in her face as she bade him begone. He wasn't quite sure he could endure living in the same town, the same world, with her. He got his revolver out of his dressing-case, and sat down and looked at it.

I don't believe he had any actual intentions of making use of it. If he had—if moodiness had drifted so far as that, in the direction of madness—the touch of the cold metal against his fevered fingers recalled the wandering senses. He was safe—safe against self—when Arnold Ashley knocked at his door, waited a moment for the words of welcome that were not spoken, and then turned the handle, unbidden, and came in.

But the weapon was still in his hand.

"See here, old fellow," said Ashley, hoarsely, "that will never do, you know! Better let me take this thing for a day or two, until you get so that you can see more in the world than the whims of one woman."

He reached over, took the pistol from Laddon's unresisting fingers, and put it in his own pocket. Then, uninvited, he sat down.

"I happened to be passing by Brandon's," he said quietly, "and I couldn't help hearing some of the things the lady said. Laddon, I am sincere in saying I am sorry for you."

He reached out his hand, and Laddon, though he had never quite liked the fellow, took it in the spirit in which it seemed offered.

"I'm sorry," said Ashley again, when Laddon had concluded his unpleasant narrative; "but, after all, it won't make any difference a thousand years from now, and——"

"A ruined life! A blasted future!" cried Laddon impulsively.

Ashley drew his chair a little nearer that of Laddon, and lowered his voice.

"Easy, easy, man!" he cried. "Don't be so great a fool as to stake all the good of life on the love of woman. Love, I grant you, is good; but he who calls it all is a liar. Laddon, your confidences incite mine. I am going to tell you two or three things that I have never mentioned to any other person. You wouldn't marry Belle Brandon after what she said to you this morning. Wise conclusion. Who would? I wouldn't marry her myself, vixen that she is, after the fragments of her frenzy that came down as far as the pavement where I stood and listened. And yet, Frank Laddon, I loved Belle Brandon as well as ever you did!"

"You! You loved her? I did not know you were even acquainted with her. I never thought of you as a rival."

"I hadn't the honour of her acquaintance," Ashley said slowly, "but why should that matter? I had never spoken to her, nor she to me. I had never touched her hand—much less her lips," and a red flush ran slowly across his pained face.

"But love needs no voice, no personal contact. I had seen her, and that was enough. As for being your rival," and he laughed bitterly, "I am too much of a philosopher for that. I have long ago ceased to worry myself with efforts in a losing game. Besides—it will make no difference a thousand years from now."

Ashley rose, and walked up and down the room two or three times. He seemed even more agitated just then than Laddon. But he had won peace for himself before he seated himself again.

"Laddon," he said, very slowly and solemnly, "I've long wanted to find some one to whom I could tell the story of my life, my existence—the mystery and horror of it all. Listen, and remember it's all true—every word of it.

"You've doubtless read the theories of the theosophists, with their strange ideas of multiple lives and reincarnation. Well, they are true. The most absurd of all the guesses they make are verities; the most vague of their surmisings, the most shadowy of their imaginings, are facts. The great multitude scoffs and denies; the few believe, and hope; while I—I know! I know! for I have lived and died a hundred times!

"No, Laddon, no—I am not mad. I could thank God if I were. Sit down and listen. For pity's sake, listen! I shall not harm either you or myself. But the mood is on me. The time is ripe. I must speak—I will!

"I can remember almost a hundred earthly existences, almost a hundred physical deaths, and recall each one as clearly and definitely as I can remember the events of the last year of life here in prosaic Oxbridge.

"I've been every sort of man you can imagine—wise and ignorant, saint and sinner, monarch and slave. I have a theory that a man must live, in a general sort of way, every kind of life there is before he reaches the goal of eternal rest. I am full of a belief that my experiences have touched almost all phases of the many-sided possibilities of the life of man—Ah, well! Life is pleasant. Even the loss of love, the death of friends, the biting touch of a master's scourge—a man can endure any and all of these so long as he has the precious priceless boon of life left.

"But death—death! How horrible it is! How terrible! Short, shadowy, transitory. You may call it any and all of these things. But I tell you I'd rather keep a beggar's life, far rather, than go down through the dusky silence of Death's door, and up to the golden glory of the throne and sceptre of absolute dominion.

"Keep still, Laddon, and listen. You've nothing more to do than that. I'm not insane—not now. I never shall be again. I died once, though, raving mad! and once—long, long generations ago—I grew so melancholy I killed myself. You see, old fellow, I've a theory, and my own experiences go far to confirm it, that a man will die a given sort of death only once. I've never had a variety repeated; and I've pretty nearly exhausted the category, I can tell you.

"Let me see—mad once, and I don't quite know, even to this day, just what did happen at the very last; suicide once—you don't care to hear the particulars, do you? I was drowned once—that's an easy sort of death, except that the victim finds himself fighting against the inevitable; but I guess no one meets the end gladly, or gives up life happily.

"I froze—with Sir John Franklin. I lost my head—in France. I burned—when Nero destroyed Rome. I was drawn down into a quicksand. I was strangled by a great serpent in a South American forest. I was torn to pieces by a tiger in an Indian jungle. I was slain by a bayonet-thrust, just as I went over the last defences the enemy had raised against us, first in the front line of a gallant band of devoted heroes; and I was shot to death as a deserter and coward!

"An enemy poisoned me, and was never suspected. A friend—a surgeon—labouring to save my life, let his hand falter and his knife slip. I died before him, on the operating table, and the memory of it killed him. Cholera, consumption, small-pox, yellow fever, leprosy——

"You needn't draw away, Laddon; on my honour you needn't. This body, in which I am at present ensconced, is as good and strong, as pure and as clean, as your own. And the real ego—the actual entity—can hardly carry contagion, unless of a moral sort.

"I rode after the hounds in Sussex; the horse stumbled at a hedge—and broke my back. I was driver on a fast train not so many years ago, and I kept my place, held to my duty when some fool blundered with the signals, and sent us into an empty goods train; and so I got a chance to begin my life as Arnold Ashley!

"In '49," he continued, retrospectively, "I started overland for California. The savages ambushed us, and I was one of those so unfortunate as to be taken alive. They——"

But Laddon sprang to his feet. "I can't hear any more of this," he cried, "and I won't. Go home and sleep, Ashley. You'll be clear-headed, sensible, sane, in the morning, I hope."

Ashley rose too. "Thank you for the interest you manifest. I don't doubt I shall be. Thank you, too, for the patience with which you've listened, to what, I don't doubt, you have regarded as horrible—and false as well. I'll spare you further details. I understand how unpleasant you find them. I might say, however, that I believe I've died in almost all possible typical ways—except two—I never died of old age; I was never hanged."

He went as far as the door of Laddon's room, but paused there. "Men who study those abstruse subjects that interest me," he said, "reach queer conclusions sometimes. We find lives drawn together, paired—their interests pooled as it were. Do you know, after to-night I shall feel reasonably certain that our lives are intertwined—one's fate tangled in that of the other; one's powers welded in with those of the other—because of the happy warmth of mutual confidence and confession. One of us, dear old fellow, will die of old age; I'm as confident of that as I am that I ever lived. The—other—will—be—hanged!"

He gave Laddon a queer look, something that you might have called an attempted smile of a strangled scowl. "Good-night," he said cheerfully, and went downstairs.

The next evening Laddon was in his room. He had his door locked and bolted. He made no answer when Ashley knocked. It was not until his caller said he had a message from Belle Brandon that he opened the door.

"When I left you last night," said Ashley, without waiting to be seated, and with his shifty eyes looking anywhere but on Laddon, "I met the young woman at the foot of the steps. She asked me if I was your friend. You can guess what I told her. And then—then I walked by her side and saw her safely home.

"It was hard enough to listen to her praises of you, her condemnation of herself. I found it hard to remember that I was a philosopher. I found it dangerously easy to forget that it will make no difference a thousand years from now. She sent a message to you—a loving message, Laddon. 'Tell him,' she said, 'to come to-morrow night!' Laddon, will you go?"

"Go!" cried Laddon. "I'd go through fire itself, and——"

He had risen to his feet as he spoke, and had his overcoat and hat ready. But Ashley's quiet and exasperating voice made him pause.

"Precisely," said that individual. "And perhaps you may. But she said you were not to come till ten. Will you wait, Laddon? Can you?"

"I can—I will, too, since I must. But it's only eight now. Sit down and talk, and——"

"And help you kill time? Sorry, Laddon, but I really can't do it. I have another engagement." So saying he betook himself from the room, and went slowly down and out.

"Eight from ten is two," he said slowly, his speech even more leisurely than his gait. "That gives a long hour for thought, and a short one for action." He filled his lungs with a great sweet draught of the keen and frosty air, and exhaled it vigorously. He drew himself up to his greatest height, laughed softly to himself, hummed a part of some lively tune, and took a step or two that would have been more seemly in a ball-room than in the street.

"It's worth it," he continued doggedly to himself, much as he might have done had someone offered denial to an assertion he had made. "Long life in so good a world as this, and the privilege of dying from no speedier cause than age. And he had his chance. He might have known no woman would have asked him to wait one little hour.

"Heigho! How shall I manage to see Belle Brandon? How shall I secure an interview with her—an interview for the first time—and the last? A message from Laddon will do me the same service with her, I fancy, that a message from her did with Laddon. And as for him and the time, I may safely feel confident that he will be prompt."

"Pshaw!" said Frank Laddon to himself when he was alone, and he shook himself vigorously as if to throw away something unpleasant that had fallen upon him. "I mustn't allow the fellow's words to haunt me so. I have love again, and long life. What could be more absurd than to think of Ashley's fate and mine having any necessary connection? And as for hanging"—he smiled to think how mild and inoffensive a man he had always been.

It was 9.59 when Laddon turned the corner near the Brandons' house. A pistol shot rang out upon the air. He would have thought it came from within the house had not such a thing seemed impossible. But in a moment fear had made him half mad. The door opened. Someone flung himself down the steps, dashed up the street to the corner above, turned, and was gone—swallowed up from all hope or fear of pursuit—lost in the vagueness of the frosty night.

Laddon rushed in at the open door, paused long enough to close it behind him, but was first in the room where a most terrible tragedy had taken place. There, in the brilliantly lighted room, down upon the floor, at the farther side of it, lay Belle Brandon, fatally wounded. She could not speak. She gave him only one look from her tender, sorrowful, loving eyes before she wearily closed them for ever. He caught up the weapon with which the wicked work had been done, and stood there holding it in his hand, gazing doggedly from it to her, when the family and servants came hurrying in.

It was his own revolver!

THE TENTH OF JUNE.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas, whose life is attempted on the 10th of June, 1883, by a Hindoo barrister at the Law Courts, by means of poison, visits General Sir Arthur Chetwynd at Seacombe Towers, in May, 1884. The General explains that a serious danger threatens the household, and that it will come, if at all, on the tenth of June. The reason for this is that in India, on this particular day, in 1853, Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead) took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple, and every tenth of June afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned or some member of their families is assassinated. On the last day of May, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, who subsequently refuses His Highness' request for his only daughter Leila's hand in marriage, but gives him permission to repeat his proposal in a year's time. Geoffrey tells Amavati of the danger which threatens himself and the General's household. In view of the condition of affairs, Sir Arthur visits his lawyer to make his will, and, learning from him that his cousin, Captain Byngham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity.

CHAPTER VIII.

An Invitation.

On the following afternoon the General sent one of the grooms to the railway station at Torwyn to fetch the letter containing his will, which Mr. Quinton had promised to send by the guard of the 1.40 train.

"If the guard hasn't got the letter, wait for the next train. It may come by that one. At any rate, wait until you do get it, and don't come back without it." Such were the General's instructions.

Sir Arthur had a nervous anxiety to get the will signed, and he was tormented by a sort of presentiment that he would not be able to execute the document before the tenth of June. This presentiment turned into a feeling of certainty that it would be so when hour after hour went by and George, the groom, did not turn up. The General, who was accustomed to having his orders punctually carried out, was furiously angry with Mr. Quinton, his clerk, the guard of the train, the groom, and everybody concerned. The fact was that George, having met a comrade at "The Green Man," just missed the arrival of the train he had been sent to meet; and very naturally the guard, not being asked for the letter, forgot to deliver it. The telegraph was set to work, and eventually the will, in its big blue envelope, was arrested in its onward journey and sent back.

Met a comrade at "The Green Man."

Before it reached Seacombe Towers, however, a missive arrived there which made the General forget his will and his disappointment together. This was a telegram from Lord Lavington, dated the day before. It ran thus:—

"Yacht Aurora,
Plymouth
Sound.

"Can you and Miss Chetwynd join our party on board for a fortnight's run to West coast of Ireland? If you can please wire, and we will send boat ashore for you on Friday afternoon.—Lavington."

The General happened to be in the library chatting with Geoffrey when this message was put into his hand.

"Look at that, Dundas," he exclaimed, tossing the paper across the table to his friend. "If I could accept that invitation I should feel that we were perfectly safe, for this year at all events. No Hindoo could reach us on board Lord Lavington's yacht; and even if such a thing were possible the shortness of the notice would make it impossible for them to lay their plans."

"Surely you will accept this, sir!" cried Geoffrey.

"How can I, with my house full of guests?"

"It doesn't matter. Nothing matters, when weighed against Miss Chetwynd's safety. The Rajah does not intend staying beyond Saturday morning. He told me so himself. To leave one night earlier can make no practical difference. The Misses Stoddart, I am sure, would be very sorry indeed if they supposed that consideration for them had caused Miss Chetwynd to miss a delightful sea-trip—to put it merely on that ground. There remains only Captain Byngham, besides myself. He is a relative. Surely, if you let him see the telegram——"

"I'm afraid it can't be managed, my dear boy."

"Don't throw away the chance, Sir Arthur," pleaded Geoffrey. "Give me the telegram, I beg you. You needn't answer until quite late to-night; for if the reply telegram is sent off early to-morrow morning it will reach Lord Lavington when he sends a boat ashore for letters in the morning. At any rate, there is no need to answer at once."

Without saying another word to the General, Geoffrey went in quest of the Rajah. He found the prince leaning over the balustrade of the terrace, talking in a low tone to Leila; and as it would have been the height of bad manners to interrupt their conversation, Geoffrey retired to a little distance until they separated, Leila going into the house, and the Rajah beginning to pace the terrace with slow step and downcast eyes.

Geoffrey, as he drew nearer, could not forbear to admire the dignity and grace of the Indian's bearing. But for the fact that the Rajah was in blood, in religion, in habits, and sympathies, an alien, any woman, he felt, might be proud to love him. And a jealous pang shot through his breast as he wondered whether, supposing the prince to persevere in his suit, Leila might not learn to think little of the difficulties which had at first seemed to her insuperable.

But there was no time for such thoughts. Geoffrey advanced to the Rajah with a hesitancy of manner which showed that he was unwilling to disturb the prince. Amavati welcomed him with a smile.

"I have come to ask your help in a difficulty," said the young barrister. "I have just learned that Lord Lavington has asked the General and Miss Chetwynd to join a party of friends who are going to take a cruise in his yacht the Aurora. I am sure the General would give a great deal to secure this pleasure for his daughter; but, unfortunately, the yacht sails from Plymouth to-morrow evening."

No explanations were necessary for the Rajah.

"In that case we shall leave the Towers almost at the same time," he said. "You and I to-morrow morning, the General and his daughter in the afternoon."

This was said so calmly, so much as a matter of course, that Geoffrey fancied for the moment that there had been a mistake—that the Rajah had intended originally to leave on Friday morning.

Talking in a low tone to Leila.

"I thought you were to stay till Saturday," he said clumsily.

"Not when our host himself desires to be elsewhere on that day," said the Indian proudly.

"It is awfully good of you," said the young man simply; "but I beg you to remember this, Sir Arthur has not the faintest notion that I am speaking to you on this subject. He would submit to any inconvenience rather than incur the reproach of seeming inhospitable."

The Hindoo answered by a bow.

"In fact"—went on Geoffrey, feeling hot all over—"I'm afraid the General won't thank me for telling you anything about it. I'm afraid both he and you will think me confoundedly impertinent."

The Oriental shook his head almost imperceptibly, and smiled faintly, but made no attempt to speak.

Geoffrey felt more than uncomfortable. His usual caution deserted him. He respected the Rajah so much that he was anxious that he should do him justice; and, forgetting his former resolution to keep silence about the danger which menaced Sir Arthur and himself, he went on:

"The fact is, Rajah, it is not merely a friendly wish that Miss Chetwynd should have liberty to join this yachting party that emboldened me to speak to you. I am before all things anxious that she should be in some secure place by Saturday."

"Secure!" said the Hindoo, "I hardly understand. Secure from whom? Is she not secure in her father's house? In what way is she not secure?"

Geoffrey wished he had not gone so far, but it was too late to retreat. He replied indirectly:

"You remember, prince, that you once advised me to withdraw myself from the country—to shut myself up in my house; to retire in some way from the world on the tenth of June in each year! It occurred to me that Miss Chetwynd would be safer on board Lord Lavington's yacht on the tenth of June, than she could be even in her father's house."

The young Englishman was looking straight at the Hindoo while he spoke. Amavati did not start; but an indefinable change came over his dark face as he listened. When he spoke his tone was low and measured, his words clear and penetrating.

"Do you mean that the same danger threatens Sir Arthur Chetwynd and his daughter that you believe threatens you?"

"Nay, how can I tell?" answered Geoffrey, with assumed lightness. "It is not every one who escapes and is warned as I have been warned. The danger is one that cannot be foreseen; one can only guess, and take precautions. But it is a fact that General Chetwynd was in India at the time this vendetta began. For aught I know he, like myself, may be a marked man. All I mean to say is, that I should be greatly relieved if I knew that Sir Arthur and Leila"—the name slipped out unawares—"were to be safe on board the Aurora to-morrow evening."

"Your wish shall be gratified as far as I can do anything to further it," said the Hindoo proudly, as he resumed his walk on the terrace.

Before dinner it was practically settled that Lord Lavington's invitation should be accepted, and that the party at The Towers would break up on the following day. Sir Arthur, however, remembered that the Rajah had once expressed a preference for travelling by night, and he insisted on Amavati and his suite spending the next day, Friday, at Seacombe Towers. It was arranged that they should all leave the house at the same hour, late in the afternoon.

After dinner that evening, George the groom presented himself in the dining-room, to deliver over the blue envelope which he had at last obtained, and undergo the dreaded cross-examination. Luckily for him the ordeal took place after the General had dined. Sir Arthur's anger had in part evaporated; and George managed to insinuate that the guard had been too busy to attend to him, and had suddenly started the train before there was time to speak to him a second time. At any rate, the will had arrived in time, and George's offence was forgiven.

"Step into the library," said Sir Arthur to him, "and wait there until I come."

He left the room with the envelope unopened in his hand. Geoffrey, not caring to sit tête-à-tête with Captain Byngham, went to the drawing-room.

"Dundas, would you mind witnessing my signature?" said Sir Arthur, suddenly opening the dining-room door.

"He is not here; he has gone to the drawing-room. But if it is only to witness your signature perhaps I could do instead."

"You—ah!—er—. No thank you. Not in this case," said Sir Arthur in some confusion.

He knew that if Captain Byngham were to witness the will the legal effect would be to strike his name out of the body of the will. Byngham knew this too. He had suspected that the blue envelope might contain the General's will; and he had offered his services as witness on purpose to ascertain the truth. His conjecture was now confirmed, and his face fell. Sir Arthur's tone had not been that of a man who should say—"No, my boy; I don't want to do you such a bad turn." Byngham remembered that the General had hardly spoken to him since his return from Plymouth. Could it be possible that he had heard there some of the rumours about him which were current in Yorkshire?

Drank three glasses of wine.

The captain's face grew dark. He poured himself out another glass of claret; and as he sat there thinking, with the wine untasted before him, his countenance grew blacker and blacker. He had so long considered himself as Sir Arthur's heir, so far as real property was concerned, that he had come to feel that the General had no right to make a change. He felt as if he would give half of all he had in the world to know the truth. But wishing would not help him.

He pushed aside the claret, seized the sherry decanter, and drank three glasses of wine one after another. Then he went out into the hall.

As he passed the library door he heard his uncle's voice exclaiming:

"The postman gone! I particularly wished him to take this letter! Confoundedly provoking! Well, see that you give it to him when he comes in the morning. I will leave it here for you. Don't forget!"

There was a slight click, as if a key were being turned in a lock.

The servant to whom Sir Arthur was speaking said: "I won't forget, sir," and the Captain walked on.

CHAPTER IX.

In the Library.

At one o'clock that night Captain Byngham left his room. He was fully dressed, and he carried an unlighted candle in his right hand.

Gently closing his bedroom door behind him, he went to the great staircase and stood for some seconds, listening. All was dark and silent as the grave. Softly he descended to the hall, his steps making absolutely no noise on the thick stair-carpet. Having reached the hall, he groped his way to a closet where, he had noticed, Leila sometimes deposited her basket of keys. Passing his hands gently along the shelves, he soon satisfied himself that the key-basket was not there However, he came upon a tool-box, and, selecting a stro chisel, he slipped it into his pocket.

Then he made his way to the library, and, having closed the door, he struck a match and lit his candle.

Captain Byngham had made up his mind that he must know the contents of Sir Arthur's will. It was impossible to stir a step without knowing how he stood in that respect. To inquire openly of his uncle was, of course, impossible. The information must be gained secretly.

Chance had favoured him in this, that for this night—for this one night only—the will was lying under the roof that sheltered him. It was next to impossible that the same chance should occur again, and he therefore determined to run whatever risk might be necessary in order to open and read the will.

He knew it was in the library. "I will leave it here for you," Sir Arthur had said when he was telling the footman to remember to give it to the postman in the morning. From that Byngham concluded that the letter containing the will was either lying openly on a table or locked up, not in a desk or cabinet, but in some drawer or cupboard of which the footman would have the key.

The Captain held up his light and glanced round, but no packet resembling the one he sought was visible. As he stood there searching the room with his eyes, the silence was so profound that imaginary sounds became audible to his fancy. He could almost have sworn that he heard someone breathing, and he glanced towards the larger window almost as if he expected that one of the dark shadows at that end of the room would move forward and confront him.

But rejecting these fancies, Captain Byngham turned his practical mind to the business in hand.

The letter with the will was necessarily too large to be easily overlooked. It was not on either of the tables, nor on the mantel-piece nor on the cabinet. It might be in one of the drawers of the writing-table. Byngham searched them one after another, for they were unlocked. The will was not in any of them. As for the drawers of the cabinet, it seemed unlikely that the General should have entrusted one of the keys of his cabinet to a servant. Anyhow they were all locked, and the Captain had no means of opening them.

But in a recess there was a cupboard, which seemed by far the most likely place for the General to put a document which he did not wish to lock away permanently. It had a door, and the door was locked; but the lock was of quite an ordinary description.

The Captain felt sure that he could force it, and replace the lock so that the damage would escape any casual observer. True, the footman would find the cupboard door open in the morning, instead of its being locked; but that was a risk that must be run. After all, the man might not notice that anything was wrong.

The Captain muffled the chisel in a rug, inserted the edge of it between the door of the cupboard and the door-post, and threw his weight on the handle. Something gave way with a crack; but the folds of the rug deadened the sound. A little more pressure, and, without any great damage being done, the door gave way. The cupboard was open, and Byngham pounced upon a blue envelope lying on a shelf.

Lit his candle.

There could be no doubt that this was the will. The packet was perfectly fresh, free from dust, and without a crease; and it was addressed to Sir Arthur's lawyer. But, to the Captain's bitter disappointment, it was securely sealed.

He was standing with the document in his hand, considering whether he should break the seal or not, when a slight noise startled him. He looked up.

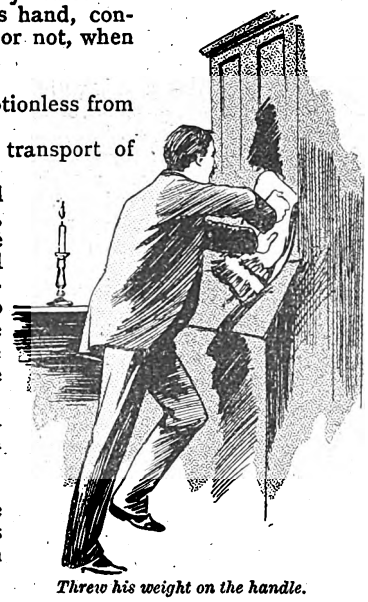
The Rajah's secretary stood before him!

For a second or two Byngham stood motionless from sheer astonishment.

"Confound you!" he cried, in a sudden transport of rage. "What do you want here?"

"Allow me to make it plain to you," said the Hindoo, with grave politeness. "I, hearing a slight noise, as of some one moving about, opened my bedroom door, and listened. I was sure I heard a stealthy footstep, the footstep of a burglar, as it seemed to me. I woke the Rajah's servant." Here Chunder Sen pointed to the door where the tall form of the cook was visible, "and we come quietly downstairs. We see a pale light. We hear a cr—r—r—ack! We enter; and we find the honourable Captain engaged in an act which seems to require explanation. That is all."

The Indian's voice did not vary by the thousandth part of a tone; his full dark eyes were like two spears. But Captain Byngham had plenty of courage. He assumed a lordly attitude.



Threw his weight on the handle.

"Explain my actions to you!" he said with a glance of contempt.

"Certainly not. To Sir Arthur Chetwynd," said the Hindoo sternly.

"Mind your own business!" cried the Englishman.

"I have the honour to be your uncle's guest," said Chunder Sen.

Byngham paused. It would be necessary, absolutely necessary, to do or say something to stop this fellow's mouth. But what could he say? What explanation could he offer? Would the fellow take a bribe, he wondered—a bribe simply to hold his tongue? It seemed unlikely. Besides Captain Byngham could not afford a bribe worth offering.

As these thoughts passed through his mind, Chunder Sen stooped and picked up the packet, which the Captain in his surprise had dropped on the floor.

"Give me that!" cried Byngham, holding out his hand for it.

"I imagine this belongs to Sir Arthur," said the Hindoo calmly. "I must put it into his hands. If, however," he added, "you can show me that you have a right to it, that would be quite a different matter."

Innocent as these words were to the ear, there was something in the Hindoo's tone as he uttered them, which made the Englishman throw a quick, sharp look at him. The expression in the Oriental's eyes confirmed the vague doubt. Byngham felt sure that he was not incorruptible. But on what side was the man open to attack?

"Perhaps the honourable Captain has some right, or, at all events, some powerful reason for wishing to look at these documents?" repeated the Secretary, glancing at the packet in his hand.

"You are right," said Byngham. Then a sudden impulse made him determine to confide in the Hindoo. As matters stood, the confidence could not do harm, while it might possibly do good. "The simple truth is," he added, "I wanted to know how I stand in my uncle's will."

"This is his will, then?"

"I believe so. In fact, I have no doubt of it."

"And you merely wish to read it?"

"Of course. What else do you suppose I would do? What the dickens do you take me for?" cried the Captain indignantly.

Chunder Sen paid no attention to this. He stood balancing the packet in his hand, pondering something in his mind.

"Suppose I stand your friend in this affair," he said. "Suppose I conceal this indiscretion of yours; suppose I allow you to read the will——"

"You allow me! I must say you have plenty of cheek! Besides, you can't show me the will. Don't you see it is sealed up?"

The Hindoo looked at the envelope again and smiled. Then he spoke a word or two in Hindustani to his companion; and the big cook vanished from the room.

Chunder Sen appeared anxious to take advantage of his inferior's absence.

"I advise you, make me your friend," he said to the Englishman in a low, earnest tone. "You will not be sorry for it. I can help you in this little affair." He held up for an instant the blue envelope; "and I may be able to help you again."

"An act which seems to require explanation."

Twenty-four hours before, Captain Byngham would have knocked any man down who should have suggested that he was capable of entering into a bargain of this kind. Even now he did not believe that the Indian could really help to remove his difficulties. But he reflected that if he accepted the Secretary's offer, he would secure the man's silence respecting his secret visit to the library. And as to any other demands the Hindoo might put forward, it would be time enough to think of them when they were advanced. Still, he hesitated to seem to fall in with the Hindoo's wishes, and thus secure his silence in the meantime. As to any future demand on the Hindoo's part, it might be met or refused when it was put forward.

"I will put your uncle's will into your hands," said the Secretary.

"I tell you it's sealed up!"

"Wait!" The Indian turned his eyes towards the door.

Kuttapani, the Hindoo cook, stole like a shadow into the room.

Chunder Sen advanced, and took from him a thick, soft towel which had been loosely wrung out of warm water. This he folded round the packet containing the will, and placed it on the table.

"That won't melt sealing-wax!" cried Byngham contemptuously.

The Hindoo made him no answer, but began to pace up and down the library with slow, cat-like steps, his eyes resting on the ground.

The Captain threw himself into a chair and waited. As he sat there, he asked himself what the Hindoo's motive could possibly be in aiding him as he was doing. But to this question he could find no answer.

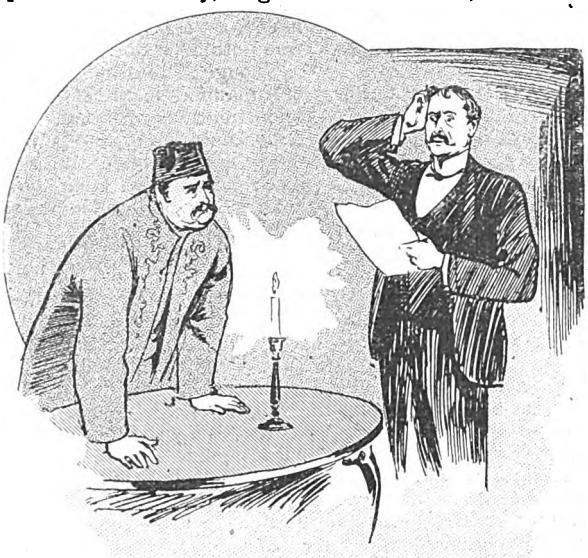
When some minutes had elapsed, Chunder Sen removed the towel from the packet. The envelope was an ordinary, long "official" envelope, opening at one end. This end had been sealed; and the seals remained intact. But the moisture from the damp, warm towel had dissolved the gum which fastened the body of the envelope together. It lay half open, showing the will inside. The Hindoo carefully drew out the document, and handed it to the Captain, who unfolded it with fingers that trembled with excitement.

As he read, the Hindoo busied himself in smoothing the envelope, and gently removing some of the moisture with a cambric handkerchief.

He was still busy doing this when he happened to glance at his companion. The look in Byngham's face positively startled him. It was the face of a man maddened with rage.

"So it is as you feared?" he said gently.

The answer was a muttered curse. Unconsciously the Captain was crushing the instrument in his hand. With firm hand the Hindoo took it from him, and quietly read it himself.



"So it is as you feared?"

"You are done with this, are you?" he said when he had finished.

"Yes—no," replied Byngham. "Let me see it again. I want to make sure."

He read once more the clause which had caused him such strong emotion—that in which the General bequeathed him an annuity of two hundred pounds, paid quarterly.

"If he had wanted to insult me he couldn't have struck harder," he muttered to himself. "But I can see what it means. Some prating fool has told him how hard-up I am; and 'kick him, he's down,' that's his motto. When I saw that about 'my consent,' I might have known the game was up."

It was as plain to Captain Byngham's mind as if the General had put his reasons into the body of the will. One country gentleman does not bequeath another a small annuity in the ordinary course of things. That, coupled with the provision that the annuity should cease if he married Leila without the testator's consent, was tolerably good evidence that such consent would not be forthcoming.

Yes, the thing was done. There was no doubt of it. There was the General's signature, firm and unbending as the General himself, and witnessed by Geoffrey Dundas.

At a sign from the Secretary Kuttapani went to the door of the cupboard; and in a few minutes removed the traces of the Captain's violence and refastened the lock. Meanwhile Chunder Sen replaced the will in the envelope which he carefully adjusted, and placed the packet under some heavy volumes.

"You are in trouble; perhaps I can help you," said the Hindoo to Byngham.

"How can you help me?" said the Englishman rudely. "If you could burn that will! But no; of course he could easily make a new one."

"I may be able to help you," repeated the Hindoo, his dark eyes fixed on the Captain's face. "But now it grows light. Suppose you meet me on the terrace after breakfast?"

"What can you do for me?"

"That is for me to discover when you confide to me the extent and the manner of your loss," said the other gravely.

"All right," said the Captain with a bitter laugh; "I'll meet you on the terrace. But I fancy you'll find my ailment beyond the power of your physic."

The packet restored to its former appearance, was replaced in the cupboard; and Kuttapani deftly turned the bolt of the lock with a bit of wire.

Chunder Sen, with a polite inclination to the Captain, bent forward and blew out the candle. Then all three silently left the room.

"ONCE more, Mr. Elmore, I repeat I cannot entertain your proposal for my daughter's hand."

"But, consider, Mr. Bulsale, Ethel and I love each other to distraction."

"Pshaw!" contemptuously exclaimed the unrelenting father of the dear girl I fondly adored.

I, Edward Elmore, had been for a good half-hour doing my very utmost to convince the old gentleman that it would be utterly impossible for him to discover a better way of inaugurating the new year than by receiving me as his son-in-law elect, and by doing so cause two fond hearts to beat with joy; for why should I desire to conceal the fact that I had the very greatest cause for believing that my darling Ethel fully reciprocated my consuming passion?

That I had signally failed to make the old gentleman see the interesting subject in the light I wished him seemed only too plain.

I was tolerably alive to the reason why Mr. Bulsale did not look with favour upon my suit. My financial position was certainly not of the strongest, and there was a certain Mr. Sowerbutt, a middle-aged individual, short (not of cash) and fussy, and proprietor of "Sowerbutt's Sauce for the Million."

As the very particular crony of Mr. Bulsale, the condiment concocter was naturally a frequent visitor at the former's residence at Brixton. I half suspected that Sowerbutt had a silent regard for Ethel, having, on more than one occasion, caught him furtively casting 'sheep's eyes' at my darling, when he had doubtless imagined himself unobserved.

How I had obtained a footing in the Bulsale mansion was in this wise. I was a clerk in the office of a fine old-crusted firm of family and conveyancing solicitors. Mr. Bulsale was an "eminent" auctioneer, and revelled in the satisfaction of possessing an extensive and lucrative business, and, as he had many transactions with our firm, he and I were in consequence thrown much together. After a while Mr. Bulsale seemed to take a fancy to me, and invited me to dine with him at his house, and that visit proved to be the forerunner of many more.

The keen man of business, who ever had his eye on what is termed the main chance, found me useful to him in many ways, especially in what may be called the literary part of his calling. I refer to the composition of those enticingly flowery advertisements setting forth the varied attractions of charming country retreats and the delirious delights appertaining to magnificent mansions, which from time to time Mr. Bulsale received instructions to offer for sale to a yearning public.

I reflected that to keep a watchful eye on Simon Sowerbutt I must remain on good terms with Mr. Bulsale; so with this laudable object in view, I said, with an air of apparent resignation:

"I trust, Mr. Bulsale, that, although you cannot bring yourself to look upon me in the light of a possible son-in-law, you will not prohibit my occasionally looking in upon you as before?"

"Come and see us whenever you like, young man; but mind, don't let me catch you making love to Ethel."

I thanked him and then remarked, "I think I may with truth say, Mr. Bulsale, that I have always enjoyed the little music that your daughter and—myself have been in the habit of—of providing. Those little duets, for instance—you will not——"

"Well, no," the unsuspecting Bulsale said slowly. "I see no reason why you should not as before indulge in a little music, especially as I like it so much!" Of course, Bulsale was nothing if not a little selfish.

Thought I to myself, if two fond hearts, with the assistance of a piano and a sheet of music, cannot make good use of the opportunities presented, and at the same time bamboozle the unbending parent, my name is not Edward Elmore.

Again I thanked the old gentleman, and then addressed him: "You have been candid enough to indicate that you have no personal objection to me, only you consider my means inadequate to maintain a wife in the manner you would deem satisfactory."

"That, young man, is precisely the state of the poll."

"And a very unsatisfactory condition it is for me," I answered ruefully. "Now, would you mind telling me under what conditions or circumstances you would be willing to bestow your daughter's hand——"

"And fortune," put in Mr. Bulsale quickly.

"That, sir," I answered quietly, and, I trust, with dignity, "was not my thought; I should be willing to take Ethel without a penny. Try me."

Mr. Bulsale said nothing, but took a silent pinch.

"Under what circumstances," I repeated, "would you consent to Eth—your daughter, becoming my wife?"

"I should be willing to listen to you," he said, "when you possessed an income of, say, seven hundred a year."

My heart sank to zero. Bulsale might just as well have stipulated for a million.

"Or," added the old gentleman, a curious smile diffusing itself over his somewhat broad visage, as if he had just thought of something which mightily tickled him, "or Ethel might be yours, to have and hold, when I knock her down to you;—once—twice—for the third and last time, going—going—gone!"

I nearly lost all patience with the old fellow for making so absurd, not to say vulgar, a joke upon a subject so sacred to myself. Then it flashed across me that I, too, but a few minutes previously had been guilty of similar flippancy, and I thought I had better bottle up my wrath and take my leave; so, wishing Mr. Bulsale good morning, I made for the door.

"Good morning, my dear sir," responded the eminent salesman blandly.

That evening, as the clocks were striking eight, I was on Mr. Bulsale's front doorstep, armed with a new piece of music, over which, a few minutes later, Ethel and I were bending our heads in delightful proximity, while papa, in his favourite chair, took alternate whiffs at his churchwarden and sips at his glass of mountain dew.

In soft whispers, through the music, I informed Ethel of all that had transpired during my interview with her revered but unbending father. The darling girl quite agreed with me regarding the untimeliness of the pleasantry her father had indulged in, though at the same time she devoutly wished she could be "knocked down"—to myself, of course.

During the evening Sowerbutt put in an appearance and the piano had to be closed. Then followed a discussion over a sale of a small but valuable lot of antique furniture, which Mr. Bulsale was going to hold in a few days at his extensive mart. There was also the proof of the advertisement to look over, to which, as usual, I added a little embellishment.

Mr. Bulsale descanted eloquently upon the beauty and value of several of the articles which would very likely go into the broker's hands for a mere song; "particularly," he observed as he warmed up professionally, "a large cabinet or wardrobe beautifully carved, and very substantial, no gimcrack work."

"Just the very thing I should like," exclaimed Sowerbutt. "It would come in handy in case—if ever—I should get married, you know." And the man of sauce cast a look at Ethel, which no doubt he intended should convey a world of significance.

At eleven we broke up, Sowerbutt and I going part of the way together to our respective homes. The purveyor again intimated his fixed determination to secure the large cabinet, provided the figure was not run up too high. Sowerbutt was a very careful, not to say stingy, man, considering the pot of money he had made with the "Sauce for the Million," which by the way, candour compels me to admit was a very relishing condiment, and deserved the enormous sale it enjoyed.

As I was seated at my modest morning meal on the day of the sale of the antique furniture, I fell to musing on the probable amount old Sowerbutt would bid up to for the ancient cabinet.

"Tallygraff, sir!" said Mary Jane, bursting in upon me.

I could never get that handmaiden to say telegram. Opening the buff-coloured despatch I read: "Purchase at sale this morning Lot Number Eleven at any cost. Do not fail your Ethel."

"So, Mr. Sowerbutt," I murmured, "you are going to be done out of your contemplated purchase. But what on earth can Ethel want with the cabinet, and at any cost, too?" However, I had little time to lose in vain speculations, so set off to the scene of operations, looking in at the office on the way to make excuses for my absence. I arrived at the mart just as the third lot was being knocked down. Bulsale seemed surprised on seeing me enter, while Sowerbutt, who was close to the rostrum, looked as dark as his own sauce; as though, in fact, he had intuitively guessed the cause of my presence there.

Lot ten was quickly reached and disposed of. The auctioneer then, clearing his throat, assumed an air of extra importance, and commenced to eulogise "Lot Number Eleven in the catalogue," speaking of the "noble piece" of antique furniture in terms so feeling, that any one might fairly have been excused for imagining the article offered had belonged to a long line of Bulsale's ancestors.

When Mr. Bulsale had apparently exhausted his category of laudatory phrases, he actually wound up by the way of peroration:

"The article, ladies and gentlemen, needs no words of mine to convince anyone of its uniqueness, there it is to speak for itself."

"A sovereign," bid a venturesome spirit.

The auctioneer remarked that it was rather too early in the day for joking; however, he would take the bid just by way of making a start.

"Let's see inside of it," suggested one of those swell wits often seen at auctions.

"Certainly, if you desire to, sir, though I may tell you there is nothing, not even a shelf: but should any one require shelves fixing, the cost would be only trifling. John, unlock the cabinet."

"The key isn't in it, sir," answered the attendant.

"It was an hour ago, I'm certain," remarked Mr. Bulsale. "However, it's of little consequence. Sorry we can't oblige you, sir, just at the moment, the key has evidently been mislaid."

"Supposing, after all, there is something inside, will it go with the article?"

"I pledge you my word," answered Mr. Bulsale, with mock irony, "that the fortunate purchaser of that work of art may justly claim anything that may happen to be in the interior. I trust everybody will now be satisfied, and allow us to go on with business."

There is no need to dwell on the progress of the bidding for Lot Number Eleven. Besides myself there were two or three other keen competitors, and so, even if I had not been there with such imperative orders, Sowerbutt would have failed to secure the coveted piece of furniture at what he considered a reasonable price; he retired from the field vanquished when the bidding had reached £12 10s. Eventually the cabinet fell to my bid of £37 15s., and a rather exorbitant figure I considered it. Of course, after all, I was but an agent in the matter.

As there were not many lots to be disposed of, I elected to stay till the sale was concluded, thinking that it was just possible I might learn something more respecting my purchase. I pushed my way through the crowd into Mr. Bulsale's office behind the saleroom and seated myself facing the doorway through which I had just entered, my eyes the while resting upon the antique cabinet, which had been so placed that the back of it was partly across the entrance to the private room.

I had been sitting a minute or so musing over the unusual events of the morning, when, to my amazement, I saw—there was no delusion—the back of the wardrobe slowly opening towards me, like a door, disclosing a space of four or five inches, and through this aperture there appeared a small, feminine hand, whose tapered fingers dangled invitingly a scrap of paper. Acting on the impulse of the moment, I rose and quickly transferred it to myself. The little hand was thereupon instantly withdrawn, and the opening closed.

I could scarcely believe my eyes as I read on the paper I had so mysteriously become possessed of as follows:

"So I have really been knocked down to you, dear. Now you will understand my telegram. You, of course, will know how to complete the stratagem begun by Ethel!"

"Whew! The clever darling!"

The next minute Mr. Bulsale entered, exclaiming:

"There, I've just finished. But where is Ethel?"

Before I could reply, the back of the antique cabinet again opened, but wide this time, and Ethel—looking somewhat flushed—stepped forth. Advancing towards us, she said demurely:

"Here I am, papa, none the worse for being 'knocked down' by you."

Papa Bulsale's face was a study, as he looked first at Ethel, then at myself.

"Explain?" he gasped out, as he sank helplessly into an easy chair.

"It is all my doing," Ethel quietly remarked. "Edward knew nothing of the actual fact till a moment ago. You see, papa, I discovered yesterday that the cabinet had a revolving back, and at once, as if by inspiration, the idea occurred to me to be sold along with the furniture, and so—well, you know the rest, dear papa, and I belong to the purchaser of the antique wardrobe, 'Lot Eleven.' Here is the key."

The ingenious damsel put out her hand to me, and, taking the dear little palm, I turned to the dazed Mr. Bulsale, saying gravely:

"I claim this lady according to the conditions of sale as well as by your own words, of which, I dare say, you do not require reminding."

As soon as the eminent auctioneer realised how beautifully he had been cornered, he stormed dreadfully; but the torrent of his wrath soon exhausted itself, and he calmed down wonderfully, even to go so far as to designate his friend Sowerbutt a mean fellow for not bidding above me.

On the auspicious occasion when darling, daring Ethel became my wife, the order of things customary at such times was somewhat reversed in the case of Mr. Sowerbutt. Instead of his making the bride the customary present, the latter sent him a handsome gift—Lot Eleven! He accepted it.

A SAFE HIDING PLACE

MISTRESS BARBARA TREVETHICK walked alone upon the terrace. It was the close of a heavy spring day; the sun had gone down and a chilly evening breeze blew fitfully and moved the long grass of the uplands to and fro; the twilight was dark in the distance, and had already stolen all the colour from the fading day; it was cold—cold!—and Barbara drew her mantle tightly round her erect figure and pulled her hood closely over her forehead as she paced up and down and watched the dreary death of the day.

She had reached the end of the terrace and leaned wearily against the wall, when suddenly a whispered "Barbara!" reached her, and she started, all alight with life and love at once.

"Barbara—sweetheart!" and a shadowy figure swung itself up and over the low wall from the shrubbery below.

"Oh, Ralph, Ralph!" cried Mistress Barbara, joyfully. But she shrank back at her lover's pale face. "Where is my father?" she whispered, with a quick sob.

"I do not know, sweetheart—safe, I trust, but in good sooth I know nothing but that it is a marvel I have reached you safely, and that I am not here for long. The day is lost, and the Roundheads are after us all over the country. I managed to gain the shelter of the wood, lay quiet awhile, and then crept hither through the twilight, for I had sworn to see my sweet mistress's face again, if I died for it!" Sir Ralph's voice was hoarse and broken, his gay cavalier plumage was soiled and torn, and his long hair lay uncurled over his handsome face. "Can you hide me here this night?" he went on, "for I am too spent to go further, I fear."

"Hide you! Yes, indeed—I can put you in a hiding-place where all the Roundheads in the world will never find you," cried Mistress Barbara, looking lovingly up into the face of the cavalier as she hung on his arm. "Perhaps my father may reach home, too—God grant it!—there is room for both. But how can I get you in? The servants must not see nor hear. Wait here for me; crouch down in the shadow, and I will be here anon."

"Nay, Barbara," cried her lover, holding her back, "you must not run any risk for me; sooner would I go forth and face the Ironsides as I am." But Barbara turned, and for one moment pressed her face closely against his bosom.

"Dear heart, I run no risk—and if I did, what matter? You know well I would throw down my life gladly to please you but for a moment. I would do all—all for you, except"—with a sudden catch in her breath—"except give you up to another woman!"

Sir Ralph laughed—an easy, self-satisfied laugh. Even in the midst of his peril and bodily fatigue it was still a delicious tribute to his vanity to feel that beautiful Mistress Barbara loved him like this. He smoothed her thick, wavy hair, and murmured a loving word or two as he bent over her, and then she turned swiftly, and went quickly along the terrace and into the darkness beyond.

Sir Ralph, left to himself, looked carefully round him, to see if he had been followed. All was silent and safe, and he leaned back against the wall in the corner of the terrace, and folded his arms, to wait patiently. "I wonder," he muttered to to himself, with his easy smile, "I wonder whether little Lettice is thinking of me? By 'r lady, I must be careful; that black-browed goddess of mine will be giving me up to the Roundheads if she guesses I have swerved a hair's-breadth from her worship. And she is twice as handsome as Lettice. 'Tis hard to choose betwixt them, and meanwhile, I had best make love to both." In a few moments, Mistress Barbara returned stealthily.

"All is well," she whispered, "Old Marion and the others are all downstairs, and I must take you in by my own private doorway. Tread softly, and come after me."

Sir Ralph stepped after her as quietly and quickly as he could. The moon had now risen, and her silver light was as bright as day, but the shadows fell in heavy black masses, and, as they kept close into the wall, they were invisible. Barbara glided on until she came to a small, arched door, which stood ajar, and which she softly pushed open. It revealed a winding stone staircase, built in the thickness of the wall, and she ran up swiftly, pushed back a sliding door at the top, and they stood in a small chamber heavily hung with faded stuff, and furnished barely, with a few stools and tables.

"No one comes here but myself," panted Barbara, flushed and out of breath with the rapid ascent, as she turned to secure the door after them. Sir Ralph looked round and his face fell somewhat.

"Is this my hiding-place, sweet mistress?" he asked ruefully. "In truth, if the Ironsides come to seek me they will not have far to look."

"Nay, nay," smiled Barbara. "Be not so hasty. Look hither, and see if I cannot hide you safely for a while." As she spoke, she touched a concealed spring in the panelling behind the faded hangings—the wood slid creakingly back and revealed an iron door which she unlocked by a curious little key. It opened, and revealed another small chamber beyond.

"Ah, this is better, in good sooth!" said Sir Ralph, stooping down to look through the opening.

"Here you can remain in safety, dear heart," whispered Mistress Barbara. "No one knows of this place but my father and myself. I will bring you each day what you need, and when pursuit is over, there will be no need for hiding."

"'Tis marvellously well-contrived," returned her lover, stepping down through the narrow doorway and surveying his hiding-place. It was a small, vaulted room, and the small lamp Mistress Barbara carried shone upon the rough stone walls and on a couch in the corner, and a small stand or table which formed the whole of the furniture. "And I am your prisoner here, sweet Barbara, and the key that keeps me is in your hands; deal gently with me, sweetheart, for 'tis a pleasure to know my fate depends on the lady of my love only."

"Yes, you are indeed in my hands," murmured Mistress Barbara, leaning her beautiful head upon his shoulder with a loving gesture. "Are you content? And indeed, if you are true to me as I to you, what need have you to dislike it? See, I have placed some food on the table, and here is the lamp; to-morrow I will come again, and till then I must say farewell, for old Marion will be seeking me. Alack! you have no warm covering. Here, take my mantle—'twill serve you till I come again. And now—and now—tell me once more you love me well, and say good-night."

Sir Ralph stooped his lofty head and looked in her half-veiled eyes. "I will tell you that as long and often as you will, dear love. Foul befall my lips and my heart if ever they are false to the love I bear you! Sweet Mistress Barbara, good-night, and fair slumber to you—I shall look for your sweet face again to-morrow." And Mistress Barbara, glad and content, passed through the narrow opening, and, turning round once more before the heavy door fell behind her, breathed softly, "To-morrow."

II.

NEXT morning Barbara rose betimes. Joyful, and yet anxious was her heart as she woke to consciousness, for though her lover was safe, she had yet heard no news of her father. Stout old Sir John Trevethick had ridden out to battle for the King as gaily as any of the younger Cavaliers, and his daughter hoped to have news of him before the day was over. "God grant he may come home safe," she said to herself, "but at least I will not lament while there is hope!"

She wished to get a store of provisions for her imprisoned lover before the servants were about the kitchen and lower halls, and dressed herself quickly. Her sleeping room had two doors; one opened upon the main staircase, and one upon the little chamber behind the panelling of which lay the concealed room. She chose the latter way as being a quicker descent, and as she went down the narrow stair, her eye fell upon a small white packet tied with ribbon.

"He must have dropped it as he came up last night," thought she.

"'Tis well that none have been here before me." She stooped, smiling, to pick it up. "My letters, belike," she whispered, as she noticed the papers covered with writing, and then, as she held them, the loosely tied ribbon fell apart, and two or three letters dropped to the floor.

Mistress Barbara could read and write well, and with a sudden shock, that sent all the blood from her face, she saw that the characters were none of her tracing, though a woman's.

"Oh—oh!" she cried softly to herself, pressing both hands upon her bosom. Then she picked up the strange letters, went back into the little room, and sat down.

How long she sat there she never knew. There lay the fateful letters upon the table in the bright morning sunlight, and there she sat with her eyes fixed upon them and a furious passion rising in her heart. Who had written those lines? What woman dared to write letters to him—her lover? And why had he preserved them with such care and carried them with him?

"I will know all," said Mistress Barbara hoarsely, "'tis my right!" And she gathered up the scattered letters with hands that trembled strangely.

There were four or five of them, and they were all written by the same hand, and signed—"Lettice." Mistress Barbara read them all through, with one hand clenched upon her heart, which was like a burning fire. They were answers to letters written by her false lover—coquettish, frivolous letters, that yet had a burden of true love running through them. There were complaints of his absence, pretty messages of love, and little scoffs at his supposed entanglement with a country love.

"Did you not vow to me a hundred times," wrote the lady, "that you loved none but me, and that black-browed Mistress Barbara Trevethick had but served to while away your weary hours until you could return to me again? Out upon you; I hear that you are ever with her: and though I know full well that you love but me, yet I am not at ease till I hear from you. But I will believe none of it, dear love, for in truth I love and trust you well."

Then, again, in a later letter she wrote:—

"Sweetheart, right glad was I to receive your last letter, and yet more glad when I read your loving words. In truth I did wrong to doubt you, even for a time; but 'twas but through the love I bore you. Yet, in my joy, I can find some thoughts of pity for poor Mistress Barbara. Proud and passionate, she may be, as you say—yet, must she suffer the more for being so over fond."

"Now, by my faith!" burst out Mistress Barbara, with terrible eyes flaming out of her white face—"they shall see if I be 'over fond' or no!"

She dashed the letters to the ground, and walked up and down in a tempest of passion. To and fro, to and fro, she paced, and the love which had filled her heart turned to hate, and a consuming desire for revenge. And yet—"Oh, how I have loved him!" cried Mistress Barbara, wringing her hands in agony. "Over fond! Proud and passionate! Oh! —that I—I should be scorned like this!"—and all the jealousy and cruelty in her nature leapt to life in the depths of her slumberous eyes.

The storm of her passion had made her deaf and blind to everything beside, and there had been a knocking at her door for some minutes, while she swept up and down the little chamber with all her thoughts bent upon her wrongs, and the vengeance she must take for them. He should die! He should be given up to the Roundheads! Nay—that would touch her father's honour; there should be no treason in his house. She would face him herself, and tell him all, and then he should die!

The knocking grew louder, and she stopped and gazed vacantly around her. Her heart was burning like a red-hot coal and sickened her with pain; her dress was disarranged, and her beautiful hair hung loose over her shoulders; with haggard eyes she saw the letters lying on the floor, and mechanically picked them up and hid them in her bosom, and then cried hoarsely, "Who is there?"

"It is I, Mistress Barbara," cried old Marion, from outside. "Let me in, dear heart; I have heavy news for you."

Barbara drew back the heavy bolt and let in her old nurse—a withered, nut-brown old woman, down whose deep-lined cheeks the tears were running fast.

"Oh, my dear lamb!" she cried, "I have ill news for you —the Lord help you to bear it!"

Barbara had sunk down upon a seat in the window, and turned her eyes slowly upon the old woman without a word.

"There is one just ridden hither with news from your father, who is safe and well, God be thanked for it! but he sends word that he fears lest Sir Ralph be taken prisoner by the bloody Roundheads—a murrian on them—or else slain. He was last seen fighting among them, one against many; and now no man can find a trace of him. Alack! alack!" cried Marion, bursting out into renewed sobs and tears; "he was the properest gentleman my eyes ever rested upon; always gallant and gay, and a pleasant word and a 'God save you' for every one, and now to think he may be stark and stiff, with a pike-thrust through his brave heart!"

Barbara stared at her silently for a heavy moment. Thick and fast beat her heart—the quick throbs seemed to echo through the chamber. Lost! Dead! Yes, to all but her. What did he say yester eve? In her hands? Yes, he was her prisoner; and there before her lay the little key which alone would open the heavy door. Her stony face flashed suddenly into terrible resolve. "Yes, he is dead!" she cried, and, rising, she flung the key out of the window into the well that lay beneath. It fell with a splash into the dark water; one little splash, and a few ripples slowly widening out, and then nothing. Nothing to show that a man's life had been thrown away.

"Come, take something to eat," said Marion.

"I want nothing—leave me," said Barbara, turning away.

"You want nothing? Well, it will not be long ere you come and want your dinner. A young thing like you must eat, when all's said and done—and hunger is hard to bear." The old woman turned to go away.

Barbara stood as if stricken to stone. "Hunger is hard to bear." The consequences of her hasty deed rose up before her in all their horror. To die—that was just! But to be hungry—to starve! The lamp would go out. The darkness would be thick all round him. He would cry to her in the dark to save him and no one would hear.

"He would starve in the dark. I forgot!—I forgot!—I did not mean that," she cried in a hoarse whisper. She clutched at her throat, but her voice was husky and died away. Oh, the despair that shone out of her great eyes!

"Sweetheart, sweetheart, what is it?" cried old Marion, rushing to her side.

But Mistress Barbara suddenly found voice, and, with a heartbroken cry of "Ralph!" she fell upon the floor with a scarlet stream of blood staining her white skin and snowy linen.

And in the confusion that followed, and the mourning grief for the dead girl, all trace of Sir Ralph was lost for ever. He had disappeared from the face of the earth; and if cries, entreaties, or prayers echoed in that hidden vault, there were none to hear. And in a day or two, even while Mistress Barbara lay dressed for her burial, they must have grown fainter and fainter, and at last dropped into silence, in the dark and alone.

My Dear Old Friend

I HAD just come out of the Army and Navy Stores, and was threading my way through the somewhat unnecessary collection of dogs that besiege the entrance to that otherwise excellently conducted institution, when I caught sight of a face that seemed familiar to me. It was that of a man about my own age, with bronzed features and a somewhat attenuated figure. As I was trying to recall when and where I had seen him before, our eyes met, and I immediately perceived that our recognition had been mutual; for he came towards me with a frank expression of pleasure and held out his hand, saying, "Halloa, old fellow, who'd have thought of seeing you here?"

I don't know why he said this, and of course I don't attempt to defend it; but it is a style of address affected by some men who are as profoundly astonished if they meet you in the Gaiety Restaurant as if they had run across you in the mines of Siberia or the exercise yard of Millbank Prison. I felt a little bit annoyed at his want of originality; however, I smiled pleasantly, and said, as I shook hands, "Well, if you come to that, who'd have thought of seeing you here?"

We stood opposite each other for a few seconds—I simpering somewhat emptily at the nature of our greeting, and struggling to recall his name; and he with his head slightly on one side and an expression of courteously suppressed amusement on his face, as if my presence on the steps of the Army and Navy Stores was one of those inexplicable freaks of chance for which it is hopeless to seek to assign any reasonable law.

I gave him a few seconds to digest his astonishment; and then, feeling that the silence was becoming a little embarrassing, I said, inconsistently, "Well, what have you been doing all this time?"

"Well," he replied, "I've been in India, you know."

"Oh, ah!" I ejaculated, as if it had for a moment slipped my memory. "Why, you went out"—and I hesitated, as though calculating the exact day of his departure.

"Three years ago," he put in shortly, "and quite long enough too."

I ran over in my mind my acquaintances of three years ago, but could recall no trace of a recollection of my new companion; so, to gain time and to gather fresh imformation, I asked "And what sort of a time have you had?"

"Oh, much about the same as before," he answered, with a slightly puzzled air.

I candidly admit that the sensible thing for me to have done would have been to have owned up and admitted that I had forgotten my friend's personality. Unfortunately I am one of those painfully constituted people who shrink with nervous horror from anything in the nature of an explanation; and, in addition, I felt that I had gone too far to cry off without some appearance of insincerity. Besides, he seemed to congratulate himself so warmly upon what he insisted upon looking on as our providential meeting that my lips were sealed, and I felt confirmed in the idea that if I let things slide a little longer his name would recur to my mind.

He had slipped his arm through mine, as we walked along, with an easy sense of goodfellowship, and said, "Of course, you'll dine with me this evening. Now, don't say you are engaged," he added, as I hesitated for an instant between my desire to have more of my companion and my disinclination to dine under false pretences; "you know they'll be awfully disappointed if they hear I have met you and let you off without a long jaw, and I join them to-morrow."

I felt constrained to consent against my better judgment, and added in a playfully solicitous manner, "And how are they all?"

"Oh! they are all tip-top—all except the Colonel," after a pause and with a slightly subdued air. "I don't think he has ever quite got over that affair." Then he added abruptly, "I hope you don't think he came badly out of that business?" His hand seemed to relax its pressure on my arm, as if he was preparing himself for some censure or coldness on my part.

I felt touched by this little proof of his sensitiveness to my good opinion, and pressed his fingers as I rejoined warmly, "I never heard any one speak otherwise than highly of his conduct in the matter."

He stopped and said shortly, "Why, who knows anything about it? I thought you and I had it all to ourselves."

"Yes, yes," I faltered; and added inconsequently, "You know you have been away for some time, old fellow."

It did not seem to fit in very well; but he accepted it as an argument, and said, "There is something in that; but don't let people talk about it. I know he relies upon you and me."

There was something so touching in the reliance of this unknown, that a glow of sympathetic affection warmed my heart, and I resolved on the spot that his confidence should not be misplaced. Come what might, the secret of that old man's life should never be betrayed by me.

We had turned into the Criterion Restaurant for a bit of dinner, and those thoughts passed through my mind as we ate our fish. My companion pondered sadly for a few seconds; and then, shaking himself together as though to throw off an unpleasant train of thought, said more easily, "Now tell me more about yourself and your wife and family."

Before I had time to reflect what might be the result of my disclosure, I blurted out the simple truth, "I have no wife."

He looked intensely surprised as he said, "My dear fellow, I am very sorry. I never heard——" He paused inquiringly, and again I blurted out, "I never had one."

A look of extreme pain spread over his face as he heard this. He leaned across the table, and, laying his hand on mine, said with infinite sympathy, "I see it all; I ought not to have asked you. Forgive me, old fellow, and forget that I have said those words."

I gave him a clammy hand and turned away, lest he should detect the conscious guiltiness of my face. I had become confirmed in a suspicion that had been gradually dawning upon my mind, that I had never set eyes upon my host before that day, and that I had been carried away by some inexplicable chance resemblance to some remote acquaintance and by his own apparent cordial recognition of myself.

There was no blinking the facts, however. Everybody that he mentioned was a total stranger to me; whilst every incident that I mentioned with a view to drawing him out seemed to find his mind a blank.

The dinner was good, the wine excellent, and my host geniality itself. We sat late, and drank freely, and over our cups I blush to think of the people I married, the old friends I buried, and the characters I took away. But he would have news, and what was I to do? Much of my information seemed to afford him matter for astonishment, and often he ejaculated, "You don't tell me so," as I conveyed some specially startling piece of news.

However, the time for departure came at last, and my mind was torn with conflicting desires to escape detection and to ascertain his identity. "You'll come and see me," he said cordially, as we parted.

"Yes, certainly," I replied; "but where are you putting up now?"

"Oh, the same old quarters," he returned.

"What is the best way to get there?" I asked as a last hope.

"You can't do better than take a cab," he said; and we parted, never to meet again.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 330.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 27, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A DRAMATIC REVENGE.

ABOUT eleven years ago I was in Paris for the first time. Louis Napoleon was at Chislehurst, and the many adventurers, good, bad, and indifferent in character, who had served him had not yet lost all hope of the return of their patron, and, consequently, had not yet thought it worth while to settle down into peace and quietness.

Young Alexis de Malladine, whom I frequently met at a café which I frequented, was an exceedingly nice fellow, and although he thought that France was the finest land on earth, and that his countrywomen were the best specimens of their sex, he had, by some means or other, become more attached to Alice Rae, a young American lady of my acquaintance, who, since the conclusion of peace with Germany, had, with her mother, taken up her abode not far from the house in which the ex-captain resided.

I was alone in the French capital, and had but few friends there save Mrs. Rae, her daughter Alice, and Alexis, and so it happened that I passed a good deal of my time in the society of these three.

If there was no formal engagement between the two, it was at least a perfectly well understood thing by all the parties concerned that, as soon as Alexis should get an appointment for which at the time he was a candidate, he was to marry Alice; and I, although only a few years her senior, was to give her away at the altar.

One night the opera-house was crowded more than usual. A great singer was to appear, and a new work, by a renowned composer, was to be performed.

Alexis de Malladine, sitting in the stalls, seemed scarcely to listen to the music or to notice the acting, and his eyes were much more often turned in the direction of my box than in that of the stage.

Struck Alexis in the face with his glove.

Alice and her mother were there with me; and, as the curtain fell at the conclusion of the first act, Alexis came up to us.

He was in high spirits, for he had just heard that the Minister had decided to give him the coveted post, and he expected to hear in a few days that his appointment had been agreed to by the President.

We congratulated him; and, as he left us to return to his seat, my box being very small, I said to him:

"You'll be a happy man in a month or two now, Alexis."

He smiled and shut the door.

We watched him as he threaded his way to his seat. It was in the centre of the second row from the orchestra, and he had left his opera-glasses on the fauteuil in order to show that it was occupied; but, during his absence, a tall, military-looking man had appropriated it, and had coolly put the glasses on one side.

Alexis approached the stranger with the utmost politeness, and, I suppose—for, naturally, I could not hear—requested him to move.

The interloper, however, did not deign to answer, but sneeringly looked up at De Malladine as though to ask him what he meant by his intrusion.

Alexis pointed to the opera-glasses; yet the stranger neither replied nor moved but appeared as though he did not hear.

I saw that matters were assuming a dangerous complexion, for in the new comer I recognised Louis de la Breton, an ex-officer, like Alexis; a notorious bully, and one of the most celebrated duellists in France.

But what could I do? I could only sit still, much against my will, and witness the inevitable consequences.

I thought that poor Alice would faint when De la Breton rose in the calmest way before the crowded assemblage and struck Alexis in the face with his glove; but she recovered herself, and, pale as a statue, watched her lover pick up his opera-glasses, bow to his insulter, and without a word leave the building.

There were some suppressed exclamations from the audience, but these were hushed when the duellist again rose, gazed around him, mockingly imitated De Malladine's parting bow, and with a smile resumed his seat.

This was too much for Alice. She could remain no longer; she must go home. And so, with some difficulty, I got her and her mother to a carriage, told the coachman to drive them home, and myself walked quickly, and with much misgiving, to De Malladine's lodging.

He had arrived before me, and was waiting when I entered his room.

"Of course," he said, as he saw me, and rose, "you, my dear friend, will assist me. It is impossible to do anything save fight. Even Alice could not make me alter my conviction upon that point—the insult was so public."

"Why not leave the country?" I suggested.

"Then I should have to surrender my appointment and Alice, too. No, my dear fellow, I am a Frenchman, and I must fight; and, moreover, you must arrange the particulars for me. If he shoots me, it cannot be helped. If I shoot him, I shall have shot one of the biggest scoundrels in Paris. I beg you to call upon De la Breton to-night. I have already discovered his address. Here it is."

"But must you really fight? It is suicide to fight with a professional duellist."

"Ah!" he said, shaking his head, "I am afraid that it is suicide; but fight I must, so, please, do not try to persuade me that I need not. And I will fight, too, as soon as possible. You can arrange everything for to-morrow morning. I must have the matter over. In a day or two I might be a coward."

By his looks he implored me to go to De la Breton; and, constituted as French society was, and still is, I had no other course open to me than to do as he wished.

"If monsieur comes from Monsieur Alexis de Malladine," said a man-servant when I inquired whether I could see his master, "Monsieur De la Breton has sent to say that he does not propose to leave the opera until after the performance is over. He has, however, despatched this pencilled note, which I am instructed to give to the gentleman who came from Monsieur De Malladine."

"I tore open the missive, which contained two cards, one bearing the name of the duellist, and the other that of Monsieur Ferdinand de Jarnac, Rue Vivienne 18. Certainly, it was an off hand way of acquainting me with the name and whereabouts of De la Breton's second; but, as I wished to pick no quarrel, I walked on to the Rue Vivienne, and in a few minutes was ushered into the presence of Monsieur De Jarnac himself.

He did not strike me as appearing particularly warlike; but, after formally saluting me, he at once touched upon the object of my visit, and ere I had been ten minutes in his company had arranged to meet De Malladine and myself at a certain spot, dear to duellists, at an early hour next morning, and to bring De la Breton with him.

"I doubt if we shall need a surgeon," he said to me quite affably at parting; "but, if you please, you can bring one. In his last affair my principal shot his man through the temples. Death was instantaneous. I sincerely hope, monsieur, that your friend is as clever. Some men are such bunglers. I trust that we shall see a pretty piece of work in the morning."

"Confound the fellow!" I said to myself as I left the house and sought the residence of my own doctor. "I am afraid that poor De Malladine is not such a consummate murderer as De la Breton."

After seeing the surgeon, to whom I briefly explained matters, I hurried to Mrs. Rae's house. She was doing her best to comfort her daughter, who was in the greatest possible distress.

"Are they going to fight?" she asked me.

"My dear Alice," I said, "they are. I have done my best to dissuade Alexis, but he says, and I am obliged to agree with him, that he must fight. Let us hope for the best. He has a sure eye and a steady hand, and he has right on his side. The other man is a scoundrel."

"You are to be with him?" asked Mrs. Rae, looking as white as a sheet.

"Yes; they are to meet to-morrow morning, and by breakfast time Alice's suspense will be over. She must bear up."

"You must prevent the duel," sobbed the half-heartbroken girl. "Cannot Alexis let the insult pass? But no. It was so public."

"You can only hope," I said. "I will see you in the morning; but now I must go back to him and see that he gets some sleep."

"Tell him," cried Alice, "that if he is killed, I shall die. Come here directly it is over. Come even if he falls; you must tell me about him. I must hear everything."

She buried her face in her hands; and I, escaping from the scene, hastened back to Alexis. He was still waiting; and his hair was in disorder, and his face pale when he looked up at me.

"I am no coward," he said with a smile; "I am saying good-bye to her, for I shall die to-morrow."

"My dear fellow," I exclaimed, "you will shoot De la Breton, and be married next month. Finish your writing at once, and go to bed. I will sleep to-night on your sofa, for I must see that you turn out in time to-morrow morning, so be as quick as possible."

He wrote for another half-hour, addressed the document to Alice Rae, placed a lock of his hair within it, and, after sealing it up, gave it to me.

"Give that to her," he said, "if De la Breton kills me outright, and I know that he will. If it were not for Alice, I declare that I should feel quite glad to meet him. Now for bed."

He undressed, whilst I lay down on a sofa in the next room and lighted a cigar; for, upon reflection, I decided that I could not afford to sleep that night.

Soon all was still, and I stole in, to find Alexis lying as quiet as a child, with a smile upon his lips. Probably I passed a more uncomfortable night than he did. Only with the greatest possible difficulty could I keep awake, and the hours seemed to linger for ever.

At last, however, daylight dawned, and I called De Malladine, who awoke refreshed and in comparatively good spirits.

After a hurried breakfast, we muffled ourselves up. I placed a flask of brandy, some cartridges and a brace of pistols in my pockets, and we sallied forth into the cold morning air.

Scarcely anyone, save a sleepy sergeant here and there, was abroad; and through the silent streets we went for a mile or so, until we reached the meeting place in the Bois de Boulogne.

De la Breton and De Jarnac were there before us, and my friend, the surgeon, arrived immediately afterwards in his carriage, which waited near at hand.

The pistols were produced and loaded. De la Breton chose one, and I handed the other to De Malladine, and then the two men took up positions at a distance of ten paces from each other, and waited for De Jarnac to give the signal to fire.

"Stay!" cried the bully: "let the young fellow listen; I'm not trifling with him. Where would he like to be hit? I am generous, parbleu!

"If I do not kill you," said Alexis, quietly, "I prefer to die."

"Then I will shoot you through the heart," coolly observed De la Breton. "It will teach other fools not to challenge me."

There was something to me unspeakably horrible in the way in which these last words were pronounced. I shuddered and looked at Alexis. He smiled at me, and almost at the same instant De Jarnac gave the signal.

It was as I had feared. De Malladine missed his aim, and De la Breton's bullet told. Poor Alexis turned round towards me with fixed eyes and pale face, and, with the name of Alice on his lips, fell dead.

De la Breton sneeringly departed at once in company with De Jarnac, while I aided the surgeon in his hasty examination of De Malladine's body.

Surely enough, the bullet had passed through his heart. He must have died immediately, for he did not move after he fell, and the last smile with which he had looked at me was still upon his face.

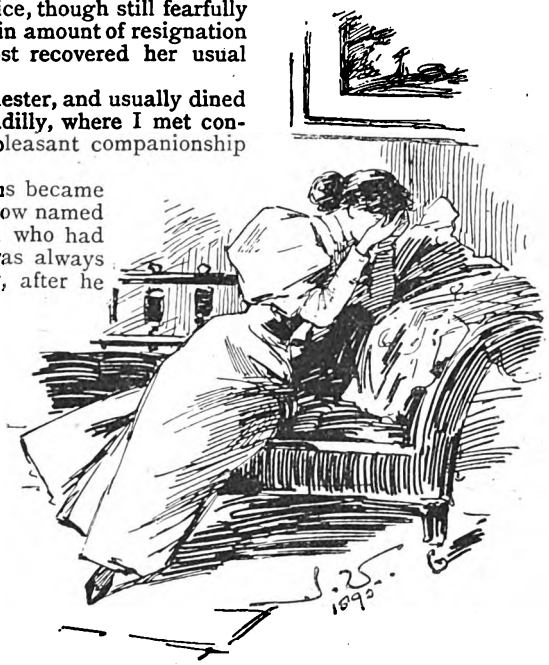
It was a melancholy business in every respect. I had to break the sad news as best I could to Alice and her mother, and the two ladies were so completely overcome that I feared lest the shock might have a permanent effect upon their health.

For my part, I was obliged to hurry home to England as soon as possible; and De la Breton, I heard, also got away, and remained out of France for a few months until the affair had blown over.

I kept up a correspondence with Mrs. Rae, and was glad, after a time, to hear from her that Alice, though still fearfully upset, had learned to look with a certain amount of resignation upon her misfortune, and had almost recovered her usual health.

Meanwhile I settled down in Manchester, and usually dined at one of the restaurants near Piccadilly, where I met congenial spirits, and was able to get pleasant companionship as well as good dinners.

Among the men with whom I thus became acquainted was a young Glasgow fellow named Bond, a dare-devil sort of a fellow, who had travelled all the world over, and was always thirsting for excitement. One day, after he had been dining with me, the conversation turned upon French manners and customs, and I happened to tell him the story of poor De Malladine's death—a matter in which Bond appeared to be much interested. He asked me a good many questions about all the persons concerned, and, finally, the subject having dropped, and, it being very late, we separated.



She buried her face in her hands.

Next day, at the restaurant, Bond did not appear. Weeks passed, and then months, and still he did not dine there; so I concluded that he had returned to Glasgow. And I confess that I had begun to forget him altogether, when one evening he dropped in and took his old seat, just as though he had occupied it regularly, and had seen me only on the previous day.

"Where have you been?" I asked, after I had heartily shaken hands with him.

"I have been over to Paris," he said. "Do you remember De la Breton? On my arrival I found out a little more than you told me about him; and when I had thoroughly convinced myself that he was an even greater blackguard than you had described, I took a course of lessons at a shooting gallery. Every day for a month I went and practised for an hour or two, until I was able to hit a sixpence every time at a distance of ten paces. I then took a box at the opera; it may have been the very same box that you had that night. It was the first performance of Verdi's 'Aïda.' De la Breton was pointed out to me. He sat in the stalls.

"Between the acts he left his seat in order to speak to a lady in another part of the house. As quickly as possible I descended and took his place. He returned, and asked me in a bullying tone to move. I refused. He persisted. I struck him. He sent me a challenge, and we met curiously enough in the Bois and upon the very same spot where he had killed your friend De Malladine.

"Before the signal was given, I said, 'Monsieur de la Breton, listen to me. I am not trifling with you. Where would you like to be hit? I am generous—as much as you were to Alexis de Malladine.' He turned a deadly white."

"'We will see,' he said, 'whether I shall not make a second De Malladine of you.' 'Never mind,' I returned, 'I will do my best and shoot you through the heart as you shot him. It will teach other bullies not to challenge me.' I suppose that upset him. His aim was spoilt, and I shot him dead, right through the heart and avenged your friend, at the same time ridding Paris of her biggest villain!"

"Well done, Bond!" I exclaimed.

"Wait," he said, "until I finish the drama. We managed to keep the matter very quiet; and before leaving France I was able to call on Mrs. Rae, who is now at Boulogne, for I had a letter of introduction to her from a Parisian acquaintance. When I first saw her, she knew nothing of the affair, but they read of the matter in the newspapers, and then they didn't know how to make enough of me.

"I found Alice to be a pretty girl, somewhat spoilt by her long mourning, and very little inclined to listen to me; but after three weeks, sir, of hard persuasion, she gave in, and she and her mother are now coming over next month. I believe you were to give Alice away at the altar. When she arrives you will have a chance."

"And," I said, shaking the chivalric fellow's hand, "I shall be delighted."

AGAINST HER OWN SOUL.

I.

REGINALD HAYDEN slammed his door, and ran down the steps at full speed on to the pavement. He was always in a hurry.

A lady passing at the moment stepped back, stared at him, and pressed both hands over her heart.

He raised his hat apologetically.

"I beg your pardon, I am afraid I startled you."

He saw before him a blonde in black; to his masculine eye the most charming combination. Her pale face flushed scarlet, and her eyes glittered under her level brows, as they met his in the morning sunshine.

"My nerves are unstrung, or I should not start so violently at nothing," she replied, slightly bending her head, as she passed on rapidly. He watched the lithe young figure turn the corner of the Square, contrasting her with the insignificant and common-place foot passengers hurrying to and fro in the vicinity of South Kensington.

He wished he had not frightened her. It was abominable to startle a pathetic creature with blue eyes and a tremulous smile. Her face haunted him all that morning, and he found himself thinking again and again of the trivial incident on the pavement. Had he followed those quick, even footsteps, he would have seen them flag suddenly, and the graceful form stagger against the nearest railing, clinging to the iron for support. Janette Gilma felt numb from head to foot, as she stood with compressed lips and staring eyes—the victim of overpowering emotion.

"What a fool I am!" she exclaimed at last, loosening her collar, and breathing freely once more. "I see Douglas in everyone—and yet how like!" She glanced back meditatively. "Yes, it was his face, and yet not his face—poor comfort for a starving soul! Why seek the dead among the living?"

She clenched her hands. "No—not the dead!" She repeated the words to herself vehemently, and a strange gleam shot from her tearful eyes. "If he lives," she murmured, "then am I the most miserable among women; and if he is dead——."

Her face blanched with agony. There could be only a long, blank, hopeless "nevermore" in answer to that question.

"Oh, for one look—one word!" she cried pleadingly, renewing her walk under the prosaic shadow of town-built houses. Yet her mind was far away in the fresh air of a Swiss village, laden with the odour of pines. She could see the soft loveliness of tree-clad mountains, and, beyond those, cruel ranges of icy splendour, whose jaws had devoured the joy of her life; while below the white death pinnacles a winding river gleamed in a valley. Passers-by turned to look on the beauty of the girl's set face, but she saw only the eyes of the stranger who had startled her so much in Courtfield Gardens.

II.

ONE of the numerous underground trains had drawn up at Earl's Court Station, and a small crowd rushed down the steps to catch it. Just as the signal came for departure and the gate was closing, a man pushed his way through, springing into the train as it steamed from the platform. The man was Reginald Hayden, and the only other occupant of the carriage oddly enough—Janette Gilma.

As their eyes met they both remembered the incident of the morning, though it was now late in the afternoon.

The girl looked at him with a quiet steady gaze. She was still attired in simple black, and there lurked in her expression a presentiment of evil that he could not understand. Had she some strange mesmeric power in her sweet, grave smile? That unknown influence of the mind which one living being has over another. Could she bend men to her control? Was it personal magnetism, or merely the outward form of physical beauty which quickened his breathing and stirred his blood.

He started visibly as she leant forward and addressed him in a voice whose soft low accents fulfilled the promise of the fair face.

"Excuse me," she said, speaking with effort, "but are you related to Douglas Hayden?"

"Certainly. You know him?" replied Reginald, his interest now actively roused.

Her head fell back on the cushions, her fingers clenched. She was white to the lips, and after a moment's pause, spoke in breathless anxiety.

"Is he alive?" she cried, and her voice rang out through the carriage like the wail of a tortured soul.

"Oh! yes. Douglas is very much alive to-day," he replied. "Did you notice the resemblance between us? We are twin brothers."

"Twin brothers!"

"Yes. Where did you meet him?"

"I will tell you," she continued, passionately, a righteous anger nerving her, in spite of the dull sorrow at her heart. "Last summer I was introduced to him for the first time in Switzerland."

"Ah, I remember, he was away some months."

"We were staying on the borders of a blue lake, and in that summer paradise he awoke the first love of my young life. He won it fairly and honestly, and I confess to it without shame. When I love," looking searchingly at him, "I love indeed! There are no half measures. He must have wearied of my devotion—for we were to be married in a little church on the hill side at the close of the following month, when, as I believed, he met his death. He was desperately fond of mountaineering, and left me for a series of excursions, promising to be absent only a week.

"One day I received a letter saying he was just starting on an expedition—without guides, or ropes, or human aid—to see how far he could climb alone. It sounded foolhardy, and I was frightened, but tried to shake off the idea, and forget the danger to which he was recklessly exposing himself. He never returned, and, far up on the edge of a precipice they found his alpenstock, and below, on a sharp rock, his hat, beneath which lay depths unfathomable! The wanderer was lost.

"I tried to believe what they told me; I tried to think for my own sake that he had died on those bleak towers of silence, but I couldn't—I couldn't! Love was still burning in my heart, and again and again it whispered a doubt—a suspicion of the truth. But nevertheless the man I worshipped was verily and indeed separated from me for ever. He was either lifeless in his grave of snow, or else a shameless and hypocritical deceiver, who had cruelly wronged and deserted me.

"I cannot say which alternative was the worst. I have tried to feel resigned, but resignation with some natures is impossible. I have battled against my sorrow night and day, crying out for peace and self-control, but his face is always before me—your face, with the deep set eyes and clear cut features. For Heaven's sake, say if there is any hope for me in the future? What did I do to deserve such treatment?"

"Douglas was always the same," said his brother bitterly. "Changeable and evanescent!—a rolling stone from his boyhood. Forget him if you would hope to find the peace you speak of."

His tone grew suddenly tender and pleading, as the tears welled into Janette's eyes.

"Forget! Is there such a word?"

"Yes—when coupled with youth, health, and beauty."

Digitized by Google

"Not till we reach the land where all things are forgotten!"

A touch of poetic dreaminess crept over the girl's face.

"He is not worthy of your remembrance!" declared Reginald, a hot flush upon his brow. "Will you still grieve when I tell you that this very morning I stood by him at the altar rails, and heard him swear everlasting fidelity to another woman?"

"Married—and to-day?" she almost hissed, tottering to her feet, while a horrible contortion passed over her face.

"Will you forget him now?" asked Reginald gravely.

"Yes," she replied with a sharp cry. "Yes, a thousand times yes!"

The man gazed appalled at the face of woe that confronted him. "I will find forgetfulness here!"

Her whispered words froze his blood, as an instant later Janette's hand was at the door-fastening. She flung it open, springing upon the step, ready to hurl herself forward into the darkness of the gloomy tunnel. Eternity yawned at her feet, but she only saw the end of misery within her grasp, while her hands, clinging a moment to dear life, relaxed their hold, as she surrendered herself to the pit of destruction and the dust of death. A rushing whirlwind was in her ears, the thunder of a hundred storms seemed booming and bursting in fury over her soul, but that moment's hesitation had saved her, and Reginald's arms were clasping the swaying figure, which now fought for freedom and eternity with almost superhuman strength. Yet Reginald was strong, and maintained his grip round the slim form, dragging her back with a mighty effort.

A convulsive shudder passed over her, as she sank half fainting upon the seat. A deadly snow sleepiness, such as befalls mountaineers, seemed to be creeping through Janette's frame. She fancied herself stumbling over ice-bound rocks, while before her eyes pinnacle upon pinnacle towered in the morning sun. Down a black rift a gleaming glacier hurled its shattered crystals over a deep precipice, in the depths of which a man's face smiled cynically upon the misery of a stricken woman!

Then her eyes opened, and she saw Reginald, radiant with compassion, bending over her. She doubted whether after all she had not been asleep and dreaming from the first, till gradually the sense of her injuries returned, and she started up, burning with indignation.

"Why did you do it?" she asked hoarsely. "I wanted to die. What right had you to stop me?"

A look of yearning stole into the man's face, as he took her little trembling hand with infinite tenderness. His strength in contact with her weakness broke down Janette's cowardly spirit, as he answered in quick unhesitating tones:

"Live for me!"

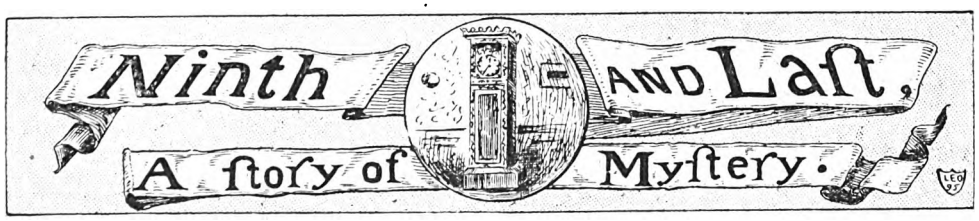
The three words vibrated with deadly earnestness and sincerity, while he read in her expression a sudden joyful submission.

He knew he could trust her then, and flinging wide the door, pointed to the outer darkness, and the filthy grime of an underground tunnel.

"Here is Life—there is Death," he said. "Choose!"

A sweet smile illuminated the stranger's face—and she chose!



WOULD it astonish you to meet a man who had stepped right out of the heart of the sixteenth century? Not an intangible ghost; but real flesh and blood, clothed in the garments of those far-away times, and trailing down to the present all the symbols and traditions of the Renaissance era of Michel Angelo and Aristo. I met that man and made him my friend. Some might call it a mere illusion; but, if seeing is believing, the touch of the hand, the sound of the voice, and the influence of a great wide-reaching spirit must surely convince me.

Five years ago I returned from four years of research in the furthermost parts of the globe. With my note-books filled with valuable scientific material, I settled upon Paris as a place of residence, and set up my modest lares in the cosiest of chambers overlooking a large square in a fashionable part of the city.

I had no more than started upon my solitary labours, when I realised the necessity of a companion—not one of flesh and blood, man or beast, for I was ever a solitary from my earliest days; but something whose companionship I could enjoy without the necessity of reciprocation. Selfish as this now appears to me, I was actuated by the most exacting jealousy of a student nature, ardent in research and zealous in the pursuit of every trifling detail. I ran through the catalogue of man's best friends in solitude, and finally hit upon a grandfather's clock.

I visited several curio dealers, easily finding what I wanted, but at a price beyond my reach. Then I hit upon the expedient of advertising; but for months heard nothing from my little "Want" in a metropolitan daily.

One day—whether in answer to my advertisement or through the kindness of friends, I cannot say—but I received a curious document written upon paper that might have been made during the dark ages; but the chirography was remarkably clear, and in old Italian word-print.

It informed me that a most remarkable clock was to be had at a house in a town thirty miles away. My eyes were riveted on the curious sheet. So quaint an epistle had never before come into my hands. How strange it all was! And what a queer and mystifying aroma clung to it! Naturally, I wondered a long time what manner of man it was that had sent it to me.

The next day I lost no time in making my way to the little town of F——. I took a carriage, for the house of which I was in search stood some distance from the station.

My driver was very taciturn till we reached it, and then he turned his inquiring face upon me, and said, "Sir, you cannot possibly mean there!"

"Yes," I replied; "why not?"

"Mon Dieu!" was all he muttered; then he stopped short, let me out, lashed up his horses, and was out of sight without once glancing back.

I smiled at the coward—partially, I confess, to still the beatings of my own heart—and then surveyed the surroundings. I stood before a bleak stone cottage, half hidden in a jungle of scrub, oaks, and undergrowth, and as bespeaking of life as a crater on the moon. Lest I should be awed by my own gathering chimeras, I leapt the fence—for the gate was secured with a chain of antique make.

Three times I went round that closed and barred house before I found a loophole that looked as if it had ever served a human footstep, and that sort of mantrap led into the cellar. I gave it a quick knock or two with my walking stick, a chill passing over me as the reverberations rumbled through the empty halls and chambers above, like the trump of Gabriel roaring through the catacombs.

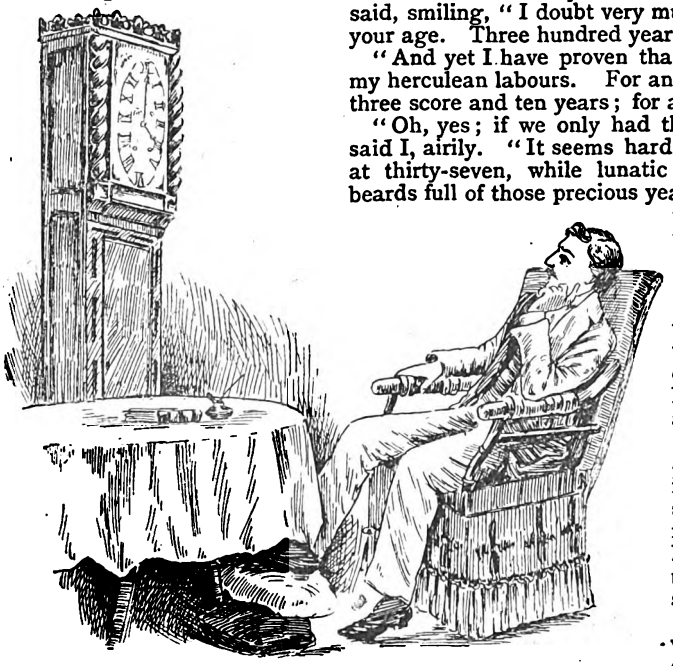
Ten minutes I waited, irresolute, wavering. What manner of being, mortal, or fiend was I to encounter? I was almost in such a state of mental turmoil as to turn tail and run; when, with a parting bang, I brought a step to the other side of the little door. Creaking out a harsh protest, a number of bolts slid back, the portal opened an inch or so, and I was confronted by the most wonderful face that ever man beheld. Never will the recollection of that strange, human, yet superhuman, countenance leave me, so startling was the weird feature, so vivid is the abhorrent memory.

I bore the ordeal of that glittering glance for a moment or two, then thrust the yellow sheet through the crack. A lean hand grasped it, and with a sign of recognition, parted the door to me, as a voice, high-pitched and tremulous with age, entreated, "Come in." Then, with almost trembling step, I passed into the haunted house, and heard the ancient bolts clang behind me.

What an awful transformation! I seemed to have entered another world, another age, another destiny. The very atmosphere was not that of my own clime. It was Italy, yet the Italy I had never known. There was the familiar smoke of Vesuvius mingling with the incense of wild flowers, pervaded still with that subtle spiritual atmosphere of the cloisters and the anchorite's cave temple.

For a moment I could not discern the objects about me with distinctness, and then, one by one, strange forms came out of the dense shadow—a mad confusion of antique missals, globes and retorts, ancient works of art, and implements of every kind of research. At last, in one corner, I beheld the object of my visit—the old clock, tall, gaunt, spectral, and hooded like a Benedictine almsgatherer. Its face was yellow with age, but strangely, startlingly human.

The old man, perceiving me silent and rooted to the floor, beckoned me to a bench, for there were no chairs, and instantly brought me a flagon of red wine, filling a glass and setting it before me. I raised the ancient flagon in my trembling fingers, the aroma of the wine recalling the lava-flavour of the rarest Chianti vintage. "To our bargain, sir!" I murmured faintly, pledging him good health, and draining the glass to the very dregs.



I could sit hours before it in supreme content.

"The clock;" said he, without further ado, as if he wished to rid himself speedily of an unwelcome intruder. "There it is!"

"It is a good specimen. What is its value?"

The old man winced as if the thought of money were an insult in connection with such a treasure. "More than you or any other man can pay," he said calmly, "I will give it to you."

"Give it to me!" I echoed in amazement.

"Yes. I no longer have any use for it here. It belonged to my father—Francesco Guicciardini, the philosopher."

"I know of but one great Guicciardini," I interposed, ransacking my memory; "It was he of whom Charles V. was kind enough to say that he could make a hundred Spanish grandees in a minute, but a Guicciardini comes only once in a century!"

"True! true! But you are a scholar, my friend," cried the old anchorite, his face illumined with a certain joy; "that man was my father."

"But he passed from this earth some three hundred and fifty years ago," I returned, with a smile of indulgence for his seeming error.

"Yes; he was, nevertheless, my father," was the calm and proud-spoken rejoinder. "But the clock; will you take it, my young friend? You will be serving God and man a great end."

I peered into his withered old face, trying to comprehend the mystifying remarks. Then for the first time I perceived the startling resemblance between the ancient heirloom in the corner and the face of this weird type before me. Whether the clock had been fashioned into the features of the man, or the man had grown to look like the gaunt old time-dispenser in the shadow beyond, I could not divine. They were alike as twins.

Half-an-hour later I had promised to take the treasured heirloom upon condition that it should be a loan, not a gift, nor a purchase; and that it was to be restored at the request of the owner. With that understanding I retreated to the door. There the tottering old man held out his lean hand to me. "Before you go," said he, "I want you to make me a solemn promise. It is reasonable."

"Then I will do so with pleasure," said I.

"That you will part with the clock to no one, no matter what happens; at least, till you are as old as I am."

"If it be true that you are the great Guicciardini's son," I said, smiling, "I doubt very much whether I shall live to be your age. Three hundred years is a long life."

"And yet I have proven that it is altogether too short for my herculean labours. For an ephemeris, a day; for a man, three score and ten years; for a philosopher, ages."

"Oh, yes; if we only had the adjusting of these matters," said I, airily. "It seems hard that we should lose a Raphael at thirty-seven, while lunatic asylums are filled with greybeards full of those precious years denied to genius. But as to the clock, I will part with it to no one."

"Upon your honour?"

"Upon my honour, sir."

"Thank you." And with that sepulchral sign of gratitude, spoken with fervency inexplicable, I made my retreat like one who had returned from a visit to shadow land.

Two days later, that tall and stately old treasure was standing in one corner of my own study-chamber—the grim witness of many lifetimes of labour, now ticking out the moments of this new era of a scholar's aspirations.

That night I resumed my work by its companionable chimes, but somehow I could not seem to collect my thoughts. A new spirit seemed to have entered this sanctuary of the muse, and entirely made me prisoner. I tried many expedients to collect and record my ideas; but they all baffled me.

I began to think that perhaps the old clock was my bane, and more than once I wished it back in the haunted house of F——. But when that dreary night had passed, the longer the ancient heirloom was my solitary friend through bleak days and wintry nights, the greater was its fascination over me. I feared it; yet that fear was not without a mingling of genuine affection. I found that I could sit hours before it in supreme content, completely hypnotised, irredeemably its captive.

With this strange spiritual influence, there came a certain unmistakable physical alteration which was too convincing to be waved aside as an illusion. I felt that I was growing old. Though not yet thirty, the years began to rain upon me, it seemed, with the very hours.

There was a perceptible halt in my walk after the first week, and crow-foot wrinkles began mapping the land of maturity over my forehead. My skin was drying up like parchment, and so positive was the change that even my best friends began to pass me in the street unknowingly. Doctors shook their heads; it was inexplicable. One night I sat by my hearth pondering upon this alarming state of things, when I looked up at the old clock as it chimed out the midnight hour. Returning my glance again, I caught the reflection of my own face in the mirror at my right, and my heart leapt up.

Heavens! I was growing to look like the old clock!

In amazement and dread, I bent down and covered my face with my hands. I had read that men will often grow to resemble animals, and even inanimate objects with which they are in daily contact; and that, after years of constant companionship, husband and wife, or brother and sister, grow to resemble each other to a wonderful degree.

Again I glanced furtively into the glass, and again the awful similitude staggered me. The old clock had then a very demon's power. It had made the former owner like its very self; now I was to be the victim. The venerable scholar and myself then were brothers in more than kindred sentiments.

After a sleepless night, I arose early, called the concierge, and told him that, as I intended to go out on the Seine that day, I might not return before nightfall. Then I started for F——, resolved then and there to compel the old man to take back his odious gift.

I found him there, alone still, just as if three months had not intervened since my last visit. The same chaos of scientific instruments, the same atmosphere of ancient Italy, the same hospitality. But when my host came closer to me, I found that he was at least twenty years younger in appearance. His step was more steady, his voice had lost that quiver, and he was like one brought back from the very verge of the tomb. I pledged him my health once more, then told him frankly that I was going to send back his clock the following day. He did not seem surprised.

"But your oath, Signore; your oath."

True. I had promised on my honour to part with it to no one under any circumstances, "till I was as old as he was." Then I felt the wrinkles with my finger-tips.

"Verily, it will not be long, then," I murmured.

Once more he filled the glass, and then I left him. I went straight home. It was raining hard. As I came into the lower hall, the concierge paused long enough in his lamp-lighting to inform me that "the old gentleman had just gone up ahead of me."

I looked at him blankly. "What old gentleman?"

"Why the old man who lives with you up there."

I stared at him a moment in silence, then passed up.

"Poor fellow! He is losing his mind."

Entering my chambers, I was astonished to see wet foot-prints near the door. I turned the gas up and examined them. They were not my own. Besides, there was only one key, and that was mine. No; there was another, when I came to think of it; it was in the little drawer of the cabinet. Hastily I drew the drawer forth, and took the mate-key in my hands. It was cold, and there was a spot of mud upon it. My brain whirled. Burglars!

Taking down a brace of pistols, I loaded them stealthily and with care, and started on the exploration. Every conceivable nook, that could hide an intruder, was ransacked; but no burglar could be found. Then I laughed away my fears, ate a light supper, and retired. The next day the old fascination, the old horror, and the dreaded yielding up of a something within me, was resumed, with now no power to escape or forfend it. The old clock was my Nemesis.

After another three months of this torture, I made a second call upon my old friend at F——. I say "old," but that is not by any means the truth. The vigour of a man in the very prime of life was in his veins. That sallow, parchment skin now blushed with the fire and zeal of youth, and he was the deformed transformed.

In consternation I gazed at him—I who had now long passed the prime of life in thought, feeling, and indeed in physical reality. I spoke of the old clock, my voice broken and tremulous; but he put me off with a jest, which sounded all the more horrible in that place dedicated to the severest meditations and pursuits. Sadly then I went back to my chambers, a dog whipped back to his kennel, and resigned myself like one of the Christian martyrs of old.

For four months longer I endured this ordeal. One night, after pondering before my fire till after midnight, I drew the cork from a bottle of my favourite port, filled a glass and tried to drink; but somehow, the old taste was gone. I laid it aside and tried to read; but my eyes watered like those of an old man.

"Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything!" Oh, how bitterly those words piped out in the still midnight! I no longer resisted. Like a child upon the swift-rushing waters of life, I was borne along, unknowing, careless of all the future had in store.

I went to bed; but sleep was not for me. An hour later, I arose and lighted the gas, stirring the dying embers. Oh, the beating of that hollow and mysterious heart in its worm-eaten prison-house—"tick-tock, tick-tock." Would it ever cease? Suddenly I stood before the table, staring at the glass and the dusty bottle. The wine was gone—all of it! I was stunned. My eyes turned towards the door. Had anyone come in? No; the bolts were fast. So—I had drunk the wine myself, and had forgotten it! I was losing memory—that last sweet friend of friendless age.

Resignedly I put out the light, and started to go back to my couch; but the ticking of the old spectre stayed me. Oh, had I but the power to still its awful pulse ere it silenced my own! What a triumph would that be! What a victory! Noiselessly I struggled over towards it, stood one instant before the gaunt spectre, and hesitated.

That moment of hesitancy was my defeat; for the old fascination stole over me, as if in tender homage to one I loved beyond earth and had given up my life to endure, I put my shrunken arms around it, and laid my head confidingly, resignedly upon its beating heart. Suddenly the blood shot into my temples. Heavens! What was that?—Breathing!

A wild moan broke from my lips, my limbs gave way beneath me, and I fell, half fainting to the floor. Then and there in the faint moonlight that streamed through the lattice, I beheld the form of a young man emerge from the very bowels of the old clock and approach me.

"That makes the ninth!" he ejaculated. I stared at him helplessly.

"What! You do not know me? Let me enlighten you;" and with the grim jest, he turned on the gas, full blaze; and I saw it was the mysterious old man of the haunted house at F——, but now a young man of thirty, glowing with health, radiant, daring. "You are the ninth, I say."

"What do you mean? Who are you, and what do you want here?" I cried.

"Did you yourself not ask me how it was that I could be the son of a medical philosopher, three hundred and fifty years of age, and still live? Behold! I have achieved it, as all great things are done in this world, by the sacrifice of the many to the triumph of the few. It took five million lives to make a Napoleon, ten million were sacrificed to make a Cæsar. Philosophy is not so exacting; but it requires a thousand life-times to achieve the absolute, a thousand in succession. My father's legacy to me was this great problem unsolved.

"But he also left me this clock of the Fathers, in which time runs backward at hundred-fold speed to one concealed within, providing there can be found a willing sacrifice. You were that sacrifice. But think to what greater good than all your little life could achieve, this sacrifice has been. Good night, my friend! You have done well, and have my blessing. I shall send for the old clock when you are dead. It must serve me many another lifetime yet. Good night."

I listened to his sprightly and familiar footsteps as they echoed on the stair. So! The last of youth and hope were gone, and only the hulk remained. Yes, but the ninth sacrifice shall be the last, though the absolute be near attained. Struggling to my feet, with almost superhuman effort, I raised the window to my right—wide, wide open. Then I began rocking the old spectre in the corner, till, with one mighty effort, I hurled the demon over against the window, where it wavered a moment, and fell out crashing to the pavement below, dashed to a thousand pieces.

Just then I heard a wild wail in the distance and the hurrying of feet; and when I leaned over the window-casement and gazed down, I saw a young man bending over the fragments, wringing his hands and sobbing.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.—Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and Geoffrey's friend.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Byngham—An army officer, and cousin to Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love for Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook.

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger which threatens himself and the General's household. In view of the condition of affairs, Sir Arthur visits his lawyer to make his will, and, learning from him that his cousin, Captain Byngham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Byngham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty.

CHAPTER X.

A Queer Mephistopheles.

It was the morning of Friday, the ninth of June, the day when the strangely assorted party brought together at Seacombe Towers, was to disperse.

Lord Lavington's yacht, the Aurora, was to sail at dawn next morning; and her owner had considerately telegraphed to the General to say that a boat would be waiting for him and Miss Chetwynd, so that they might come on board at any hour that suited them. This made it unnecessary for the General to hurry the departure of any of his guests.

Emily and Jane Stoddart were the first to go. They left soon after breakfast, highly delighted with their visit.

"I have enjoyed myself so much, dear!" cried Emily as she stood in the hall with one of Leila's hands clasped in both her own. "Good-bye!" [Kiss on right cheek.] "And so has Jane. And we hope you will have a lovely time on the yacht. I feel sure you will." [Kiss on left cheek.] "And you'll come and tell us all about it, dear, the moment you come back; now, won't you?" [Kiss on right cheek.] "Good-bye again, dear!" [Kiss on left cheek.]

The Rajah stood regarding this exhibition with an expression of mild interest. It was to him another example of the incomprehensible nature of the Occidental races. Probably he never suspected that the scene was partly enacted for his benefit.

"Good-bye."

He shook hands with Emily with a cold, grave politeness. Jane thought that when her turn came there was a look of respectful, and almost tender, regret in his fine, dark eyes. She herself was forced to drop her own eyes; and that blush which had been a plague to her from her early girlhood covered her brow and cheeks.

In the Hindoo's eyes the blush greatly enhanced the girl's good looks; and she felt that there was something like admiration in his look as he watched them depart. If Jane Stoddart had been accused of being in love with the Hindoo, she would have denied it with fierce indignation, and without any feeling that she was untruthful or deceiving herself. But the Rajah was the most interesting man she had ever seen. He was the most dignified, the most gentle, the best bred, not even excepting Sir Arthur Chetwynd. She felt some regret that his skin was not white, but she felt no repulsion from him because it was dark. "And after all," as she had said to herself more than once, "if he had been an ordinary white man, he wouldn't have been half so—not half so interesting."

None of the others were to go before lunch. An hour after breakfast, Captain Byngham, having finished his packing, went out on the terrace and began to walk up and down. He had a cigar in his hand, but he did not think of lighting it. He was too much agitated. His heart beat strangely as he glanced from time to time at the hall door, half desiring, half fearing the secretary's appearance.

He felt almost as though he were about to make an alliance with the Evil One. But he was a desperate man. His creditors had only been restrained by the expectation he had held out to them that he was about to marry an heiress, and that as soon as the marriage had taken place they would be paid in full. But of this he had little hope now.

Leila had been unaccountably cold to him whenever he had tried to "make the running," as he expressed it to himself. He had little doubt that he would have been able to overcome her coldness if, as he had hoped, Sir Arthur had been definitely on his side. But from the moment of the General's return from Plymouth, Byngham had been conscious of a change in his host's manner, and the will explained that clearly enough. The General must in some way have come to know of his embarrassments. It was vain to hope that he would consent to take a ruined man for his son-in-law.

It was more by a sort of superstition than by any exercise of his reason that Byngham had resolved to accept the Hindoo's offer of help. It would be a relief, he felt, to confide in some one. But, in addition to this, he had a vague feeling, natural to a man of his temperament, that Oriental cunning might do something for him.

He despised all dark coloured races; but there was something about the quiet reserve, the air of conscious, silent power that distinguished the Hindoos which fascinated him. He knew now that the Secretary was a thoroughly unscrupulous man, and at the same time clever, with a sort of supernatural cleverness. The incident of opening the envelope, simple as it had been, had impressed the Englishman with a strong sense of the Indian's power over difficulties. And that was what he wanted—a man who would face a desperate situation with cool confidence in his own power.

What the Hindoo meant to do for him he had no idea. He only knew that he would fight, if at all, by dark and underhand methods. Perhaps the Hindoo was gifted with the mysterious power of mesmerism. Perhaps he was prepared to suggest and carry out a forgery. What the means might be he could not tell. But something in the dark, inscrutable eyes had told him that what the will behind these eyes resolved to do would be done.

The time was passing.

Still the Hindoo did not come. The Captain glanced for the twentieth time at his watch, and stamped his foot impatiently. A muttered curse was on his lips, when he started, and the words died away half spoken. The Hindoo was standing behind him.

"What do you come stealing on a fellow like that for?" he growled.

The Hindoo smiled deprecatingly, and said nothing.

From the spot where they stood Leila's white dress was visible, as she stood in the garden talking to the Rajah.

"Come away from this public place if you want to talk to me," the Captain said impatiently. He felt as if he could not say what he had to say when Leila's pure eyes might any moment be turned on him.

Still without speaking, Chunder Sen led the way across the lawn to a bench which was sheltered by some thick laurels from observation. Here they sat down, and Captain Byngham, affecting a carelessness he was far from feeling, lighted his cigar.

"Very good of you to say you'd help me," he began, by way of making up for his recent rudeness. "But I don't think you can—unless," he added, with a laugh, "you are prepared to advance a good round sum of money on particularly poor security. The fact is, I have been looking forward to marrying Miss Chetwynd, who, of course, will have all Sir Arthur's money, and who, you are aware, is a cousin of my own. A marriage with her would have cleared off my most pressing debts, and in time I could have cleared my estates of incumbrances."

"Well, somehow or other Sir Arthur has heard of my difficulties; and his way of helping me is to cut me out of his will—confound him! Also his daughter gets nothing, or only a small annuity, if she marries without his consent, or that of his trustees. That means me. He won't give his consent now. I've seen it in his eye plainly enough these last two days; and you may bet that he will leave instructions to his trustees that they don't give their consent.

"Now you have the whole story. Simple enough, isn't it? I'm in a pretty hole; and if you can help me out of it, Mr. Sen, you'll be the cleverest man I've yet met with."

The Hindoo made no response. He sat, not looking at his companion, but at a tree that grew opposite, with a grave impassive look, as if he had been at church.

Byngham, watching him, saw his eyes gradually contract, as if he were concentrating his mental powers. At length he spoke.

"This is the ninth of June," he said, in his usual soft, even tones. "Would it be possible for you to keep the situation unchanged till this day twelve months?"

"Well," answered Byngham, after a pause, "to some extent, yes. I had a letter to-day from my solicitors proposing a scheme suggested by some of the mortgagees, which would practically have that effect. I might go and live quietly abroad, tell them I meant to retrench. I fancy it might be managed—why do you ask?"

"Because we go to the United States, my master and I. We go to Europe. But next June we shall be back here again. Then I may be able to help you."

"How?"

"That I cannot tell."

"Do you mean you won't tell, or that you don't know?"

Chunder Sen slowly turned on his companion a look in which there was something of contempt.

"I do not pretend to make plans twelve months in advance," he said.

"I don't believe you have any plan, or ever could have," burst out Byngham. "The thing is impossible. Sir Arthur won't give his consent as long as he lives. And even if—even after his death, you know, we should have the same difficulty with the trustees."

"I know," said the Secretary quietly.

"And you still think it possible that I may not only marry my cousin, but inherit the estates?"

"I do."

This was said with such calm confidence that Byngham was silenced—awed. The Hindoo spoke like a man who was conscious of possessing supernatural powers.

"The will," said Byngham, dropping his voice, "has been sent off by post. The lawyer will have it this afternoon, and it will be locked up in his safe."

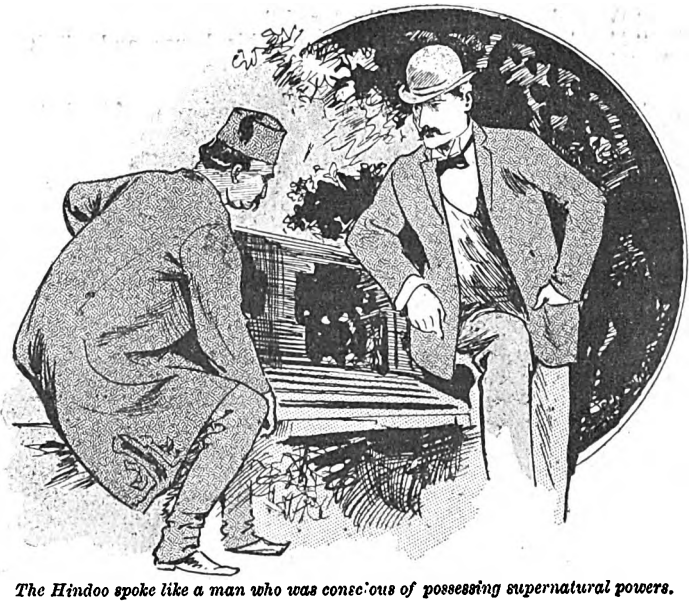
"And what of that?"

The Englishman's eyes fell. He had nothing to say.

"You had better not live abroad, at least for the first half of next year," said Chunder Sen, in grave, even tones. "You may live in London, or anywhere, so long as you visit with tolerable frequency at Sir Arthur's house. Can you preserve the entry, I mean the entrée, to his house for twelve months?"

"I suppose so," said the Captain sulkily. He did not relish being ordered about in this fashion.

"It is absolutely necessary that you should do so, and that you should keep me well informed of the General's movements. Without such information it would be impossible for me to make plans for the carrying out of your wishes."



The Hindoo spoke like a man who was conscious of possessing supernatural powers.

"Shall we buy what is our own?"

"What plans?"

"Plans that may suggest themselves by this day next year," said the Hindoo, his eyes fixed full on the Captain's face.

"Bah!"

The Secretary gravely rose.

"If you do not want me," he said, "if you do not trust me, I can go."

"Heaven knows I want you badly enough. Sit down, man. Yes, I want you, and I trust you. At least, I'm sure if anyone can help me, you can."

"But you must see that in order to do so I must know something of Sir Arthur—more than I know already. I must know his habits, his temperament, his amusements, his visits, his movements. I must learn what people have influence with him; what his plans are concerning his daughter, and—and a thousand other things—everything you can tell me."

"All right."

"An address will be sent you, to which you can write as necessity arises."

"Very good."

"As the time for our next visit draws near, it may be necessary for me to see you. You will not object to meet me at a place I may appoint, as it may be impossible for me to call on you."

"No, I don't mind doing that."

"And in return for this service——."

"Ah!" sneered the Captain, "I thought that was coming!"

"The Captain," said Chunder Sen, "being a Christian, is no doubt accustomed to give and to receive important and difficult services out of pure love—pure Christian charity. With me it is different. I am only a poor Hindoo——."

"There, that'll do!"

"And, being such, I naturally expect some small return for my labour."

"What do you call a small return?"

"Merely your promise that when this house and all it contains, and all this land, and Sir Arthur's wealth——."

"Yes, yes."

"When it is all yours, you will permit me or my friends to search in Sir Arthur's desk and his drawers for certain stones—uncut gems, in fact—of no great price in money, but valuable to us from their sacred character. They were stolen some years ago from a shrine. I believe Sir Arthur has them."

"Why not ask him for them?"

"Do you think that if I did he would restore them? No."

"He might sell them."

"And shall we buy what is our own? No!"

"You'd rather st—— search for them yourselves. Very good. I've no objection. If ever I am master here, you may search the house for jewels, cut or uncut, and keep all you can find."

The Hindoo rose, ratified the compact with a quiet "We are agreed;" and walked a little further into the wooded part of the park.

And Captain Byngham, delighted to have secured the Hindoo's help at such a very moderate cost, stepped off rapidly in the contrary direction.

The interview with Mephistopheles had not been nearly so unpleasant as he had anticipated.

CHAPTER XI.

THE SECOND BLOW FALLS.

THE General drove his friends to the railway-station in a large wagonette. He was in high spirits; for the anxiety which had been weighing on his mind since he first heard that Hindoos were to be under his roof on the fatal Tenth of June was now gone.

"Another hour," he said to himself, "and I shall be free of them, for another year at all events."

The train in which Sir Arthur and Leila had to travel to Plymouth started some time before the one which was to convey the Rajah and his suite to London. Captain Byngham said he had to meet some man at Plymouth on business, and that he would see the General and Leila off.

The girl was wild with delight at the prospect of a cruise. She had never been on board a yacht in her life; and felt as if she could have sung a song at the top of her voice out of pure joy of heart. The last sight the Rajah and Geoffrey got of her, she was leaning a little way out of the carriage window, smiling farewell, and mischievously fluttering a tiny morsel of handkerchief.

The two men stood gazing after the train in silence. Neither of them cared to speak, for each knew that the other understood the feelings with which he was staring at the fast-vanishing carriages. To Geoffrey it seemed as if the brightness and spring of his life had suddenly been withdrawn.

"Shall I have the pleasure of your company to London?" asked the Rajah at length.

"No; I think not," answered Geoffrey. "The fact is," he added a moment later, "I have not yet made up my mind where to go."

Amavati looked at the young Englishman with his grave, dark eyes.

"To-morrow is the Tenth of June," he said almost in a whisper.

"I know. But now that I am warned I can look after myself," said Geoffrey. Then, thinking that his answer might seem cold, he added, "I am awfully obliged to you for your interest in me."

This the Rajah only acknowledged by a bow, as he turned away to speak to his Secretary, who just then approached.

Fluttering a tiny morsel of handkerchief.

Left to himself, Geoffrey began to ask himself seriously where he meant to spend the night and the following day. He had a feeling that he would be safer away from London and his old haunts there. Suddenly he formed a resolution to spend the next two days in some sequestered spot among the Welsh mountains. His nerves wanted rest. He needed the refreshment that contact with the everlasting hills alone can give.

He went to the booking office, and purchased a ticket for Bristol.

"I shall go some part of the way with you, at all events, if I may," he said, when he rejoined the Rajah on the platform. "I haven't yet settled where I shall spend the night, but we can travel together as far as Bristol, at all events."

"I shall be delighted to have your company," said Amavati quietly.

Even now Geoffrey could hardly tell whether he trusted and liked the Rajah or not. He felt at once attracted and repelled by him.

They travelled together as far as Bristol, very little being said on the journey. At that place they parted; and as Geoffrey took the Rajah's slender fingers in his own he was oppressed with the feeling that he had not done this man justice, nor given him a proper return in gratitude for the warnings he had given him. He felt sorry for the prince, he could not have told why.

From the western seaport Geoffrey travelled on into Wales, spent the night at a little railway hotel on the way, and found himself next morning at Llignfail, a small village among the Welsh mountains.

It was a glorious summer day. The hills lifted their blue heads into the sky, as if they were calmly rejoicing in the splendour of the sunlight, and in the deep peace which reigned among them. The very sight of them was invigorating.

Geoffrey finished his breakfast at the village hostelry, slung the small bag he carried over his shoulder—he had left his heavy luggage at Bristol—and set off for a long ramble among the solitudes beyond. In his bag there was a paper of sandwiches made up by the landlady, as well as some biscuits and cheese, so that he felt independent of inns for the time being.

He had a half-formed project of crossing the range of hills to the west and reaching a village called Aberyllis, which, the landlady had told him, lay beyond them. He might spend the Sunday there. It didn't much matter whether he reached Aberyllis, or some other hamlet, or merely a farmhouse where he could find shelter for the night.

He reached the highest point visible from Llanfail soon after noon; but higher peaks then appeared; and his heart longed, with a longing which only the young and strong can ever know, to set foot on the top of them. So he climbed on, till he reached the shoulder of one of the largest peaks.

Hitherto Geoffrey had not met a soul, but he had noticed that he was not quite alone, even in these solitudes. The figure of a man had once or twice been visible in the distance, sometimes behind him, but occasionally on his right or left. It seemed as if another tourist were trying, like himself, to cross the hills to Aberyllis.

For some time he had not seen the stranger, and he concluded that his fellow-traveller must have taken another route.

It was now one o'clock, and it occurred to Geoffrey that before beginning the ascent of the peak which rose, bare and grey, before him, he had better stop and have some lunch. He had just crossed a narrow ravine through which a mountain torrent dashed; but, being unwilling to retrace his steps, he went on, skirting the base of the peak, till he came to a small stream. This just suited him, so he sat down, unslung his bag from his shoulder, and began his meal.

He was sitting on the bare rock, which was of a crumbling character, and just there rather steep. A few feet below him was a pool of inky blackness. This pool was of considerable size, perhaps seventy or eighty yards in length. It had evidently been formed by the rainwater, which in winter rushed down the hillside, and it seemed to be tolerably deep. The black colour of the water was due, no doubt, to the peaty soil at the bottom.

The rock shelved right into the dark-coloured water. At the farther end of the pool there were a few islets, bearing tufts of rushes and of heather. At the margin, except at the side where it met the rock, the pool lost itself in marshy ground, half water covered with green scum, half peaty moss, among which great white boulders appeared at intervals.

Beyond the marshy ground, on the side opposite to Geoffrey, was an upland moor, which stretched downward to the lower slopes of the hills. Further away were the tops of low hills, the shapes of which were lost in the misty horizon.

The silence was profound. Not a bird chirped; not an insect hummed. The landscape was not beautiful; yet Geoffrey felt as if these sterile wastes had a meaning, and even a beauty, of their own. The very contrast between the black morass, the grey rock, the boulders bleached white by the storms of countless winters, and the green fields of fertile Devon, charmed and delighted his eyes.

The young man had finished eating, and was in the act of stooping down to the rivulet which flowed at his side, when he heard a slight noise behind him.

He looked up, and saw a gigantic figure towering above him—a Hindoo with swarthy face, and a look of malignant triumph in his staring black eyes. His arms were raised above his head as high as he could stretch them, and in his two hands was a piece of rock as large as a man could lift!

One instant Geoffrey was motionless, less from terror than amazement. The next he started to his feet, slipped on the smooth, steep rock, and in the fraction of a second was plunged into the pool! It was well for him that his foot had slipped. If he had retained his footing, that moment would have been his last. The Hindoo had been in the very act of heaving the stone. It came down with an awful crash on the very spot where the intended victim had been stooping to drink, and then shot into the pool.

Geoffrey soon rose to the surface, for he was a first-rate swimmer, and perfectly at home in the water. With one hand he dashed the peaty water from his eyes, and there he saw Kuttapani, the man who had been at the Towers in the position of cook to the Rajah, standing on the brink, an evil smile upon his face, and an eager look, like that of a beast of prey when he has fixed his quarry, beaming from his eyes.

Geoffrey was for the moment maddened with rage. To think that he, who had done nothing to deserve it, should be hunted down like a wild animal in this way! He saw the enormous advantage which his enemy possessed—standing in safety on dry ground, and ready to fall on him the moment he emerged from the water; but he did not think of that. He could think of nothing but his passionate longing to get within striking distance of that grinning, murderous wretch.

Three rapid strokes took him to the edge of the pool.

Quick as lightning the Indian stooped and sprang—not at him, but a piece of broken rock which was lying a few yards off.

Luckily Geoffrey's presence of mind returned to him. It was plain that long before he could drag himself up that steep slippery bank, out of the pool, his skull would be battered in!

He touched the rock with his foot as Kuttapani stooped for the stone, and shot himself far out across the inky surface.

Before the impetus he had gained was quite exhausted the stone came down. Geoffrey made a convulsive struggle to avoid it; but he could not quite get out of its way. The thing was impossible. The piece of rock struck the water which covered his right shoulder. A cry of pain burst from the young man's lips, as he was driven below the surface by the force of the blow.

Geoffrey at that moment gave himself up for lost; for the thought had darted into his mind—"What is to prevent the Hindoo from stoning me to death by degrees? I must come up to breathe; and as often as I do that I shall be struck down."

But the next instant hope revived. His left foot touched the bottom—soft spongy moss, it is true, not firm ground; but yet the mere contact rested his muscles, and gave him a sensation of having found a friend. He could hardly swim now, on account of his injured shoulder; but he thought he might contrive to walk under water for a few paces. And he actually did manage to struggle on for two or three yards before he was forced to rise for air.

He did so, fully expecting that as he gasped for breath he would be struck on the head by a stone. But the looked for blow did not fall; and ere he sank again Geoffrey glanced round. The Hindoo was still on the edge of the pool, but his back was turned towards the water, and he was stooping down—probably trying to find a stone of suitable size. Geoffrey sank without a sound; and as soon as his feet touched the ground he began to walk away towards the further side of the pool.

He scrambled round it.

He had hardly taken three steps when he heard a great splash behind him — then another, and another. He pressed on, and to his delight he found that the ground became firmer as he advanced, and —what was still better—it was rising. The water was getting shallower very rapidly.

Dashed on as fast as he could.

Suddenly he remembered that at that moment the Hindoo was in all likelihood stooping to gather more stones. He must rise to breathe soon. Better to rise now!

He risked it; and even in the few seconds his head was above water he noticed three things, all of them favourable to his escape.

In the first place, the Hindoo was busy trying to dislodge a large piece of rock—apparently only small stones were lying near at hand—and was not looking at the pool. In the second place, the water, naturally black from the decomposed peat, had become positively thick from being so much disturbed. For anyone standing on the shore to see into it was impossible. Thirdly, he was not very far from a large boulder which stood out of the water, and which he had hitherto taken to be part and parcel of the opposite bank. If he could only——

He looked back to the Indian. He was straightening himself up. Geoffrey sank in silence like a stone.

The breath he carried down with him lasted till he reached the boulder. He scrambled round it, and rose to the surface on the other side of it. He had hardly done so when he again heard the sound of large stones splashing into the water. It seemed as if the Hindoo had some vague notion that his quarry might be still alive, and that he wanted to drive him to the surface.

Geoffrey now rested his hands on the side of the boulder, and being able to breathe freely felt comparatively comfortable for a minute or so; then the leaden weight of his clothes became intolerable. He could not keep his hold on the stone, and he was fain to take a long breath and sink to the bottom for the sake of giving his muscles a few seconds rest. Then it struck him—this boulder cannot be the top of a pillar; on one of its sides there must be a slope, and that slope must be under water.

A few minutes' investigation proved that he was right. The top of the boulder was, in fact, like the nose of a great seal lying on the surface of the sea. Geoffrey got upon the back of the seal, as it were, and lay there at full length, his head being concealed by the top of the boulder, and his body by the black water. He was now able to examine his injured shoulder a little. He did so, and soon assured himself that no bones were broken. It was stiff and sore, but he felt sure that it would be all right in a day or two.

Next Geoffrey began to calculate his chances of escape. There were two chances against him. If the Hindoo took it into his head to walk round the pool, he could hardly avoid being seen; if he took it into his head to go higher up the hill and look down upon the pool, he would certainly be detected.

Would Kuttapani go round the pool, or would he climb the hill, or would he go quietly away?

Kuttapani did none of the three. He sat down where Geoffrey had sat a quarter of an hour before, drew in his feet till his knees were nearly up to his eyes, threw his arms round his legs, and sat there, staring at the black water, and waiting.

As minute after minute went by without the Hindoo moving, Geoffrey began to wonder whether he was only making sure that he had struck and drowned his victim, or whether the man was fascinated and unable to leave the scene of his crime. He sat there so long that Geoffrey feared that he must soon either betray himself to his enemy or perish of cold.

But at last there was a slight noise. The Hindoo had risen. Geoffrey waited a few seconds, and then peered cautiously through the heather that grew on the top of the rock that sheltered him.

Then, for one awful moment, the young Englishman was motionless from despair. Kuttapani was standing a little way from the pool, looking full at him. No! Though a stranger would have said that the two men were looking right into each other's faces, Geoffrey had remained invisible. The heather had been a perfect screen. The next moment the Hindoo had turned his back on the pool, and was striding rapidly away.

Geoffrey drew himself out of the pool, and, crouching behind a boulder on dry land, tried to wring the water out of his clothes. His teeth were chattering; he was shivering in every limb.

Suddenly, as he knelt there on the wet peat-moss, an idea flashed into his brain and sent the blood tingling through every vein in his body.

He had been deliberating with himself whether he should try to keep the Hindoo in sight, with a view of bringing him to justice; but now he asked himself—Why should I stoop to punish this poor, ignorant creature, who is very likely the mere tool of spirits more wicked than himself? At most it would rid us of one of our enemies.

Why should I not follow him, and make him my guide to the haunts of those murderers? I may be able to watch them unseen, and, it may be, learn their plans and baffle their designs.

I am safe from them now, for they believe me to be dead. Let the world, too, believe that I am dead. I have few—or none—to mourn me. But I will run those bloodhounds to earth yet! I will try whether I cannot shield Leila and her father by attacking their enemies!

A moment after his plan was formed Geoffrey strode out boldly on the moor, a new light in his eye, a new spring in his step.

Far down the hillside there was a moving figure.

"How did Kuttapani manage to get so near me without being seen?" Geoffrey asked himself. The answer lay before him. A ravine, which formed the bed of a stream, led straight up the side of the hill to a point not far from the spot where he had eaten his midday meal. The Hindoo must have crept up by the stream, sheltered at first by the over-hanging banks, and afterwards working his way through the boulders and tall heather.

By the time Geoffrey had wrung the water out of his clothes, Kuttapani was a long way in advance. So the young Englishman plunged into the ravine, and dashed on as fast as he could, running where the ground was comparatively smooth, and where it was rough leaping from one mossy stone to another.

The hunted man had become the hunter!

To me, at least, Roger Elbe was a very interesting character. He was the most systematic and accurate person I ever met, but there was an element of poetry in his nature which enabled him to tell a story so vividly as to make his audience feel that they were witnessing the events he related.

He might easily, I am sure, have secured and filled a much higher and more lucrative position than that of a division engineer, employed by the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company to superintend the construction of its line through some of the most difficult passes of the Rocky and Selkirk Mountains, but he chose this outdoor life because his physical condition required it.

His health was not vigorous. He had an excellent physique, but his nerves were unstrung. Usually he kept them under control, but any sudden surprise or prolonged worry caused him to lose command of himself. I have known him to drop a valuable instrument when a long silence was broken by the sudden caw of a crow over his head. Once, as he was quietly writing, he sprang suddenly to his feet and overturned the table before him when some snow dropped from a pine-tree down upon our tent.

One day it was necessary to make measurements and observations on the face of a high cliff, from a point about midway between its base and its top. Several of our men volunteered to go down, but Elbe said he wished to examine the character of the rock, and would go himself.

Fastening a rope about his waist, whistling loudly meanwhile, he bade the men lower him down the cliff, while I stood at its edge to watch for signals that he might make.

He stopped on a projecting ledge, secured a footing, and then set deliberately to work. After making a few measurements he took out his field-book, apparently to record the figures. A second later he reeled as though he had received a blow, and, dropping his book, grasped the rope, and shouted hoarsely to be drawn up.

In less than a minute he was drawn to the top of the cliff, but as we carried him back from its brink he appeared to be completely unnerved. His teeth were clinched, he glared wildly about him, and great drops of sweat stood out upon his pallid face.

However, he soon regained self-control, the colour returned to his face, and nervously untying the rope from his waist, he said, in a weak, hesitating way:

"Boys, I was not afraid of your letting me drop, but I can't keep my wits in a place like that. I'll tell you the reason when you get back to camp. Finish the work without me, but don't any of you go down there if you have the least objection to going. No, no, there is no need that any of you should go back to the camp with me. I am all right now."

After the work was finished the other men took the instruments back to camp, and I made a détour down through the gorge to get the book that Elbe had dropped.

Some of the leaves had become loosened by the fall, and in collecting them I noticed that it was evidently quite an old book. The first few pages were filled with ordinary engineering computations, observations about weather, vegetation, geological formations, and the like. Then there was a leaf on which the distance passed over by a falling body in five seconds was carefully calculated.

On one of the leaves I picked up was a computation which at first I thought had something to do with the velocity of a slow current of water that we had encountered, but soon concluded that the moving body, whatever it was, travelled even too slowly for that.

Ere long I found other puzzling computations, all of which appeared to have been made for the purpose of establishing the fact that something would occur at "ten minutes past four o'clock, p.m."

Next I found a leaf on which was a rough drawing of a little child, with curly hair and folded hands, lying in a coffin.

It dawned upon me that I must have been examining private papers instead of an ordinary field-book, and so, restraining my curiosity, I gathered what other leaves I could find, and hastened back to camp.

That night, as we were seated outside the tents around a blazing fire, Elbe told his story. So vivid was the impression made upon my mind that I think I can repeat it very nearly in his own words.

"Boys," he said, "I was in this region several years ago, long before it was definitely known that Kicking Horse would be the pass chosen to run the line through. We came up the Columbia in the summer, and spent the winter over in the Big Bend, making our usual observations, and preparing for a regular survey of the region.

"One morning early in April I started from our camp to spend part of the day hunting goats. I soon came upon the tracks of a small herd and followed them. At first the way led up a small cañon; then it turned towards some peaks and high cliffs that form a part of the south wall of the Illecillewaet Pass.

"About three hours of zigzag climbing brought me to the summit of the ridge, when the falling of a rock that I carelessly displaced alarmed the goats, and they bounded away. As they disappeared among the ice-drifts I fired two shots after them.

"The next moment I regretted this, for as the echoes rattled among the crags I was sure that every goat and mountain sheep within five miles would be on the alert the rest of the day. However, it was now nearly twelve o'clock, and I decided to find a comfortable nook for my lunch, and then return to camp.

"The lay of the land had much to do with my subsequent adventure, so that I recall it now with distinctness. I was on the top of a low ridge extending east and west along the bases of two peaks which rose up on each side of the ridge.

"At the end of this central ridge, some distance in advance of it, fell a precipice into the valley below. The hollows between the two higher peaks and the ridge were filled with snow and ice, under one of which, and at its side, flowed a shallow stream of water. In looking for a sheltered place in which to eat my luncheon I had noticed the space between the end of the central ridge and the edge of the precipice. It looked very pleasant, sheltered as it was from the brisk, cool winds, with the bright sun shining full upon it.

"The stream of water, or some other agency, had made an opening, or crevice, between the ice in the hollow on the western side of the ridge and the peak which rose near it, wide enough for me to pass through to the open space beyond, that looked so inviting.

"Following this crevice back a short distance, I found a jagged ledge, with projections of ice opposite, that would enable me with comparative ease to get to the bottom of the narrow passage. Using these projections, I succeeded in reaching the shallow water that flowed in the bed of the crevice, and thus easily passed on to the sheltered space beyond.

"There was no opening in the mass of ice and snow that filled the hollow on the eastern side of the central ridge, and the end of this ridge, encased in ice, rose abruptly forty or fifty feet above the open space in which I stood. The ice in both hollows also ended abruptly nearly on a line with that which inclosed the point of the ridge.

"The current of water that ran through the crevice covered only a part of the west side of the open space, leaving elsewhere the rock on which I stood comparatively dry. Here, with a fine view before me, I sat down to eat my luncheon.

"After eating it I sat for some time admiring the grand landscape before me. I remember wondering how long the water that was running near me had been cutting its way along the side of the mass of snow and ice that had accumulated in the western hollow. Then I speculated in a listless sort of way, that the rains and snows of many centuries had passed through this ravine.

"The view in front and below was especially fascinating, while the waters of the small stream poured over the edge, and fell, looking like a mass of falling pearls, down to a shelving rock, until it became only mist and spray long before it reached the base of the precipice.

"I had a curiosity to know the height of this precipice, so, taking a cartridge from my belt and wrapping a piece of white paper about it, I dropped it into the abyss, and noted that it reached the bottom in five seconds. So I computed in my field-book that it was about four hundred feet from where I stood to the base of the precipice. Then I sat down, and, wearied by my long tramp, stretched myself upon my side and involuntarily dropped asleep.

"On looking at my watch when I awoke I saw that it was two o'clock, so I reluctantly concluded to leave my cool retreat. I took my gun and walked back towards the point in the cleft where I had entered.

"Imagine my surprise when I found that it was so narrow that I could not pass through it. I looked, rubbed my eyes, and looked again. Yes, there was an opening, but it was not a foot wide. With a quickened pulse I began to investigate.

"The ice-wall was certainly nearer to the brink of the precipice than it had been when I passed through the crevice. A thin line of the alluvial-like dust which accumulates on the rocks of fresh-water streams was scraped up at the base of the ice-wall, and one of my foot-prints on this thin, soft substance was partly hidden by the ice.

"The truth was now perfectly plain! Had there ever been another man so inconceivably thoughtless as to walk into a trap like that?

"The mass of ice and snow behind me had begun to move downward. Already it had cut off my retreat. I was hemmed in before a slowly moving ice-fall, and should be resistlessly crowded down over the brink into the fearful abyss beyond.

"At first I was dazed by this awful discovery. Then I began nervously to look about for some way of escape; but neither the smooth walls of the sides of my prison nor the perpendicular face of the moving cliff offered any footing up which it would be possible for me to climb more than a few feet.

"Trembling in every nerve, and with a sinking heart, I went to the verge of the precipice. A few moments before I had looked with pleasure down into the abyss. How different it appeared now! A single glance made my head swim and my heart chill with horror.

"Time and again I paced up and down my slowly shortening prison, seeking some hitherto overlooked means of escape. I thrust my rifle in between the ice and the side of the channel, madly hoping that it would in some way check the movement of that awful mass. I might as well have tried in the same way to check the waters of the St. Lawrence.

"I struck my hunting knife into the ice to see if I could not cut steps for my hands and feet, and thus draw myself up the face of the ice-wall. At almost the first blow the blade snapped from the handle, which fell into the water and glided over the brink.

"Then I gave up hope.

"Still, with a sort of fascination, I wished I could know how much longer I had to live. I had a small tape line in my pocket. With it I measured the distance from the edge of the precipice to the base of the ice-cliff. It was just sixty-two feet.

"Then I took my watch and observed the mass while it passed over three feet. It seemed to move steadily at the rate of about six inches a minute.

"I did not need to put down the figures in order to know that—even if the movement did not increase with the heat—I had a little less than two hours to live; nevertheless, in a dazed way, I put the figures down in my field-book. It must have been purely the force of habit that led me to do so. I even reflected that I should be crowded from my position before the ice reached the brink, and so, as it was just fourteen minutes past two, I concluded that I could not hope to remain on the ledge longer than until ten minutes past four o'clock.

"Strange details, you think, for a man in such peril to busy himself with! But I believe that the horrible fear and suspense must at times have unsettled my mind, which seems to have gone from one extreme to the other, so that my imagination conjured up all kinds of strange and unexpected fancies.

"A breath of wind bore a delicate bit of moss to my feet. Then I remembered that I had seen moss of the same kind many years before at the funeral of one of the playmates of my boyhood. Loving hands had twined a mossy wreath and placed it upon the coffin. Every feature of the fair, peaceful countenance lying upon its snowy pillow came distinctly to my mental vision.

"Mechanically I began to sketch the dead face on a leaf of my book. But the consciousness of my awful peril did not leave me, and the rough sketch seemed to transform itself into a vivid picture of a mangled body lying among grisly boulders at the foot of a precipice, and buried beneath masses of snow and ice.

"It seems to me that I did not so much shrink from death, or even cling to life; but the thought of the horrible sensation of falling filled me with dread. It seemed as if my sensations would not end with death. I even felt that if I were to send a bullet crashing through my brain, I should still feel that horrible sensation of falling; and that if my body were ground to powder I should still be conscious of the crash of that great mass that would fall upon me.

"With these, and many other fantastic and terrifying imaginings, my mind was occupied until three o'clock. The mass of ice still moved with almost the precision of a machine. As I sat looking up at the sky, flecked here and there with gauzy clouds, a dark speck appeared circling above me. Then another came in sight following the first.

"As they came nearer I saw that they were vultures. When they were within thirty feet of my head, delicately poising and balancing themselves, they seemed, to my insane imaginings, to be exulting in their superiority and my helplessness. The thought exasperated me. I drew up my rifle and fired at the nearest bird. It disappeared downwards, with a wing broken close to its body. But as it caught with its claws on one of the long icicles that depended from the side of the precipice, and clung there, wildly flapping its one wing, I pitied the poor thing, and reviled myself for my cruelty.

"I saw that it had but a slight hold upon the ice, and resolved to try and reach it and put an end to its suffering. I made a noose in one end of my tape line, and having fastened the other end to my gun, I lay down and reached as far as I dared. I should have caught it, but the poor thing loosened its hold and fell, turning over and over until it struck the bottom, quivered, and became still. Here I beheld the rehearsal of my own approaching fate.

"My head began to swim and my eyes to blur. Just then a small bird, almost white, darted up past my face, and drew my attention. I sprang to my feet and looked for it, but it was out of sight. I half fancied that it was the soul of the dead bird flying away to heaven.

"Again I looked at my watch. The hands pointed to half-past three. I could not believe it. Still I dreaded to look behind me, as one might dread to look at a crouching tiger ready to spring upon him as he looked. Nevertheless, I forced myself to do it. My watch was confirmed, and I sank back, knowing that I had but forty minutes more to live.

"A newspaper that had been wrapped about my luncheon lay near me. I picked it up and began to read. It was an ordinary newspaper, though nearly a year old, of course. Some of the paragraphs held my attention, because in one way or another the expressions used suggested my situation:

"'A young business man of bright prospects had begun to speculate. Successful at first, he continued to speculate in a larger way. Finally, when he had become deeply involved, his losses began. 'On the Brink of Bankruptcy,' the paper said, 'he made a desperate struggle to bear up under his misfortunes, but his reputation was gone. He was overpowered by a mass of adverse circumstances, and crowded down to ruin.

"'Another article told of a handsome, intelligent boy, always successful in his studies, who had been so intent on developing his mental powers that he had neglected to care for his health, and was now lying 'on the verge of insanity, pressed down by a host of bodily ailments.'

"'Under the heading 'Death of a Drunkard' was told the familiar story of an intelligent, capable young man who prided himself upon his ability to throw off his habit of drinking a glass now and then whenever he should find the habit was becoming injurious to him. In time he became a confirmed drunkard. He then struggled to escape from his overpowering vice, but it was too late, and, as the paper put it, 'He was forced from the brink of respectability into a pit of degradation, and buried beneath an avalanche of shame.'

"So rapidly did my imagination work that I seemed to live over the temptations, struggles, fears, hopes, and disappointments of each of those unfortunate lives as it neared its respective brink.

"The sun was shining in my face, and I started to change my position. My hand struck something cold! The mass was almost upon me. Fifteen minutes more—and all would be over!

"I got up and placed my back against the eastern side of the advancing column, with my hand raised above my head and gripping the slight, icy projection.

"A thrill went through me as my gun, pushed by the moving ice, slipped and slid over the edge of the precipice. I heard it as it struck and bounded from the side of the cliff until it reached the bottom. I tried to close my eyes but I could not.

"Suddenly then the rock beneath my feet seemed to tremble. The icicles that hung from the ice on the other side of the open space snapped and fell. There was a rumbling sound that grew louder. Then the entire mass of ice in the hollow on the western side of the ridge, where the current of water flowed, shot out by me, and, pouring over the edge of the precipice, fell with a crash that seemed to make the whole earth quiver. This was followed by a rush of water.

"Almost blinded as I was, even in my insane fear I knew what had happened. The ice accumulations in the other ravine had been pushed forward by an avalanche of snow from the heights behind. Undermined by flow of water beneath it had moved readily, and thus had taken the whole force of the avalanche.

"Every moment I expected that the mass behind me would in like manner be pushed forward.

"But no! The echoes died away among the crags, the torrent of water that had shot down in the wake of the ice ceased, and I found myself standing as before with the brink of the precipice—the horrible precipice—yawning just before me.

"Then came a wild hope of escape.

"Starting from where I stood, I darted swiftly round the edge of the central ridge, pushed my way through the accumulations of snow that still blocked the channel, and then leaped and pushed ahead like a madman until I had reached a place where I could climb from the ravine to the level above.

"Here I remembered trying to laugh, pray, sing, shout, and weep all at the same time. Then, as another thunderous roar sounded among the crags, I swooned.

"It was nearly sundown when I came to myself. The moon rose so that I could see my way, and it was midnight before I reached camp.

"I have been trying to forget that experience, but it is impossible. My nerves that day received a strain from which they will never recover.

"To-day I thought I would discipline myself by going down over the cliff. I got along well enough at first, but when I opened my field-book to write in it I found that by some mistake I had put in my pocket the same book that I had used while imprisoned on that brink.

"Instantly that old scene came back to me, and I lost my self-possession. I think I dropped that book into the gorge, and I hope I may never see it again."

He never did.

On the Battlefield

It happened during the siege: we had been fighting all day at the outposts, in the neighbourhood of Bourget.

That evening, after roll-call, just as I was preparing to take some rest, my captain came up to me and said:

"Lieutenant, I have got another job for you. Before you lie down take a few men with you and have a look round the field. Above all things be prudent, and go without lanterns; the night is clear; the reflection from the snow will allow of your seeing round about you for a good distance.

"Yesterday's reports indicated the presence of a band of night-prowlers. These birds of prey must be hunted down. A number of corpses have been robbed of their clothes, and were discovered lying in the grass this morning stripped. Here are the orders that the colonel has requested me to communicate to you. You are to bring into the camp any of these scoundrels whom you may capture, and let fly a bullet into the backs of any who attempt to escape. All's fair in war. No quarter is to be given the rascals. Go, and good luck go with you."

My little company set out silently with loaded rifles. An icy wind was whistling round us, whirling clouds of snow into our faces.

We crossed the lines and were soon in the open country. The captain had spoken truly; the night was splendid, and the moon shed her rays far over the fields, her pale light glinting here and there on the pools of blood. Not a sound. Away on the horizon we could distinguish the Prussian encampment.

For a quarter of an hour we marched along with stealthy footsteps, holding our breaths, mute and alert, when we saw moving about under a tree a black figure.

"There's one of them," murmured the corporal, bringing his gun to his shoulder.

"Let no one stir," I replied, and I advanced alone.

At the foot of the tree lay an officer of the Marine Infantry, his forehead shattered by a bullet. The blood had run down his face and soaked his uniform, and trickled on in a long rivulet over the snow. In his hand was still clasped a discharged revolver, and I noticed that he wore on his finger a costly ring. I can recall that ring now—a ruby surrounded by diamonds.

Bending over the dead man, and holding his hand, was a dark and withered form. It was an old woman, with masculine features and glaring sinister eyes. She was dressed in dark-coloured rags, and her head was covered with a fearfully dilapidated hat.

"What are you doing there?" I demanded, touching her on the shoulder.

She did not answer. Her silence exasperated me.

"You are afraid to answer, but I will tell you what you are here for. You are a 'night bird,' and you have come to rob the dead."

"No," she replied quietly.

"Well, then, you must come with me. I don't believe you. As you will not tell me why you are here alone at this hour, you must come to the camp and give an explanation to the colonel."

"No, I will not," she answered. "I am watching him."

"Watching whom?"

"Him," she repeated, pointing to the corpse.

"Nonsense! Do you take me for a fool? It is not the usual thing for beggars to be watching dead bodies on a field of battle. I don't believe in such noble sentiments! Especially when corpses wear such rings as that on their fingers!"

At this she drew close to me, and looked me straight in the face with her cold grey eyes.

"He was my son!" she answered, in a broken voice. "They have killed him; let me remain by him!"

Then, without waiting for my consent, she knelt down beside the dead man and began murmuring a prayer.

"As he is your son, you may remain," I replied, and moved away.

I rejoined my little company, and whispered this order in the corporal's ear, "Let us pretend to go away, and hide ourselves behind a clump of trees. I am not satisfied about that old hag over there, near that officer's body. We must watch her; if she does not stir, leave her alone; if she moves, fire."

Hidden by a turn in the road we could see without being seen.

The black dress of the old woman looked like a sombre blot on the dazzling whiteness of the snow; suddenly we saw her stoop over the face of the corpse; her head seemed to touch the head of the young man; then she arose, glanced two or three times round her, and fled in the opposite direction to that in which we were hidden.

"Fire!" I shouted.

Three shots were fired; the old woman had only time to run ten yards, then flung up her arms in the air, uttering a piercing shriek, and fell on her face.

"Potted!" cried the corporal, laughing.

I walked up to the dead woman when, close to us, a voice shaking with fear, cried three times, "Wer da?" (who goes there).

The third challenge was followed by a flash, and a bullet buried itself in the trunk of a tree against which I was leaning.

The alarm had been given, so we were obliged to retreat to our camp; but for a considerable time we heard behind us the cries of the sentries echoing through the silence of the night.

I slept restlessly; ever before my eyes was that terrible vision of the old woman spinning round before she fell.

On the following morning, whilst my brother officers and myself were snatching our breakfast, a young lieutenant of the Marine Infantry came up to our party. His eyes were full of tears.

"What's the matter with you, my boy?" cried Gachard, half-laughingly, half-anxiously.

"I have just seen a horrible sight," replied the officer. "I had a friend in my regiment; he came from my own part of the country—a capital fellow. He passed out of St. Cyr in the same year as myself. We went through our terms together at Brest, and were inseparable. Yesterday he was struck by a bullet in the head; I saw him fall, but, as we were retreating, I could not leave the ranks, not even to wish him farewell.

"He is over there, on the battlefield, lying under a tree. Last night his mother wandered about looking for her son; she was a poor old creature, who had none but him, and she worshipped him.

"Ever since the beginning of the campaign, insensible to fatigue and misery, and squalid as a beggar, she followed the regiment step by step, at the risk of being shot. She must have seen the face of many a dead man before she discovered the corpse that she sought; however, she succeeded at last, she knelt down beside him, bent over his sightless eyes, closed them piously, and cut off a lock of his hair.

"Did you notice the report of a rifle about midnight? Just as she was going away with her precious relic, a Prussian sentry must have espied her; he fired, and the poor woman fell, mortally wounded. She found strength, however, to drag herself back to the body of her son, and there she died, her head pillowed on his breast."

. . . . . .

I sank to the ground fainting.

Curious Experiments IN CORPULENCY

"A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderate lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2 lb. to even 12 lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetal knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

"Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, price 4d. stamps) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drank as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2 lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for his book, which can be obtained through booksellers, or at the address given above."—Leeds Times, December 1, 1894.

"We were reading in the 'Penny Illustrated Paper' how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 331.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 4, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

FLORRIE BAKER was in a very bad temper. This was surprising, for she was usually a most sweet-tempered girl. Nevertheless, as she sat vindictively tearing into fragments the letter she had just been reading, she looked and felt, as she herself would have expressed it, like a "perfect fiend." The reason of her unwonted anger requires a little explanation. It was this. Some two years before, Florrie had been proposed to by a certain penniless young barrister, named Robert Carstairs, and had accepted him.

But Florrie's parents were cautious, and wishing to discover if the young man could earn enough at his profession to provide for a wife, with a margin in case of ill-fortune, they placed one obstacle in the way of the young people's union. That was, that the marriage should not take place until Robert could show at least £500 to his credit in the bank. This was rather a facer, but Robert pulled himself together, and, by March of this year, owing to good luck rather than to industry, he had acquired the necessary sum—all but £100. The remainder he said he hoped to obtain before many weeks were over, and so Florrie's parents allowed matters to proceed. The wedding was fixed for July, and everything was arranged, even to the printing of the invitation cards.

At the beginning of June there came a letter from Robert in which he explained that things had not turned out as he had hoped, and that, to his intense regret, the wedding must be postponed for another year at least.

"Oh! it is horrid and mean of him," exclaimed Florrie. "I did so want to be married this season, and what will people think of it?" So saying, she rushed for sympathy and advice to her sister Belle's room. Belle was a year or so older than Florrie, had studied at Girton, was very learned, and altogether despised such minor considerations as marriages.

"Well, my dear," she said, "if he can't manage it he can't, and you'll only have to grin and bear it till he can. However, I shouldn't make a fuss about it if I were you. Spilt milk, you know."

This speech was not calculated to soothe Florrie's ruffled feelings, and, seizing her hat and jacket, she rushed to seek relief in the outside world. But relief was not to be found, for no sooner had she left the doorstep than she saw, bearing down upon her, Miss Mackenzie, the bore of the neighbourhood. What should she do? She felt that she could not, in her present state of mind, bear the infliction of the old maid's platitudes. But how to escape them? Just then a hansom rattled down the street. In desperation she hailed it, and, by jumping into it, barely escaped the old lady's clutches.

"Where to, Miss?"

"Oh, anywhere!"

"Shall I drive yer down to Kempton, Miss?" said cabby, with an eye to business.

"Yes, yes, anywhere you please."

She settled herself comfortably on the cushions as the cab bowled swiftly through the streets, and was soon lost in thought.

Where was Kempton, though, by the way?

Oh, of course, she remembered now! She had once been to a certain pretty riverside village and recollected having seen written up at the station:

SUNBURY. ALIGHT HERE FOR KEMPTON PARK.

Yes, she would go and sit in the Park, and try and think matters out.

After an hour's drive, Florrie was surprised to find the cab draw up at some big white gates, through which a crowd of vehicles and foot-passengers was pressing.

"What are you stopping here for, cabman?"

"Why, Miss, this 'ere's Kempton Park, w'ere yer wanted to go to,"

"Good heavens, no! Why, it—it looks like a race-course."

"Lor, yus, Miss! Didn't yer know that?"

"Of course not! Drive me back at once, please!" exclaimed Florrie, sitting back in the cab, with as much show of indignation as she could manage.

"Well, yer may as well go in now yer are 'ere, don't yer think, Miss? It seems a pity not ter see the fun after coming sich a long way."

Florrie began to reflect. She had never been to a race-course in her life, and here was her chance. No one would be a bit the wiser, and she would find out if it really was such a wicked place as she had been brought up to believe.

Plucking up her courage she acquiesced in "cabby's" disinterested suggestion, and soon found herself within the enclosure, still, of course, seated in the cab, but facing a huge, ungainly erection filled with a shouting crowd. The horse had been taken from the shafts, which had been propped up against the railing in the usual way. This thing in front, cabby told her, was the grand stand. He proceeded to procure a card, showing what horses would run, but, as she found little in it to her taste, she amused herself by watching the curious-looking people round about, while her Jehu went away on some business of his own.

By-and-by back he came and said:

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

"Well, Miss, what's your fancy for the first. I'm going to do a bit on Verdigrease."

Florrie stared. "Fancy! Do a bit!" Whatever could the man mean?

"Why, if yer cares to plank 'arf a thick 'un on 'im, I can get yer tens from a cove as I knows on. But p'raps you've got yer eye on somethink else."

"Really, I don't understand a word you are saying," replied the poor girl in amazement.

"Well, yer see, Miss, it's this way. If yer think Verdigrease, w'ich is a good 'orse, 'll win this first race, one o' them gents in white 'ats over there, as I 'appens to know, 'll bet yer five pounds to 'arf a quid that 'e wont."

"Will he, really? That's awfully kind of him. But I don't happen to know the gentleman."

"Never yer mind, Miss. If yer give me the money I'll work it for yer."

Just for the curiosity of the thing Florrie drew the coin from her purse and gave it to the man, who straightway vanished in the crowd. She looked on her card for the name of the horse she was now so suddenly and unexpectedly interested in, and found written beside it the following incomprehensible words, "Puce, Strawberry Cap." Suddenly there was a commotion in the crowd, mounted constables cleared the course, and several horses cantered past, bearing on their backs men dressed in resplendent colours. The meaning of the words then flashed across her brain, and she instantly picked out Verdigrease by his brilliantly attired rider.

"Good gracious, Miss Baker!"

The crowd became quieter, and all looked expectantly at some distant point. Suddenly there was a cry of "They're off!" a bugle sounded, a bell rang, and almost directly, amid the wild yells of the crowd, all the horses dashed past her in a bunch. They were so mixed up, however, that for the life of her she could not tell which had won. In a few moments back came "Cabby," looking very jubilant, and informed her that their horse had won by a short neck, and greatly to her delight handed her five pounds along with her own half sovereign.

Just then a voice said:

"Good gracious, Miss Baker! whcever would have thought of seeing you here?"

Turning round to see who thus addressed her, Florrie saw, standing in front of the cab, Captain Wynford, of her brother's regiment. Greatly dismayed at being discovered under such circumstances, she hastened to explain, begging him to keep her secret. This, it need hardly be said, he readily promised, but laughed immoderately at her escapade, especially when she told him of the betting transaction with "Cabby."

"If you want to do anything more of that sort, though," said he, "you had better entrust the care of it to me. I think I can get you longer odds than 'cabby' can. Are you going to try your luck on this next race? I see they are putting the numbers up."

A wild idea rushed through Florrie's brain. Suppose she were to put a lot of money on and to win, and suppose she did it again and again and had great luck, why, she might make up that missing hundred pounds! What a surprise that would be for Robert! She looked again at her purse. There was in it now, counting her winnings, six pounds and a few shillings. She took the sovereigns out and said:

"Captain Wynford, will you do me a great favour? I want you to bet all this on a horse for me. It's for a special purpose."

Her friend smiled at the sudden increase in the stakes, and advised her to keep to smaller sums. As she persisted, however, he consented to do as she wished.

"You need not part with the cash, Miss Baker; I'm afraid I can't get you ready-money transactions in Tattersall's. I can settle with you to-morrow, anyway."

Florrie could hardly understand this trustfulness, much less the technical reference, but, presuming that it would be all right, asked him to back a horse which she picked out quite at random from the card. The race was run, and her luck still held, increasing her gains to £30 odd. All this she put on the next race, and, to cut a long story short, at the close of the meeting, owing to a wonderful continuance of good fortune, Florrie found herself the proud possessor of somewhat over the required £100. Captain Wynford saw her off in her cab, and congratulated her on her luck, promising to send her a cheque the next day.

On reaching home she dismissed the cabman with a tip that sent him on his way rejoicing, and slipped up to her room unperceived to write a note to Robert asking him to call that evening. When he came she informed him in an airy manner that she had a spare £100 of her own which she would add to what he had already in the bank in order that the wedding might come off as originally planned, carefully suppressing all details of how she happened to have such a sum to give away. She trusted that in his own interests he would not be likely to mention to her parents whence the sudden addition to his resources had been derived. Robert was greatly struck by her self-denial. Everything seemed to be turning out satisfactorily.

But, alas! it was not to be, for Belle suspected something, and, the next time Captain Wynford called, she wormed the whole story out of him under a solemn pledge of secrecy.

Needless to say, Robert soon had a highly coloured version of the affair given to him. Being, unfortunately for Florrie, of strict Puritanical up-bringing, he was greatly shocked at her unconventional behaviour. A painful scene took place between them, which we will pass over, and content ourselves with the bare statement that the engagement was broken off.

Regard for truth, however, compels us to add that Florrie soon recovered, and Captain Wynford, the partner in her "little gamble" had no great difficulty in persuading her to marry him in the Autumn.

Of Robert Carstairs it must be recorded that he rewarded Belle for disillusioning him regarding his first love by offering her his slightly damaged heart. But, as he had not yet succeeded in making that £100 himself, I am afraid Belle will have the humiliation of being married last, after all!

His Little Whack

"I'm one-and-twenty, mother," said Charles Henry, "and I hanker after seeing the world, and——"

"Don't tell me," said his mother, "Don't tell me what you're hankerin' after. I know 'ithout tellin'. It's the fleshpots of Egypt! That's what you're after. You're about as fit as a spring chicken is to see the world. Jest about as fit to come up to the scratch, you poor innocent. You leave this foolishness and set to work cuttin' sticks. That's what Nature meant you to do, an' if you go agin Nature, she'll git even with you. Thar's a deal of solid religion in wood, especially when it ain't dry."

Charles Henry jingled his pocket suggestively. It was full of money. Then he walked to the window and gazed at the pretty English landscape, so familiar to him. "I'm sick of this old hen-roost," he said irritably, with a look of defiance in his ordinarily mild, blue eyes.

Mrs. Henry Hawkins reached over and jerked him back to the breakfast table. "While you're in this hen-roost, Charles Henry," she said, in tones which did not admit of dispute—"while you're in this hen-roost, I suspects you'll have to finish up the food set before you by the old hen."

Charles Henry meekly went on with his breakfast, but there was an obstinate look in the youth's face as he did so. Mrs. Henry Hawkins waited until he had finished, and then severely eyed him once more.

"It ain't no good, mother," said Charles Henry. "It ain't no good. It's time for me to go forth out of the wilderness, so to speak, and have my little whack. I want to see what's goin' on in the world, I do."

"You want to see what's goin' on in the world. Most people wants to shut their eyes to what's goin' on in the world. You let the world alone," said his mother. "It's been tumblin' about a good many years 'ithout your help. Your head's turned jest because your Uncle Jacob left you that twenty pounds."

Charles Henry again jingled his pocket.

"Well," said the old lady with subdued irony, "I reckon it's too much for you. You want to go and mingle with the fleshpots an' painted Isabels an' fleetin' joys of this world, an' spend all your money, an' then come back like the prodigy son. But you may jest make up your mind, Charles Henry, jest as sure as you're born, there'll be precious little veal on the premises for you when you git tired of running free an' comes crawlin' home full of husks after the manner of the Scripters."

Charles Henry had never before asserted himself. Now he had money in his pouch, and when a man has money in his pouch—especially a man of one-and-twenty—he is bound to assert himself. "Look here, mother," he said deliberately, "you've cooped me up all my life. I can't keep still any longer. I've got to move on. I want to see things for myself. What's it matter if I spend the money? What's anything matter? D'you want me to die because I'm tired of things? I hear voices calling me away into the world—the great, glorious world beyond this little village. I want to see it, taste it, to find out what it's like; and then I'll settle down and cut sticks and milk the cows, but I'm hanged if I'm going to do it till I've had my little whack."

"Go on," said his mother grimly. "Go on, Charles Henry. Have your little whack! Heap dust an' ashes on your sorrowin' parent."

"I don't want to heap ashes on anybody," said the literal Charles Henry.

"You're past praying for," Mrs. Hawkins ejaculated. "A whole army of parsons couldn't save you."

Charles Henry asserted himself. His tones were those of repressed passion. "You let me go my own way, mother. I dare say it's all true. But you can't understand—you can't understand. I must see it all. I want to go to London, and have a look round."

There was a momentary pause.

"Let me start, mother," the youth continued. "I'll have to. It's in my blood. I'll go mad if I don't. I see it all—feel it—hear it—dream of it nights. I must see what it's like. I'll come back again, mother; I'll come back. But I must go. It's a living grave here."

Mrs. Henry Hawkins gazed out of the window. The sun blazed fiercely down upon the little village which peeped out from among the trees across the swollen river.

There was a murmur of summer in the air, a rustle amid the growing grasses, the arrowy flight of a myriad of swallows over the roof of the barn, the bickering of innocent dickey birds as they flew about laden with straws and twigs for their nests. Over all was the wild, sweet joy of the sun-warmed air. The world was agog with life. Pulses quickened, the unutterable joy of it filled every heart—every heart save those of Charles Henry and his irate parent.

A young girl entered the room and stood carelessly swinging her sun-bonnet by its strings. Her blue eyes gazed questioningly at Charles Henry as he stood still, rattling the money in his pocket. She was clad in a pretty blue woollen dress, and looked about twenty. In addition, she stood three inches taller than Charles Henry, and could have lifted him up with one of her large, beautifully shaped hands.

Mary Jane leant against the door-post, her face paling a little as she realised the situation. "You needn't tell me," she said to Mrs. Hawkins; "I can see he's got the fidgets again. He'll have to go."

Mrs. Hawkins looked surprised. She had counted on an ally.

"Yes," said Mary calmly, "it's no use stopping him, Mrs. Hawkins. Let him go. He'll be glad enough to come back again."

Charles Henry did not meet his sweetheart's eye.

"Well," said Mrs. Hawkins resignedly, "if you say it, Mary, I s'pose he'll have to go. Don't cry out about it afterwards when he's seen some one else. Hasn't he said anything to you yet?"

The girl's cheeks flamed for a moment. She drew herself up with a superb gesture. "If he sees anyone he likes better than me," she said, "he's welcome to her." There was a touch of scorn in her voice which roused Charles Henry. What his mother's reproaches could not effect Mary Jane's had done in a second. "If you want me to stay," he said humbly, approaching her, as the sunlight played upon her hair—"if you want me to stay, I'll do it, Mary Jane."

There was an air of pathetic entreaty in Mrs. Hawkins' iron-featured face. The girl hesitated a moment. Then she laughed low and musically, displaying splendid teeth as she did so. She threw out her arm with a gesture of renunciation. "When I want you it will be easy enough to come after you. Go and see the world, Charles Henry Hawkins. You won't find anything like me in it."

And so it was arranged. Charles Henry started forth from the little homestead with twenty golden sovereigns in his pockets and a large bag in his hand. A procession of wondering villagers escorted him to the station, and one old lady gave him a bottle of raspberry vinegar to keep him from the refreshment bars as long as possible. Mary Jane declined to see him off. "You've got to go," she said, "and have your little whack, and get it over. Good-bye." And then she disappeared.

. . . . . .

Charles Henry roused himself from his couch and gazed apprehensively at the grey, grimy dawn as it streaked in through the tattered blinds of his simply furnished garret. Actuated by a desire to pass his enforced leisure in artistic pursuits, he had himself designed the mural decorations of his apartment with a piece of charcoal. The most stiking feature in the scheme of decoration was an effigy of Charles Henry, suspended from a branch of lofty elm by a hempen rope. Underneath this motionless figure were written the words, in Charles Henry's characteristic handwriting:

CHARLES HENRY HAWKINS,
Born 1st of April, 1873.
Did for himself, 1st April, 1894.
He was a PRIZE FOOL.

Charles Henry got out of bed and surveyed the effigy with grim satisfaction. As he gazed his sternness relaxed and a humorous twinkle took its place. "Well," he said with a sigh, "I've had a time and no mistake. Westminster Abbey, Houses of Parliament, Buckingham Palace, and the Tower—all the places I've read of at school—seen 'em all. They've been waiting for me ever since they were built, and I've seen 'em. What did I want to play cards for with confidence men and dissipate my substance—Uncle Jacob's twenty pounds—in riotous living? I dunno. I s'pose it was part of the time. But I ain't got a farthin' left. And I've had nothing to eat 'cept an orange for two days. I can't live on Buckingham Palace and Westminster Abbey and munch a slice out of the Tower. No, no, I've got to get something to eat or die. I can't wire to mother because nobody will lend me the money. Wonder if there is anything I can pawn?"

He felt in his pockets in a perfunctory way as if knowing what the result would be. "Waistcoat went last week," he said, addressing the effigy. "Last week. What am I to do now? There's a good deal in that prodigal son business of mother's. I reckon I'm emptier than he ever felt. But I have had a good time."

He dipped his curly head in a basin of water, and looked for his boots. They were not to be seen. "I couldn't have pawned them in my sleep," he said, staggering against the wall. "I'm beginning to see double. Wouldn't mother crow over me if she could see me now."

Suddenly his face brightened. "I promised her to get back a month ago, and she said if I didn't turn up in time she'd come and fetch me. Wonder if she'll do it. She'll have to come quick or there won't be enough of me to make a shadow."

He fell to counting the days. "She'd give me a week extra or a fortnight, and then come straight along," said Charles Henry reflectively. "Oh, yes, she'll come! But how am I to get along now?"

Then he looked round for his boots again, and someone knocked at the door.

Charles Henry reeled slightly as he opened the door. "It's you, is it?" This to the grimy slavey, an untidy girl, about sixteen, with tangled red hair and a profusion of blacklead and boot polish impartially spread over her expressive features.

"Yus, it's me," the girl said. "Who else did yer think it was?—the parish beadle! 'Ere's yer boots. Missus cribbed 'em when you was asleep last night and told me to lock 'em up."

Charles Henry received his boots with a forlorn attempt at jocosity. "She was afraid I'd spoil them with too much walking, I suppose?" he asked in a whisper.

"Yus," said the slavey. "And she says to Mrs. Parker wot lives next door, if you don't pay up to-morrer, she's a-goin' to chuck yer."

"She's strong enough," said Charles Henry, sighing.

The slavey produced a big slice of bread and butter, from under her apron. "You ain't a bad sort," she said. "Ketch 'old, and tuck into it."

Charles Henry was very hungry, but he was also proud. "It's your breakfast isn't it?" he asked.

"No," said the slavey, lying hard. "It's for you. I 'ad corfee and sassidges hours and hours ago."

"Do you think," said Charles Henry—"do you think, you poor little duffer, I'm going to rob you of the food you do get? Never. Don't lie like that."

With a dexterous movement the slavey repossessed herself of Charles Henry's boots. "If you don't eat," she said, "I'll lock 'm up again."

Charles Henry was forced to comply. He ate ravenously. "I should like to have the honour of shaking hands with you," he said solemnly when he had finished. "I have renewed my strength like the eagle."

"Orl right," said the slavey. "Your beak's gettin' very like an eagle's." And they shook hands.

That night after a long tramp in the streets, Charles Henry staggered heavily back to his garret. "I'll try to go to sleep," he said. "It will make the time pass quicker. It's a race between death and mother; but I've had a good time, a very good time; but when mother makes a start she generally wins." He slept for an hour. Then he again awoke, with that terrible craving for food. "I've had enough of the world," he said to the effigy opposite. "If I once get back to the farm I'll cut firewood for the rest of my days. Who's there?" Someone had knocked.

"It's me," said a well-known voice.

Charles Henry dissembled his emotion and tottered to the door. But Mrs. Hawkins could not dissemble hers. She drew him to her breast, cried over him, and patted his curly head, and nearly smothered him with kisses. Then she let him go, and Mary Jane shyly advanced. "I told you I'd come and fetch you when I wanted you," was all she said; "and here I am."

Charles Henry, with one supreme heroic effort, momentarily staved off the pangs of hunger. "I have had a time," he said, "a grand time: Houses of Parliament, Madame Tussaud's, Salvation Army, the Tower, and Zoological Gardens. Sit down on the bed, mother, and I'll tell you all about it."

Mary Jane looked at his thin cheeks for a moment, as Mrs. Hawkins glanced around the barren den.

"Well, you are a prodigy son!" said Mrs. Hawkins, ashamed to have let her feelings get the better of her.

"Hush!" said Mary Jane. "You don't understand. It's the fashion in London to get as high as you can, and the higher you get the more miserable you look. Charles Henry, you just go on telling your mother all about the sights, and I'll order dinner. Then we'll go round afterwards."

Mary Jane bustled about and achieved wonders. Ten minutes later a table and two chairs appeared in front of the diminutive slavey. Twenty minutes later Charles Henry sat before a somewhat rude but plentiful meal, suffering exquisite tortures as he waited for his mother to commence. It was with difficulty that he could restrain himself from tearing the food with his fingers—from rending it like a wild beast. Then he began to eat, and Mary's tears ran down into the potatoes.

Mrs. Hawkins was too short-sighted to notice this gratuitous but temperate addition to the meal. "Seems to me with all that money you didn't ought to be lodged up here," she said. "I reckon 'taint as good as our barn. How much have you got left?"

"More than twenty pounds, I think," said Mary Jane. "There's his purse lying on the bed half open."

Mrs. Hawkins was mollified. "Sakes," she said; "if I didn't oughter 'pologise. Charles Henry, I'm proud of you. You're real level-headed. An' it ain't taken away your appetite neither."

Charles Henry tried to explain, but Mary Jane put her finger to her lips, and Mrs. Hawkins never knew.

Charles Henry "hankered" after the flesh-pots no more. To cut firewood for Mary Jane was happiness enough, and when a man has grasped a truth like that, earth, air, and sky are his attendant ministers, who do his bidding and teach him all the joys of life.

The White Lady of Machow

DURING the last Polish revolution, the artillery captain, Baron Greisenek, of Tornopol, where his regiment was stationed, was dispatched to Machow with a troop of Hussars, to guard the frontier, and prevent the insurgents from crossing over from Galicia into Russia.

It was a lovely summer's evening when he arrived; the full moon was rising above the horizon, and the stars shone clear and bright above the round tower of the castle, which lay on a gentle rise behind the village.

Baron Greisenek stationed his vedettes along the frontier line (so far, indeed, to the right and left, that they reached the next body of troops), saluted the Cossack in command, quartered his men in the surrounding villages, and then betook himself, with his old sergeant, Madorassie, and half a troop of Hussars, up the gentle ascent to the Castle of Machow. The latter was an extensive edifice, with high, moss-grown walls, and round, massive towers, which reminded one more of a castle on the Dardanelles than a German castle on the Rhine. The moon cast a blue light over it, rendering it more mysterious-looking. The gates were closed. It appeared empty and deserted; no sound was audible, save from time to time the melancholy cry of a nightbird.

The captain signalled to the trumpeter to blow a blast. The shrill, cheerful notes rang out in the still night, and aroused countless bats and owls in the ruined walls, which flew whirling round the heads of the Hussars.

At the third blast of the bugle, steps were heard, a bunch of keys rattled, and at last the door creakingly turned upon its hinges. An old man in the Polish dress of the previous century, with a weather-beaten face and a long white beard, stood before the captain, and greeted him respectfully. Greisenek demanded quarters for himself and his men.

"The castle, with all it contains," said the old man solemnly, "is at your orders, sir. I have only to ask you not to take it ill if your rest, and that of your men, is somewhat disturbed at night." He drew nearer the Baron, and added, in a whisper, "there are ghosts in the castle."

The White Lady raised a warning hand.

"What?"

"The 'White Lady of Machow' is seen now and again."

"Soldiers know no fear!" exclaimed Greisenek laughing, "and least of all are we afraid of pretty women, and the 'White Lady of Machow' must have been handsome indeed if she is doing penance for her sins to-day. Forward!"

The Hussars rode into the courtyard; the gates were shut; the horsemen dismounted and led their horses to the stables. The windows and corridors were lit up by the moonlight, but only a single light was visible, and that was on the ground floor.

"Is the castle uninhabited?" inquired the Baron, whilst the old man held a lantern to light him up the broad steps of the castle.

"My master, Herr Krosnowski and his lady and daughter are living in Lemberg; the young master, I believe, is in Paris."

"Or with the insurgents yonder?"

"It is possible. I am here alone as the castle steward."

The old man opened a lofty, iron-bound door on the ground floor, and led the way through a suite of empty rooms, the walls of which were hung with old pictures, to a spacious apartment on one side of which ran an open gallery, approached by a winding staircase. This great room was adorned with life-size portraits, mythological paintings, Dutch flower and fruit pieces, ancient Polish, as well as Turkish, Mongolian, and Servian weapons, and old damask-covered furniture. In the centre stood a round table, with a cover spread for one person, and against the wall was a four-post bed prepared for the night. It looked as though the soldiers had been expected.

The Baron made himself comfortable, ate and drank, and praised the culinary skill of the steward, who waited on him attentively.

"I was four years in Paris with my master," said the old man. "I learnt to cook there."

"After this soup I could believe," thought the Baron, "that the castle is not uninhabited as it appears. Evidently the inmates intend to have no dealings with imperial officers. Well, so be it."

Then, turning to the old man, he said:

"What is this story about a woman in white?"

The steward took a candelabra and led the captain to the picture of a strangely beautiful woman, whose tall figure was wrapped from head to foot in a fur mantle. From the dark background looked out a pale face with proud blue eyes and full red lips, from beneath the fur-bordered cap fell rich, red-gold tresses like fiery snakes.

"That is she," said the steward, "The Wojewodin Barbara Krosnowski. She lived in the days of King Segismund Augustus, and was a sinful woman. God rest her soul."

. . . . . .

When the steward had left him, Greisenek carefully examined the whole apartment, and with this object mounted to the gallery above. He could discover nothing suspicious. After bolting the two doors, he laid his loaded pistols on the bed and went to sleep. He was aroused at midnight by the hollow strokes of the castle clock, and sat up to look round him. The entire room was lit up by the moon; the high windows were sharply defined against the panelled walls, the weapons shone with unnatural brilliancy, the portraits appeared like living persons, and the beautiful Barbara Krosnowski seemed to gaze at him with a threatening look in her blue eyes, and a scornful smile on her full lips, and when a sharp current of air swept through the vast room, and fanned his hot cheeks, he fancied he could see the hair of her furs wave gently.

He fell back and lay thinking for a long while, the oppressive silence stimulating his imagination, until the portraits seemed to step from their frames and hold converse with one another. He could hear their regular breathing and their low voices as they talked together, looking towards him now and then, and pointing, just for all the world as if they were discussing his presence in the old castle, with his men.

He started up suddenly from his reverie, bathed in a cold perspiration. The phantom shapes were there no longer, and from their frames the ghostly faces of the strange people, illuminated by the sickly rays of the moon, looked down upon him.

"I am only angry that you should be already betrothed," replied the Baron, kissing her hand.

A slight jarring noise directed his attention to the upper part of the wall at the far end of the room.

And now he noticed that the wall high up at the end of the gallery had opened, and he saw a form clad in white flowing robes sweep through it. Half-terrified, half-curious, he rose and fixed his gaze on the apparition, as it stood a moment in the cold light of the moon, looking straight into the face of the beautiful Barbara. It was the same lovely face, with the same proud blue eyes, framed in golden tresses, only the blue eyes no longer smiled seductively, but wore a look of gentle, wistful gravity. He seized his pistols involuntarily and cocked the trigger, but the white lady raised a warning hand, and vanished silently and swiftly from the other end of the gallery, where the wall, at her approach, opened and closed in mysterious silence after her.

It was long before the Baron fell asleep. When he awoke in the morning he questioned whether he had been dreaming, or had really seen the strange apparition. Beside him lay the pistol, with the trigger still cocked. He had certainly in the night made ready to fire.

But might not the full moon have played him a trick? He had just finished dressing as his old servant entered and put an end to his doubts.

"I have to report, captain," began the sergeant, "that the guard on the frontier has remained according to orders, and nothing suspicious has been seen, and nothing particular has occurred, but 'tis all as it should be here in the castle, captain."

"What, have you, too, seen something?"

"Terenz, who had the stable guard at midnight, declares a woman was walking up and down the corridors of the castle; in the courtyard, and in the garden, steps and voices were heard; the horses were restless, and your bay mare, sir, broke loose. They say the horses scented the ghost."

As Greisenek rode off to inspect his guards in the vaulted gateway, he met the steward,

"I say, fellow," he cried excitedly, "I've seen her!"

"Whom, your honour?"

"The White Lady of Machow!"

The steward crossed himself.

"That means nothing good," he muttered. "May no evil befall us!"

"Bah! we're not afraid."

. . . . . .

That night the ghost appeared a second time. On the stroke of twelve the White Lady stood once more in the gallery, raised her hand in warning, and vanished. She was seen by the Hussars, and the horses were as restless as before.

On the third night the troops received an alarm. A small body of insurgents appeared on the further side of the frontier; the Cossacks drew back, shots were exchanged, and flames were visible on the eastern horizon. Greisenek returned home an hour before midnight, took a hasty meal, and threw himself dressed upon his bed.

It suddenly occurred to him that this time he would wait for the ghost and address her. He rose, bolted the door, satisfied himself that his pistols were loaded, placed them in his belt, and ascended the winding stair. In the gallery he chose a projecting pillar for a hiding-place, and then awaited courageously, but with some excitement, the apparition of the White Lady.

With the first stroke of midnight, the wall opened, and the lovely ghost appeared. The Baron's heart beat fast, and he held his breath. Only two steps removed from him, the White Lady stood still, and looked down into the room below. With sudden determination, Greisenek stepped out from behind the pillar and seized in his arms a slim, living form.

"Holy Mary!" murmured a sweet, woman's voice, and two large blue eyes looked beseechingly into his.

"Fräulein Krosnowski?" said the captain.

"You know me?"

"The resemblance to your ancestress, the White Lady, is so striking.

"I entreat you not to betray me," murmured the beautiful vision. "I am betrothed to one whom my parents refuse to allow me to marry, whom they will not even permit to enter the house. For a year I have played the White Lady of Machow, only that I might be able to see him and speak with him for a moment. Well, I am in your power."

"My dear Madame, what can you think of me?" replied Greisenek. "Never could I, to whom chance has intrusted your secret, betray your confidence! Go your way without fear. How I envy him who awaits you!"

The girl smiled mischievously. The same instant a hollow sound came from the courtyard.

"What is that?" exclaimed the captain.

"Nothing, nothing," replied Fräulein Krosnowski, hastily; "'tis only my faithful steward, who is in my confidence, and plays the ghost to your Hussars, in order that I may reach the garden unperceived. Farewell."

"Shall I never see you again?"

The girl hesitated an instant.

"Yes," she said, giving him her hand, "you shall see me again if you will promise not to follow me, and not to quit this room before morning."

"I give you my word of honour."

"Then, farewell."

She vanished, and Greisenek again threw himself on the bed. Early in the morning he was awakened by his servant. With the latter appeared a Jew, who brought news that during the night a large troop of insurgents had assembled in Castle Machow, and had succeeded in crossing the border. Greisenek struck his forehead. He had been betrayed by the White Lady of Machow. His general sent for him, and awarded him a month's arrest.

One day he found on his window-sill a stone wrapped in paper.

Opening it, he read:

"BARON,—I am truly grieved that you have to suffer for my delinquency; maybe the thought that you are suffering for me will console you. You kept your word, I will keep mine.

"THE WHITE LADY OF MACHOW."

The day Greisenek regained his liberty a Jew visited him, and informed him, with an air of mystery, that a good friend of his would be waiting for him at eight in the evening in the courtyard of the Castle Bakowza. There was nothing improbable in such an incitation. More than one former Austrian officer was fighting in the ranks of the insurgents, who, if brought back wounded across the frontier, would throw themselves on the mercy of their former comrades. So Greisenek rode unaccompanied to Bakowza, distant only about an hour from headquarters, and, at the appointed hour, dismounted before the castle. It was a fine but cool autumn evening; the sky starlit, and silence reigned around. A boy came out and led away his horse.

As the Captain approached the castle, a tall, slight figure, leaning on the baluster of the broad steps, rose before him.

It was Fräulein Krosnowski, who gave him her hand.

"Are you angry with me?" she begun.

"I am only angry that you should be already betrothed," replied the Baron, kissing her hand. "How gladly would I have been thy slave."

"I am not betrothed," exclaimed the girl, laughing merrily. "Not betrothed!"

Greisenek threw his arms around her, and this time her rosy lips did not refuse to meet his. The same winter, the White Lady of Machow became the Baroness Greisenek.

The Harmony Chime

MANY years ago, in a large foundry in the city of Ghent, was found a young workman by the name of Otto Holstein. He was not nineteen years of age, but none of the workmen could equal him in his special department—bell casting, or moulding. Far and near the fame of Otto's bells extended, the clearest and sweetest, people said, that were ever heard.

Of course, the great establishment of Von Erlangen, in which Otto worked, got the credit of his labours; but Von Erlangen and Otto himself knew very well to whom the superior tone of the bells was due. The master did not pay him higher wages than the others, but by degrees he grew to be general superintendent in his department in spite of his extreme youth.

"Yes, my bells are good," he said to a friend one day who was commenting upon their merits; "but they do not make the music I will yet strike from them. They ring alike for all things. To be sure, when they toll for a funeral the slow measure makes them seem mournful, but then the notes are really the same as in a wedding peal. I shall make a chime of bells that will sound at will every chord in the human soul."

"Then wilt thou deal in magic," said his friend, laughing; "and the Holy Inquisition will have somewhat to do with thee. No human power can turn a bell into a musical instrument."

"But I can," he answered, briefly; "and Inquisition or not, I will do it."

He turned abruptly from his friend and sauntered, lost in thought, down the narrow street which led to his home. It was a humble, red-tiled cottage, of only two rooms, that he had inherited from his grandfather. There he lived alone with his widowed mother. She was a mild, pleasant-faced woman, and her eyes brightened as her son bent his tall head under the low doorway, as he entered the little room. "Thou art late, Otto," she said, "and in trouble, too," as she caught sight of his grave, sad face.

"Yes," he answered, "when I asked Herr Erlangen for an increase of salary, for my work grows harder every day, he refused it. Nay, he told me if I was not satisfied, I could leave, for there were fifty men ready to take my place. Ready! yes, I warrant they're ready enough, but to be able is a different thing."

His mother sighed deeply.

"Thou will not leave Herr Erlangen's, surely. It is little we get, but it keeps us in food."

"I must leave," he answered. "Nay, do not cry out, mother! I have other plans, and thou wilt not starve. Monsieur Dayrolles, the rich Frenchman, who lives in the Linden-Strasse, has often asked me why I do not set up a foundry of my own. Of course, I laughed—I who never have a thaler to spend; but he told me he and several other rich friends of his would advance the means to start me in business. He is a great deal of his time at Erlangen's, and is an enthusiast about fine bells. Ah! we are great friends, and I am going to him after supper."

"People say he is crazy," said his mother.

"Crazy!" indignantly. "People say that of everybody who has ideas they can't understand. They say I am crazy when I talk of my chime of bells. If I stay with Erlangen, he gets the credit of my work; but my chime must be mine, mine alone, mother!" His eyes lighted with a kind of wild enthusiasm whenever he talked on this subject.

His mother's cheerful face grew sad, as she laid her hand on his shoulder.

"Why, Otto, thou art not thyself when thou speakest of those bells."

"More my real self, mother, than at any other time!" he cried. "I only truly live when I think of how my idea is to be carried out. It is to be my life's work; I know it, I feel it. It is upon me that my fate is woven inextricably in that ideal chime. It is God-sent. No great work but the maker is possessed wholly by it. Don't shake your head, mother. Wait till my 'Harmony Chime' sounds from the great cathedral belfry, and then shake it, if you can."

His mother smiled faintly.

"Thou art a boy—a mere child, Otto, though a wonderful genius I must confess. Thy hopes delude thee, for it would take a lifetime to carry out thine idea."

"Then let it take a lifetime!" he cried vehemently. "Let me accomplish it when I am too old to hear it distinctly, and I will be content that its first sounds toll my dirge. I must go now to Monsieur Dayrolles. Wish me good luck, dearest mother," and he stooped and kissed her tenderly.

Otto did not fail. The strange old man in his visits to the foundry had noticed the germs of genius in the boy, and grown very fond of him. He was so frank, so honest, so devoted to his work, and had accomplished so much at his early age, that Monsieur Dayrolles saw a brilliant future before him.

Besides, the old gentleman, with a Frenchman's vanity, felt that if the "Harmony Chime" could be made, the name of the munificent patron would go down to posterity with that of the maker. He believed firmly that the boy some day would accomplish his purpose. So, although the revolt of the Netherlands had begun, and he was preparing to return to his own country, he advanced the necessary funds, and saw Otto established in business before he quitted Ghent.

In a very short time work poured in upon Otto. During that long and terrible war the manufacture of cannon alone made the fortunes of the workers in iron. So, five years from the time he left Von Erlangen, we find Otto Holstein a rich man at twenty-four years of age. But the idea for which he laboured had never for a moment left his mind. Sleeping or waking, toiling or resting, his thoughts were busy perfecting the details of the great work.

"Thou art twenty-four to-day, Otto," said his good mother, "and rich beyond our hopes. When wilt thou bring Gertrude home to me? Thou hast been betrothed now for three years, and I want a daughter to comfort my declining years. Thou doest thy betrothed maiden a grievous wrong to delay without cause. The gossips are talking already."

"Let them talk," laughed Otto. "Little do Gertrude or I care for their silly tongues. She and I have agreed that the 'Harmony Chime' is to usher in our marriage day. Why, good mother, no man can serve two mistresses, and my chime has the oldest claim. Let me accomplish it, and then the remainder of my life belongs to Gertrude, and thou, too, best of mothers."

He loved his mother, but he seemed now to forget her in the feverish eagerness with which he threw himself into his labours. He had been a devoted lover to Gertrude, but he now never had a spare moment to give to her—in fact, he only seemed to remember her existence in connection with the peal which would ring in their wedding day. His labours were prolonged far over the appointed time, and meanwhile the internal war raged more furiously, and the Netherlands were one vast battle-field. No interest did Otto seem to take in the stirring events around him. The bells held his whole existence captive.

At last the moulds were broken, and the bells came out of their husks perfect in form, and shining as stars in Otto's happy eyes. They were mounted in the great belfry, and for the test-chime Otto had employed the best bell-ringers in the city.

It was a lovely May morning, and almost crazed with excitement and anxiety, Otto, accompanied by a few chosen friends, waited outside the city for the first notes of the "Harmony Chime." At some distance he thought he could better judge of the merits of his work.

At last the first notes were struck, clear, sonorous, and so melodious that his friends cried aloud with delight. But with finger upraised for silence, and eyes full of ecstatic delight, Otto stood like a statue until the last note died away. Then his friends caught him as he fell forward in a swoon—a swoon so like death that no one thought he would recover.

But it was not death, and he came out of it with a look of serene peace on his face that it had not worn since boyhood. He was married to Gertrude that very day, but every one noticed that the ecstasy which transfigured his face seemed to be drawn more from the sound of the bells than the sweet face beside him.

"Don't you see a spell is cast on him as soon as they begin to ring?" said one, after the bells had ceased to be a wonder. "If he is walking, he stops short; and if he is working, the work drops, and a strange fire comes in his eyes; and I have seen him shudder all over as if he had an ague."

In good truth the bells seemed to have drawn a portion of Otto's life to them. When the incursions of the war forced him to fly from Ghent with his family, his regrets were not for his injured property, but that he could not hear the bells.

He was absent two years, and when he returned it was to find the cathedral almost a ruin, and the bells gone no one knew where. From that moment a settled melancholy took possession of Otto. He made no attempt to retrieve his losses; in fact, he gave up work altogether, and would sit all day with his eyes fixed on the ruined belfry.

People said he was melancholy mad, and, I suppose, it was the truth, but he was mad with a kind of gentle patience, very sad to see. His mother had died during their exile; and now his wife, unable with all her love to rouse him from his torpor, faded slowly away. He did not notice her sickness, and his poor numbed brain seemed imperfectly to comprehend her death. But he followed her to the grave, and, turning from it, moved slowly down the city, passed the door of his old home without looking at it, and went out of the city gates.

After that he was seen in every city in Europe at different intervals. Charitable people gave him alms, but he never begged. He would enter a town, take his station near a church, and wait until the bells rang for matins or vespers, then take up his staff and, sighing deeply, move off.

Years rolled over the head of the wanderer, but still his slow march continued. His hair had grown white, and his strength had failed him so much that he only tottered instead of walked, but still that wistful seeking look was in his eyes.

One glorious evening in midsummer he was crossing a river in Ireland. The kind-hearted boatman had been moved by the old man's imploring gestures to take him over. "He's mighty nigh his end, anyhow," he muttered, looking at the feeble movements of the old pilgrim as he stumbled to his seat.

Suddenly through the evening air came the distant sound of a melodious chime. At the first note the pilgrim leapt to his feet and threw up his arms.

"Found!" he cried, "found at last!"

"It's the bells of the convent," said the wondering man, not understanding Otto's words spoken in a foreign tongue, but answering his gesture. "They were brought from somewhere in Holland, when they were fighting there. Moighty fine bells they are, too. But he isn't listening to me."

No, he heard nothing but the bells. He merely whispered, "Come back to me after so many years! Oh, love of my soul! Oh, thought of my life! Peal on, for your voices tell me of Paradise."

The last note floated through the air, and as it died away something else soared aloft for ever—free from the clouds and struggles of life.

Otto lay dead, his face full of peace and joy, for the weary quest of his crazy brain was over, and the "Harmony Chime" had called him to his eternal rest.

PLEASE NOTE.

COMMENCING with the issue now on sale, the size and shape of PEARSON'S LIBRARY undergo considerable alterations, which I hope will have the effect of further popularising this charming series of novels.

On all hands PEARSON'S LIBRARY is so well spoken of that I have been only too pleased to go to considerable expense in improvements, which will, in my opinion, enhance the value of the series in the eyes of the reader.

Though the size of the page is somewhat reduced, in order to make the volume of a more handy shape, this is more than compensated for by an increase in the number of pages.

Each volume will in future consist of 256 pages, instead of 120 or so as heretofore.

The special object of this change is to give readers better novels, at the same time enabling them to carry a volume of the LIBRARY with more convenience to themselves, and less chance of injury to the binding or cover of the book. I am sure you will find PEARSON'S LIBRARY in its new form a most handy size, and specially suited for railway journeys, and whiling away odd moments of leisure.

The first novel of the new series is entitled "IN THE SPRING-TIME OF LOVE," by Miss IZA DUFFUS HARDY, and is fully illustrated by Miss FLORENCE WHITE.

PRICE SIXPENCE. NOW ON SALE.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and friend of Geoffrey.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Byngham—An army officer, and cousin to Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love for Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger which threatens himself and the General's household. In view of the condition of affairs, Sir Arthur visits his lawyer to make his will, and, learning from him that his cousin, Captain Byngham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Byngham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty. On the tenth of June Geoffrey goes to Wales, and is followed by Kuttapani, who attacks him in a lonely spot and leaves him for dead. Geoffrey, however, recovers, and follows him.

CHAPTER XII.

On the Track.

There was no great difficulty in following the Hindoo down the slope and along the valley, for he never once looked back; and Geoffrey took care to keep a good way behind. Gradually, as the country became cultivated, and cover in the shape of trees and hedges became more plentiful, he ventured to draw a little nearer.

But when the sun went down and the shadows began to lengthen, the difficulty of keeping the Hindoo in sight without going too close to him became very great. By this time Geoffrey was greatly exhausted. He had walked continuously since daybreak, except for the short rest he had taken beside the pool; and the excitement which had sustained him when he was struggling to save his life had now died away. His injured shoulder, too, gave him a good deal of trouble. But the Indian glided on, stealing like a baleful shadow through the unfrequented lanes and field paths, as if he were incapable of feeling fatigue.

They were by this time a long way from the mountain which had witnessed the attempted murder; and Geoffrey had lost his landmarks entirely. Still he pressed on wondering what town or railway-station the Hindoo could be making for.

The country was now well wooded, but the farmhouses were few and far between, and the roads were nearly deserted. Once or twice, however, Geoffrey met a hay-maker, or a farmer's wife coming home from market; and he never failed to ask them whether they had met a dark-coloured man. The reply always was that the man was a little way ahead; and Geoffrey was content, feeling sure that Kuttapani had no idea he was being followed, and would not try to evade pursuit.

But when twilight merged into darkness Geoffrey felt that at any risk he must keep closer to the man he was "shadowing." He walked on rapidly, therefore, for some minutes, but to his surprise he did not overtake the Hindoo. Then he began to run, and ran on steadily for perhaps a mile. Still no one was visible.

Geoffrey was perplexed and vexed beyond measure. It seemed as if he must in some way have passed the man. Could he have been taken up in any vehicle and carried on? It was possible, but not likely, for no cart, gig, or carriage had come by for some time. Could he have gone out of the road to ask his way at the door of some farmhouse? That seemed the most likely explanation. But in that case the Hindoo would in a few minutes overtake his "shadow," meet him face to face. Clearly that would not do.

For the last mile and a half the road had been bordered on the right by a plantation of young beech trees. There could hardly be a farmhouse in that direction; but it was possible that some lane on the left, which had remained unnoticed in the darkness, might lead to one.

At any rate it seemed clear to Geoffrey that he had overshot his mark, that Kuttapani must be now behind him; and that the best thing he could do was to sit down and wait for him. So he pushed his way through the hedge that separated the plantation from the road, and choosing a position from which he could see any one passing along the road, he sat down with his back to a tree.

Worn out with fatigue and faint with hunger as he was, the mere rest was delicious. He found that he had to change his position constantly, or he would have fallen asleep.

A farmer's wife.

After waiting for half an hour he rose, feeling stiff and sore. No one had passed along the road. It was plain to Geoffrey that he had lost the trail. In all probability the Hindoo was camping out for the night in the very wood on the border of which he was standing. But to trace him was of course impossible.

There was just one chance left, and that was to make for the nearest railway-station. The next day being Sunday no trains ran on the little branch line which served the district; and it seemed probable that the Hindoo would wait in the neighbourhood till Monday morning. At any rate it was evident that nothing more could be done that night. So Geoffrey limped on till he came to a small roadside public-house, and there, with some difficulty, he found shelter for the night.

Before going to bed he treated his injured shoulder and his swollen feet with the old-fashioned remedy—a mixture of melted butter and spirits—and found that next morning he was able to dress himself, and move about, without much inconvenience.

After breakfast he inquired for the nearest railway-station. It was only four miles off, so he walked over in the course of the day, and found beside the station a new red-brick "hotel." Here he rested for the remainder of the day.

On Monday morning Geoffrey rose at five and made a survey of the railway-station and its approaches. The one small waiting-room had a window which commanded a view of the road; and as soon as the place was open he took up his station at the window. His plan was to buy a first-class ticket as soon as the booking-clerk arrived; and the moment he caught sight of Kuttapani he would take his seat in one of the carriages—which were already drawn up at the platform—and pull down the blinds. The Hindoo would probably travel second or third class; and it was unlikely that he would look into the first-class compartments.

The minutes passed; and a bell rang. Still no sign of the Hindoo.

Geoffrey took out his watch, still keeping his eye on the road.

"Take your seat, sir, please," said the guard, putting his head into the room. "Are you expecting someone?" he added.

Geoffrey hardly heard him, so keen was his anxiety.

"No—that is, yes," he answered confusedly. "I expected a man I know will travel by this train."

"Any one in sight, Joe?" the guard called out to a porter who occupied a better look-out on the top of a truck.

"Not a living soul," answered the lad.

Geoffrey turned from the window in despair, and allowed the guard to hurry him into a compartment. His plan had failed! He could not even make up his mind whether it would be better for him to go on, or to remain where he was. The train had started before he had come to a decision. The only chance left, so far as he saw, was to go to Paddington and watch the arrival of the trains there; and that was a chance so slender that it seemed only one degree better than nothing.

At the third station the train stopped at, Geoffrey thought he might as well try to get a newspaper. He stood up, to let down the window, just as the carriages ran past the signal-box at the end of the platform. Before the window fell into its place he had passed before the Hindoo's eyes!

Kuttapani was standing by himself at one end of the platform, watching the train as it swept in.

"Has he seen me?" was the question that tormented Geoffrey for some time afterwards. On the whole it seemed most likely that the Hindoo had not seen the man he had gone out to slay.

Though about to stop, the train was running pretty fast at the moment. The Englishman's face was on a higher level than his enemy's; and, above all, the Hindoo was merely looking out for a vacant place; he was not searching for any one; least of all for the man who, he believed, was lying stark and cold at the bottom of a tarn on Penrhyllbach. Trembling all over with a curious excitement, Geoffrey resumed his seat.

Till the train reached Paddington he never left the carriage. Feeling certain that the Hindoo was on board the train, he contented himself with glancing out at each station at which they stopped, to see whether Kuttapani had left the train. As Geoffrey's carriage happened to be in the front part of the train, there was no great difficulty or risk in doing this.

At length they reached the Paddington terminus. Before the carriages were brought to a standstill Geoffrey had leaped out and was talking to the driver of the fastest looking of the cab-horses in waiting.

"There's a Hindoo arriving by that train," he said. "If you follow him quietly till he gets home, I'll give you five shillings in addition to your fare."

"All right, sir."

Geoffrey went round to the other side of the hansom, so as to be hidden from the crowd who were pouring out of the carriages on to the platform, and waited. The minutes passed, and the cabman made no sign.

"Don't you see him? He must be there!" said Geoffrey, in an excited whisper.

The man took a last long survey of the platform, and then bent down to say—"Not arrived, sir. I'll take my dyin' oath no gentleman o' colour has alighted from that there train."

Geoffrey was intensely mortified. He had been favoured by fortune to an unusual degree, and he told himself he had simply thrown his chances away.

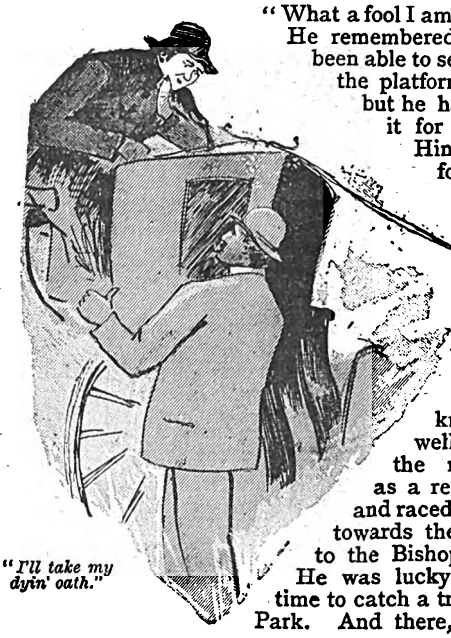
He handed the cabman five shillings, and walked moodily away.

The cab-driver called after him.

"Well?"

"Don't you think it's possible your friend may 'ave got out at Westbourne Park?"

"What a fool I am!" cried Geoffrey. He remembered that he had not been able to see all the way along the platform at that station; but he had somehow taken it for granted that the Hindoo would make for London itself.



"I'll take my dyin' oath."

The cabman smiled superior. "Jump inside, sir," said the man. "I'll take you there quicker than the train." But Geoffrey knew London too well for this. He gave the man half-a-crown as a reward for his hint, and raced along the platform towards the bridge that leads to the Bishop's Road platform. He was lucky, arriving just in time to catch a train to Westbourne Park. And there, to his great joy,

One of the passengers was the Hindoo.

he came upon a trace of the Hindoo. The ticket-collector at the exit had noticed his colour. But the man could give him no further information beyond the fact that he did not think the Oriental had taken a cab.

"We pretty often has these Indian gen'l'men come this way," said the man; and that was all he could tell.

To search for a man who had had twenty minutes' start in the wilderness of North-West London seemed to Geoffrey a mad undertaking. Yet he did not quite give up hope. If Kuttapani used the Westbourne Park Station, and walked home from it, he must live within—say, two miles of it. He must use it occasionally. It would only be necessary to watch the station and the roads leading to it in order to come upon him. There was, to be sure, the risk that he might meet the Hindoo face to face. That would spoil his plans altogether; but it could not be helped. The risk must be run.

At any rate, there seemed nothing more to be done that night. It was hardly to be expected that Kuttapani would return to the railway-station just after a long and fatiguing journey.

Geoffrey was pacing aimlessly back and forwards near the exit from the down platform, when a train arrived from the City; and the passengers who had alighted swarmed out of the narrow passage past the ticket-collector.

He stood back to let them pass him.

Suddenly he gave a start. One of the passengers was the Hindoo who had tried to poison him in the refreshment room just twelve months before!

The young Englishman knew him at once, and drew back further into the shadow—for by this time it was dusk—lest the Indian should catch sight of him. But it never occurred to the Hindoo barrister to look behind him. He gave up his ticket, declined a cab, and walked off in a north-westerly direction. Geoffrey Dundas followed on the other side of the street, not twenty yards behind.

CHAPTER XIII.

AT THE ENEMY'S HEADQUARTERS.

FOR more than half an hour Geoffrey followed the Hindoo barrister through the streets. The thoroughfares they passed through were so empty of traffic, that he had some difficulty in keeping the Indian in sight without awakening his suspicions.

At length a district was reached which had evidently been at one time a respectable, not to say fashionable, suburb. The houses were detached or semi-detached, often surrounded by gardens of considerable size. But they all had a forlorn, neglected appearance, looking as if they knew that the days of their prosperity were gone for ever. Some were let at low rents, others stood empty, their blank windows and grass-grown walks giving a melancholy aspect to the neighbourhood.

Down a street of such houses the Indian turned, Geoffrey still following a short distance behind. He entered a garden gate, and Geoffrey, stopping short suddenly as if he had lost his way, went back some yards. He wished above all things to hide from the Hindoo the fact that he had been "shadowed." For the greater part of an hour Geoffrey loitered about, keeping an eye all the time on the gate through which the Hindoo had passed. Then he ventured to approach the house itself.

By this time it was as dark as it could be at that season of the year. There was no moon. She had not yet risen.

The gate through which the Hindoo had disappeared led to a front garden, small, but planted thick with overgrown shrubs. The house itself was large and semi-detached. The nearer one of the pair seemed to be empty, but no notice board was visible. Geoffrey tried the gate. It was padlocked, so the young man placed his hand on the top of it and vaulted lightly over.

The house the Hindoo had entered was now on Geoffrey's right, almost hidden by the thick shrubs of both gardens. Each house had a large bow window on the first floor as well as on the ground floor. The street door of each was at the side farthest from the adjoining tenement; so that a casual observer might easily have supposed that the building formed but one residence.

Geoffrey walked across the grass-plot which lay between him and the house, and soon assured himself that no one was living in it, not even a caretaker. A large board, which bore an inscription to the effect that "This Desirable Family Residence" was to be let or sold, lay on its back inside the neglected laurel hedge. The wind had blown it down, and no one, apparently, had thought it worth while to stick it up again.

Geoffrey now passed through a screen of lattice-work to the back part of the house. Dark as it was, he could see that an out-building of some kind had been erected against the back wall. It was a large greenhouse. The builder had, from motives of economy, built one large square room, and then divided it in two by a partition, making one half the conservatory for one of the two houses, while the other half served the same purpose for the other dwelling.

Each house had a basement flood, so that in each the ground floor was raised some feet above the level of the soil. In the empty house—that is, the one Geoffrey was now exploring—a French window opened out of one of the ground floor rooms into the conservatory, with a short flight of steps leading down from the floor of the house to the floor of the conservatory.

On the side of the greenhouse, next to the adjoining house—that is, the one the Hindoo had entered—the space was covered with shelves for flower pots, mostly empty. The roof and a great part of the partition-wall were covered with a creeping plant which had spread over half the wall-space the conservatory afforded.

All this Geoffrey saw at a glance as he stood outside the greenhouse, and looked through the lower part of the glass door which led from it to the garden.

It occurred to him that perhaps he might survey the premises more effectually if he could find his way into the empty house; and it struck him that he might gain an entrance by the French window leading from the conservatory. To enter the conservatory was easy, since a pane in the glass door was broken and nothing more had to be done than to put one's hand through the hole and turn the key.

Passing quietly through the conservatory to the end nearest the house, where a miniature fountain rusted in slimy neglect, Geoffrey mounted the steps which led to the French window and tried it. It was securely fastened.

A low cry all but burst from his lips.

He was in the act of turning to come away, when the sound of voices fell on his ear with startling distinctness. It was as if some one were talking at his elbow. He wheeled rapidly round, listening eagerly.

Soon he understood where the sound came from. The partition-wall between the two conservatories was merely of wood. A plank had fallen out; and the creeper which clothed the shabby wall covered the deficiency. There was, as it were, a natural communication between this deserted greenhouse and the conservatory belonging to the adjoining house.

With cautious steps Geoffrey moved nearer to the partition. The voices sounded loud and clear, but he could only understand a word here and there. He could make out that the language spoken was Hindustani; for at one time he had thought of going out to practise in Calcutta, and had mastered a little Hindustani as a preliminary step. But as for following the conversation, that was impossible.

Very gently—for he well knew that a creaking board might mean discovery, and that discovery might mean instant death—he mounted the shelves in front of him, till his head was on a level with the hole in the wall. Then, gently parting the foliage with his fingers, he looked through.

A low cry all but burst from his lips, so great was his astonishment.

A floor had been laid down in the greenhouse, on a level with that of the adjoining room in the house itself, so that the two together formed one large irregularly shaped apartment. The walls of this oddly formed room were hung with coloured silk draperies, which were gently stirred by the breeze admitted through the windows of the conservatory. The place was kept at a tropical temperature—Geoffrey could feel the stream of heated air on his face—and the air was not merely warm, but laden with the perfumes of some strange gum which was being burnt.

Plants, bearing large bright blossoms, and palm leaves lined the walls. The floor was covered with Indian mats and rugs. Part of it was raised, as if it were meant to serve for a couch. Silk cushions were strewn about on this dais; and on the lower floor were some bamboo tables. Such ornaments as could be seen were of brass, silver, or ivory. In a word the apartment looked as if it had been carried by some genie from an Indian palace, and transported to that grimy London suburb.

Geoffrey was more than surprised—he was astounded.

Though he heard voices plainly enough, he could see no one. The speakers (he judged from the sound of their voices) were seated close to the wall behind which he was standing, and therefore out of sight. But he could form a very good guess as to who they were. The hereditary priests of the Temple at Churruckpore—that undying body whose ancestors founded and consecrated the temple in far-off ages, and whose vengeance seemed insatiable—they alone could be the masters of this house. It was plain that they had made this house their headquarters, the centre from which they could carry out their schemes of revenge.

Nothing more was to be learned in the meantime. Geoffrey returned by the way he had come, and made his way to the street by vaulting a second time over the padlocked gate.

As he did so a burly policeman, passing along the opposite side of the road, called after him in pompous tones of authority, and wanted to know what he had been doing. The man was—or pretended to be—highly suspicious of Geoffrey's conduct; but a shilling judiciously introduced went a long way to quiet the good man's scruples, and he finally touched his helmet civilly, and walked away.

Geoffrey looked after him a moment or two as he marched solemnly, with rhythmic swing of his body and clank of boots, down the echoing street. The man seemed a perfect representative of British law and British justice—grave, honest, inflexible; but, oh, how slow, how stupid, when confronted with motives or methods foreign to the sphere of his experience!

What sort of reception, Geoffrey wondered, would he meet with if he went to any police-station in London, related his experience, and claimed the protection of the law? Why, they would laugh at him, and send him about his business—set him down as crazy. Unless a fact is patent to the meanest intelligence, proved up to the hilt, it does not exist for the police authorities any more than for a judge and jury.

What—Geoffrey asked himself—what complaint could he make? That an attempt had been made to poison him? The police would say it was pure imagination. That the Hindoos had visited the General with murderous intent? Mere unfounded suspicions! That Kuttapani had tried to kill him, and had all but succeeded?

Ah! That is another matter, the police inspector would say. Find Kuttapani, as you call him, and we will have something to say to him. Or, we will even try to find him for you. But as to these respectable householders, what is there to connect them with Kuttapani's attempt?

Indeed there was nothing. There was not a tittle of direct evidence against any one of the gang except Kuttapani. None. Absolutely none. And, even in his case, would not a jury ask what the motive for the alleged attempt at murder could be, and laugh at the idea of a long-standing vendetta actuating a few mild Hindoos?

Would they not say that it was very strange that Geoffrey had not made any complaint at a police-station in Wales? The chances were that they would finally remember that they "had only the prosecutor's word for it," and give the accused the benefit of the doubt.

No. Geoffrey was convinced that the law, and her ministers—the police, could do nothing to help him. And, in any case, he did not seek to revenge himself against Kuttapani. It would do him small good, and afford him no satisfaction, if that ignorant, tiger-like creature were to wear out his days in penal servitude.

No. He wanted to protect the General and Leila from Kuttapani's masters; and he was convinced that in order to do this he must adopt the methods of his enemies, and meet cunning with cunning. Merely to baffle one attempt after another would not do. Sooner or later an attempt would succeed, and another murder would be done.

But if the Hindoos were met and baffled on their own ground, if they found that their schemes were unravelled, and their most sudden attacks anticipated, they might be compelled to abandon their infernal schemes of vengeance.

Geoffrey still felt confident that when he allowed the Hindoos to suppose him dead, and began to play the spy upon them, he was pursuing the right path. But he felt utterly uncertain as to what his next step should be. To have found the right path was a great point. But, alas! the way was so dark that it was impossible to see a yard in advance. He felt like a blind man, groping his way through the streets of a strange city.

Passed from room to room.

Before leaving the street Geoffrey ascertained that the house the Hindoo barrister had entered was called Lancaster Villa, while the one he had tried to explore was named Chester Villa. Having fixed these names and the name of the street—Hartwell Road—in his memory, he went to an hotel, and after a hearty supper in place of dinner he went to bed.

Next morning Geoffrey's first care was to find lodgings in a quiet street not far from the road in which the Hindoos had fixed their abode. He then telegraphed to his friend Linton, asking him to call upon him at his new quarters that evening.

In the afternoon, after making necessary purchases, he called at the local house-agents and ascertained that the house next to the one occupied by the Hindoos was to let. Geoffrey explained that he did not wish to become a tenant, but that he was willing to pay a small sum for the use of the empty greenhouse.

This was arranged, and Geoffrey thus acquired the right of entering the greenhouse attached to Chester Villa at any time he pleased. The agent's clerk also promised, for a small consideration, to give him timely notice of any one proposing to take the house—an event which was far from likely—so that he might secure it if need be.

Linton turned up at the appointed hour, and listened with the keenest interest, while his friend told what had happened during the last few days. But when Geoffrey told him of his determination to conceal his existence from every one for the next twelve months, Linton felt inclined to smile.

"Seems an absurd sort of thing to do, doesn't it?" said Geoffrey quietly, answering his friend's look.

"Well, yes. I confess it seems so to me."

"Linton, it is the only thing to do. Next year, as sure as you live, these human bloodhounds will attack the General. I believe they would have done it last week if he had not got out of their way. But now that they suppose me to be dead I shall be free from their observation. I will keep a watch on them, and I hope not only to save the General, but to catch them in the act, and choke out this accursed conspiracy."

Linton shook his head.

"I hardly think you were cut out for an amateur detective, my dear fellow," he said. "And at any rate, I see nothing to prevent your living in the Temple as usual."

"No, Linton. You forget that the first attempt on my life was made in the restaurant belonging to the Law Courts, and I more than suspect that it was made by a Hindoo who has got called to the bar. If I went to the Temple my enemies would hear of it next day. But I don't mind shamming dead for a time. My practice won't suffer, seeing that I have none to speak of. My friends may suppose that I have gone on a yachting expedition, or anything they choose.

"What I want you to do is to go to my chambers now and then, and bring me my letters, making the best excuse you can to my clerk. He can tell any one who asks for me that I am out of town. Very likely I shall take a run on the Continent, for I am convinced that those queer murderers will lie by for another twelvemonth. I hardly expect to find them taking any active steps till next spring."

"And Sir Arthur?"

"I will write to him and say that I shall be invisible for the next twelve months. Of course, he can write to me if he likes. And that reminds me—would you mind addressing a few envelopes to the General? You know the address—Seacombe Towers, near Torwyn, South Devon."

"With pleasure. But why all this precaution?"

"Suppose that next year one of Sir Arthur's servants were to mention in Kuttapani's hearing that I had been writing to his master during the year?"

"Well you can't be too careful," returned Linton; and after smoking several pipes, and promising once more to carry out all the instructions given to him to the letter, the young barrister took his leave.

Geoffrey was now fully prepared to begin his watching campaign. But it is not given to man to foresee the future, even for a day. No sooner had he resigned himself to the distasteful life of seclusion and espionage, than an event happened which upset all his calculations.

After dark on the following evening he went to make a reconnaissance at Lancaster Villa. From the street no light was visible. He went into the conservatory of the adjoining house as he had done before, but could hear no sound.

Unwilling to run the risk of being seen by the Hindoos, as he probably would be if he were to come in the morning, yet resolved to examine the house by daylight, Geoffrey spent the short summer night in the conservatory.

As soon as it was light he climbed up to the place where the board was missing from the partition-wall, and looked through the aperture.

The flowers and creepers were there; for the rest—bare boards! Silken hangings, rugs, furniture, luxurious appointments, had vanished like a dream! It almost seemed as if the Hindoos had been made aware by some enchantment that their lurking-place had been discovered, and had stolen silently away in the night.

Geoffrey went into the garden, made his way without much difficulty into the garden of Lancaster Villa, and finally succeeded in entering the house itself.

There was something eerie in the very echo of the young man's footsteps as he passed with stealthy step from room to room in the dim, ghostly morning light, thinking that behind every door there might be an enemy waiting him, with murder in his heart. But he found no one. From cellar to garret the house was empty and bare.

CARMELITA'S SPRINGTIME

THE rain came down so suddenly that Lackland had to jump to it to reach the porch of the nearest house. When he got there, he took his position near the wall, that the big drops falling so heavily on the dusty street might not reach his immaculate flannel trousers as mud.

Not that Lackland was strongly averse to a wetting. He had often been drenched to the skin when sailing his boat, and always took it with the most matter-of-fact composure. But he did object to a draggled look or to getting just enough moistened to make the necessity of a change doubtful, despite a certain unpleasant feeling from clinging raiment. That was discomfort bought by no pleasure void of all compensation.

Showers in Nice are often of this unheralded kind. But violent effusions, whether of the heart or sky, spend themselves quickly. The rain subsided after some moments. Lackland came forward, and, leaning against the slender column bereft of paint, but brown with years, he put his head out to reconnoitre, raising it slightly to see if he might venture forth with the rest of himself.

Something that was not a raindrop fell upon his straw hat. He saw a snowy gardenia tumble into the mud; and, alas! lose its virginal whiteness. Evidently it had come from the top of the porch, for not even in Flora's capital does a spring sky rain flowers.

He twisted his head round and looked up. As he did so, a second blossom smote him softly on the cheek. He caught it as it fell, and also caught a glimpse of a hand quickly drawn back—not so quickly but that he got an impression of its brown, tapering slimness.

He picked his way out into the street a few paces, holding the gardenia in his hand, and then turned, with equal deliberation, to scan the top of the portico. It was overrun with flowers, which tumbled in a wave of bloom over the worm-eaten ledge. Seen through this glowing mass was a young girl, not more than sixteen. Her small, white teeth showed through lips faintly smiling, while her long eyes, narrowed with twinkling merriment, looked indolently down upon him. Lackland smiled in frank good-fellowship, and held up the gardenia.

"Did you drop this?" he asked gaily.

The girl, leaning her vivid face on her crossed hands, said not a word, but continued to regard him with easy amusement. He was there, and it was mildly entertaining to see what he would do.

"Well, I shall keep it," he said, tucking it into the lapel of his coat.

"I threw it away," said the girl, with mild disdain.

"You threw it at me! I captured it, and so I have a right to it," he retorted.

He raised the lapel of his coat, and kissed the flower. After this extravagance he raised his eyes again to the girl.

"The rain has stopped," she said mockingly.

"Yes, I believe it has. I wish it would begin again. Then I would have to wait for it to blow over once more," he returned coolly.

"But it has stopped," she repeated insistently.

"And I am going, if that is what you mean. You are not very hospitable to a poor, wet stranger. Good-bye!"

He did not look such a distressful object as he gracefully raised his hat and bowed, a good-natured look in his dark-blue eyes and a smile on his full lips. Her eyes followed the well-built figure of the young fellow as he retreated, her lips still parted in a half smile. As Lackland turned down a side street he looked back. She did not change her position, nor move when he again raised his hat.

The next morning, after his late breakfast, Lackland lit a cigar and strolled through the public gardens. As he neared the sea he saw a graceful figure in front of him; petite, but with a light elastic carriage, and a manner of holding the head which recalled the maiden of the gardenia. He quickened his steps till he overtook her. It was she.

"Good morning," he said blithely. "You see I have your flower still." He indicated a slightly drooping gardenia which adorned his button-hole.

"Your flower," she said at once, without any sign of surprise. "I threw it away."

"So you did," he replied. "But it is withered. I should like a fresh one. Throw one of those away. Won't you?"

She glanced down, with great demureness, at a bunch of them tucked in the bosom of her gown. Her small daintiness was well set off by the simple white muslin dress. Lackland thought she looked as fragrant and as cool as one of her gardenias. She raised her head and, with her narrowed eyes, glanced at him nonchalantly.

"I want them all. You can get plenty of them. I threw that one at your hat. I didn't know what was under it," she explained with great dignity.

"Well, my hat is just the same target with me under it that it would be with anything else. And I should like one of those you have got. Throw one away," he pleaded.

"Oh, no! I want them all." The smile of quiet mischievousness played on her lips again.

He could not induce her to give the flower to him. But with some tact he managed to prolong the conversation, and discovered in the course of their talk that she sometimes walked on the sea-front after tea.

That evening was a warm one, and Lackland met the little muslin-gowned damsel serenely taking the soft air on the parade as if in pursuance of this occasional habit. After this they chanced to meet frequently, and it got to be a very natural thing for them to walk together. The dainty prettiness of the girl, her demure piquancy, the perfect confidence in herself, joined to a child-like naiveté, aroused his easy-going interest. He loved to cross swords with Carmelita.

They got to be quite good friends in those soft spring days beneath the pure azure of the sky. There was never any boldness in her assurance, and a touch of subtle dignity which often flavoured her sprightliness was never without its charm to Lackland.

It chanced that one evening, full of the chastened tenderness of a spring day waning into dusk, they had paused near the cathedral steps on their return from a stroll through the market-place. He took her hand on some playful pretext, and held it in his own bronzed palm. Carmelita allowed it to rest there for a moment, gently, and then withdrew it. But not before a very stiff old lady, who was bowled swiftly by in an open carriage, had taken in the picture.

Two days later Mrs. Lackland declared that if she stayed any longer in Nice she could only hope to have her ashes reach England; and that as she did not certainly incline to an ante-mortem cremation, they would go to Paris, and sail a little earlier than they had planned for America. The old lady watched her son sharply over her fan as he assented, non-committally, to the proposition.

This was a month since the day when he had fled to sanctuary in a certain portico, and had been pelted with the gardenia.

That evening he again walked with Carmelita by the sea. He proposed after a time that they should sit down. The dusk was stealing over the water and down upon the trees along the roads. The waves broke on the beach below them, with an indolent splash.

"Carmelita," he said, slowly, and placing his hand upon her waist, "I am glad you threw that gardenia at me."

She made some faint movement of protest as his fingers clasped her waist, but suffered it. At his remark she retorted, with a contented smile: "I threw it at your hat. I didn't know who was there." There was a world of girlish coquetry in her bright eyes as they rested on him.

"We have had such pleasant times that we might not have had but for that flower. I shall remember them when I go away. Shall you think of me when I am gone, Carmelita?"

The girl raised herself and slowly pushed away his arm.

"Are you going away?" she asked, with a subtle change in her manner.

"Why, of course. It is not everyone who can live in this delighful country always, as you do," he replied in his comfortable tones.

"When are you going?"

"Saturday."

"How long have you known this?"

"Since this morning," There was a slight pause. He met the look from beneath her arched eyebrows negatively.

"Do you want to go?" The question was almost imperious, and the girl covered him with her bright eyes, round enough now.

"Well, I don't know that I want to, but I don't object. I knew it would have to be pretty soon. It is my mother's move. She says it is so hot here."

The girl turned her face sharply away and fixed her gaze on the sea. The soft wind blew the hair about her smooth forehead and stirred it gently on her slender neck.

"Aren't you sorry I am going away, Carmelita?" he said cajolingly, as he would to a child.

"Are you sorry to go?" She turned her head and arched her eyebrows as she looked at him.

"Why, yes," he replied slowly. "I like being here well enough; I like any place where I can sun myself."

She turned towards the sea again for a moment, as if measuring the force of a rival. For a few moments she seemed lost in deep reverie. Then she got to her feet. "I want to go home," she said. "I would rather go alone. Good-bye."

"It isn't a real good-bye, you know," said Lackland, more briskly. "I am going to Monte Carlo to-morrow, but shall come back on Friday. I shall see you again then, Carmelita. Won't I?"

"Good-bye," she repeated, and left him standing, with a touch of melancholy on him that he had not bargained for. She had looked so slight, so childlike, sitting there, with the sea air lightly moving her hair. He watched the little white figure disappear in the shadows. He pulled himself together and walked off musingly. She was such a child. Half his amusement in her was seeing her grow.

When he came back on Friday, Mrs. Lackland had more than he expected for him to do, and was fretful with her health and touchily exacting in her demands. The time came to go, and he had not been able to see Carmelita as he had promised.

"I can write to her and tell her," he thought, and shrugged his shoulders.

It was eight years before Lackland was in Nice again. He had passed two years in England with his mother and he did not write to Carmelita all that time. He did not know what to say, and he hated writing letters. It had been diverting to have the little girl to talk with and to study the light emotions and thoughts that swayed her. The dark eyes, the small white teeth and play of the lips had coloured her conversation. But he couldn't imagine how or what she would write. Probably her letters would be childlike; possibly, dull.

Sometimes when he recalled the firm little figure sitting by the sea, and the wind so lightly stirring the dark hair, in what had really been their parting interview, he wondered what impression that month of spring had made upon Carmelita. He had never known quite how she took things, and the unexpected sentiments she sometimes expressed had been part of her charm for him. He had always thought that it was a very pleasant springtime. He had thought of it several times, generally with a half-smile on his lips.

Nice was unchanged in all that time, and one day as he was passing through St. George Street, he stopped and looked up at the flowers, which still fell rankly over the ledge of the portico.

"Eight years ago," he mused as he leaned for a moment against the slender pillar, as if he could conjure back the rest of the scene, and a slender hand would throw a gardenia at him again. But, no! the house seemed very quiet, and he saw no young slim figure looking down.

He sighed impatiently. He must ask someone about Carmelita Godardo. She must have grown out of her slim girlishness. Perhaps she was living in one of these little houses, a demure young matron, with a young Carmelita who called her "mother." Yes, he must inquire about her.

He turned on his heel, with another sigh, half-weary, and strolled listlessly up the street. As he walked on he saw a line of children trooping along towards him, in pairs. He drew to the side to let them pass. Then he saw a slender figure in black, with linen bands about her face, at the end of the procession, shepherding it. As the nun passed, with downcast eyes, he saw the clear, olive tint, and the quiet, sweet expression of her face.

How little she was changed, and yet, how much! This was a woman with a soul, and Carmelita was a child, an artless girl, and he had not thought of her soul. He gave another quick sigh as he reflected on how he had lived those eight years. How swiftly he had ruled them off, and what had he achieved!

The next day he called at the convent. He would like to see her, to hear her voice again, with the soft sweet accent. The sister-porter took his message and name. After some moment's withdrawal she returned, and said that Sister Philomena would rather he would see the Superior, as her duties kept her engaged.

When Lackland turned to go out of the hard, oppressive bareness of the convent parlour he felt older than he was. There was a touch of loneliness on him, as if he had parted with some portion of his being to which he had not before adverted. He lounged down to the promenade, his hands in his pockets, straining his coat tightly about him. A small yacht lay a few hundred yards out in the motionless sea. At a sign of his hand a small boat put off with a thin weather-beaten man in the stern. He looked up at Lackland as he got in, who nodded without speaking.

"Well, she's ready," said the man, "and I think you'll find her a handy little craft. Only she ain't got no name. What do you intend to call her? I'll paint that on her and she's done, and you can take her out whenever you like."

Lackland raised his head and looked out at sea a moment. Then he said slowly: "Sister Philomena." That night the name in slim black letters was drying on the stern of the little yacht as she tossed lightly on the water, as pure and white as a gardenia.

For a week Lackland almost lived upon the sea. He would take the Sister Philomena out beyond all sight of land, and then cruise about according to the wind. This tired young man loved the sea with an endurance of affection greater than aught else could command him.

Then he received a note from the Bishop on the subject of his boat's name: "I am sure that when I tell you that giving the name of one of the good nuns at the Convent to your pleasure-boat is creating talk among people, and that Catholics feel somewhat indignant at it as a sort of scandal; while the Sister Philomena herself would deprecate such a use of the name by which she has consecrated herself to God, you will feel it right to find some other name that will not be open to such objections."

A day or two after this the Sister Philomena disappeared on the horizon and never touched shore again.

What that month had been to Carmelita Godardo neither he nor others ever knew.

WE landed at a picturesque little spot up the Thames well above Windsor, just as the sun went down, and rigged up our tent for the night. After supper we lay on our backs round the fire, for the nights were chilly, and smoked. Neither Fred Palmer nor I did much anecdoting, but we made an excellent audience to Arnold Vokes, and he, much travelled man that he was, had a fresh yarn ready whenever we were in a mood for listening. This night he was in particularly good form, and crossing his legs, with his head propped up on the cushioned stern seat of the Water-Witch which we had brought ashore, he began, just as if he were reading the words on the star-studded heavens :—

"The eight o'clock train on the Duluth, South Shore, and Atlantic Railway takes you away from the beautiful town of Marquette on Lake Superior, climbs slowly up to the iron hills, passes through Negaunee, Ishpeming, Michigamme, rival cities of the 'Northern Peninsular,' and, bowling along at twenty miles an hour, brings you at noon to Sidnaw, whence a short branch line extends to Ontonagon; and if you have to change carriages, may Providence help you in your sorry plight, for you must wait four hours in a dreary place.

"The main feature of Sidnaw is silence—the awful silence of the great surrounding forest; but it is broken at intervals by a dog fight or an explosion of invectives from the saloon district, where red-shirted, slouch-hatted woodsmen from the lumber camps play cards, just visible within the darkened doorways.

"I had changed carriages at Sidnaw once, and I was on my way thither again, depressed and low-spirited at the prospect before me, when, all suddenly, I was invited to attend a wedding while I waited, and once more the world looked rosy. The bride-elect occupied the seat behind me in the car. I had not noticed her particularly until she bent forward, and, touching me on the arm, asked if I could inform her at what time our train was due in Sidnaw.

"Then I turned, and beheld a lady of some forty summers, wearing a flowery gown of white and green, with black gloves, and having beside her one of those big black travelling bags that circulate so freely in the West.

"The ready politeness with which I answered her question encouraged her to ask more, and eventually I found it necessary to sit sideways that I might more conveniently keep up my end of the conversation, which shifted from one topic to another with wonderful rapidity, and finally merged into a romance of which she was the heroine, and to the completion of which I was cordially asked to lend my presence.

"'It's eighteen years,' she said, 'since this Mr. Prince left Kaukauny and came up here into the lumber camps. Him and me was young folks then, and kep' company together a spell; but when he asked me to marry him, I said "No; I wouldn't marry nobody." Then he went away, and I never heard of him till three years ago he wrote, and said somebody'd told him I was single, and he was waitin' for me. Wouldn't never marry any other woman, he said, nohow, and he hoped I'd take him into consideration again.

"'That letter made me feel kind o' queer—to think he'd been so faithful all these years. I never believed he set so much store by me as all that. I had a good mind to write him a favourable letter right then and there; but when it came to the point, I couldn't make up my mind to do it, so I just wrote him I wanted a year more to think about it.

"'Well, I never heard a word from him no more than if he was dead till the year was up; and then he wrote again, and said he was still waitin'.

"'I put him off till Christmas, then till spring—and so it's been a-goin' up to two weeks ago, when it come over me all at once that I wasn't treatin' the man right. He'd been dreadful long-sufferin' and patient, and deserved his reward, and I set down and wrote him I'd have him.

"'He wanted to come down to Kaukauny after me, but I wouldn't have it. I told him to save his money, and I'd come up. So we fixed it that way, and to-day the weddin' comes off, and I want you to be there. Mr. Prince's got a minister from Ontonagon, and he's invited a few of his friends to witness the ceremony, and I guess it'll be a pleasant, sociable little gatherin'. Anyhow, it'll be better than waitin' for the train with nothing to do.'

"I agreed with the lady, and eagerly accepted her invitation. I had a curiosity to behold this faithful old lover who had waited eighteen years—waited with infinite patience until the girl he loved had lost all of the attractions of youth.

"Of the half-dozen passengers in the carriage we were the only persons to alight when the train reached Sidnaw. I helped my companion with her big valise, and she, carrying a large strawboard box and a parcel tied in a newspaper, followed me.

"Two or three woodsmen, standing about the station, gazed idly at us as we stood, undetermined which way to go. And one lean, sandy-whiskered man, who had been sitting on the platform at the further end, jabbing his knife into the boards, slowly rose and advanced. She was eyeing him.

"'Is this Miss Birtchet?' he asked, with a sheepish smile.

"'That's my name,' she answered—'Artemisia Birtchet; and I must say, Abe Prince, that you seem dreadful glad to see me.'

"He held out his hand; but she couldn't take it on account of the parcels, and he scratched his head with it.

"'This ain't Wednesday,' he suggested, after an interval of thought.

"'I know it ain't,' she answered; 'and it ain't Tuesday or Monday; but it's Thursday, August 13th, and I was to come on the 13th, if I remember rightly, and I think I do.'

"He shifted his gaze to me, and he looked at her again.

"'By gosh!' he said, in a hollow voice, 'I've lost my reckonin', somehow; I thought the 13th was a Wednesday, and I had that minister here yesterday.'

"'Well, where is he now?' asked Miss Birtchet quickly.

"'He went back. I kinder thought you might have changed your mind again, and——' he struck himself on the leg. 'I don't see how in thunder I got off on that date. Are you sure you ain't made no mistake, Artemisia?'

"'I'm sure I have made a mistake,' answered Miss Birtchet, with withering sarcasm. 'I've made the mistake of comin' 'way up here in the woods to marry a pesky fool; but, thank my stars, I ain't done it. If you'll be so kind and obligin' as to hold that bag a minit longer,' she continued, turning to me, 'I'll just step in here and buy a ticket for Kaukauny.'

The down train was approaching, and when Miss Birtchet appeared with her ticket I followed her into the carriage.

"'Aren't you a little hasty?' I asked.

"'Little nothin'!' she snapped; and I saw that it would be of no use to argue with her. I left the valise and bade her good-bye.

"When the train was gone I went over to the hotel to get my dinner. Mr. Prince was sitting on the verandah, with his legs crossed. His aspect was grave.

"'That was rather a bad mistake of yours,' I ventured to remark.

"'It's just as well,' he answered. 'I knew 'twas just as well the minit I set eyes on her.'"

SPECIAL NOTICE TO THE READERS OF "Short Stories."

COMMENCING with the next Issue, the size and shape of PEARSON'S LIBRARY will undergo considerable alterations, which will undoubtedly have the effect of further popularising this charming series of novel.

On all hands PEARSON'S LIBRARY is so well spoken of that further expense is being incurred in order to carry out fresh improvements, which will considerably enhance the value of the Series in the eyes of the Reader.

Though the size of the page will be somewhat reduced, in order to make the Volume of a more handy shape, this will be more than compensated for by an increase in the number of pages.

Each Volume will in future consist of 256 Pages, instead of 120 or so as heretofore.

The special object of this change is to give Readers better Novels, at the same time enabling them to carry a volume of the LIBRARY with more convenience to themselves, and less chance of injury to the binding or cover of the book. PEARSON'S LIBRARY in its new form will be found a most handy size, and specially suited for railway journeys and whiling away odd moments of leisure.

The First Novel of the New Series is entitled "IN THE SPRINGTIME OF LOVE," by Miss IZA DUFFUS HARDY, and will be fully Illustrated by Miss FLORENCE WHITE.

ON BOARD THE BIG SHIP.

NOT long ago I was a passenger on the fastest steamship in the world. I wanted to see the engines while in motion. The matter was easily arranged. There they were, two great and splendid pieces of machinery of 15,000 horse power each, working away as smoothly as patent lever watches, and shoving the great ship through heavy seas at twenty-two miles an hour.

Well now, all the organs in your body are parts of an engine—the stomach, the liver, the heart, the lungs, and so forth. When they are in perfect order you hardly know they are there. Yet the work they do is something prodigious. And from the minute you are born to the minute you die they never wholly stop. When any one of them gets out of order it must be repaired as it runs, or not at all. And it is at such times that you realise their presence.

For example, why should Mrs. Annie Elliott say, "My food turned heavy as lead"? Nature doesn't intend that one's victuals should ever feel like that after he has swallowed them. Yet they often do, and everybody knows more or less about it from personal experience. Once I saw in a grist mill a hopper half full of wheat that was decaying and sprouting. The matter? Why the mill was in a law suit, or the owner was, anyway, and the stones hadn't turned for months.

Now the human stomach—but hold on. Let's have our story rightly put together; the facts first, the comment afterwards.

"Up to two years ago," says Mrs. Elliott, "I was always strong and healthy. In the autumn of 1892, however, I began to feel heavy, tired, and weakly. I had somehow lost my natural ambition and energy. My appetite fell away; I had no desire or relish for my meals, and there was a sour, disagreeable taste in my mouth.

"After eating I had great weight, and a sense of fulness at the chest and around the waist; and, however light the meal, all my food turned heavy as lead. In spite of the most scrupulous care as to diet I continued to suffer in this manner; and as time passed I became very weak and nervous. I consulted doctors from time to time, who gave me medicines, but I obtained no real benefit from anything I took.

"Now better and again worse, yet never well, I continued until January of this year (1894), when I was persuaded by my brother to try a medicine which he said had done so much for him. I allude to Mother Seigel's Syrup. I had, before this, been advised by many friends to try this famous preparation, but declined because I had no faith in advertised medicines.

"Nevertheless, I procured a bottle at Mr. Sloan's, the chemist, Bentinck Crescent, Elswick Road, and when I had taken it for ten days I felt much relieved. My appetite improved, and food no longer distressed me. By further use of the Syrup I soon regained my original health. Whenever I feel any symptoms of my old ailment I fly to Mother Seigel's Syrup, and it never fails to relieve me at once. You have my permission to make any use you wish of this statement. (Signed) Annie Elliott, 125, Hartington Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, October 17th, 1894."

Now, take notice. The human body is a complicated machine for the digestion of food; that is all it does. At the head of the process is the stomach, the living bag into which your food drops as you swallow it. Its difficult work makes it liable to disease—indigestion and dyspepsia; and from this disease arise a whole catalogue of minor disorders, with grim death showing his face at the end of the list. Whatsoever cures indigestion and dyspepsia cures its consequences; and there are thousands of good people in England who affirm that Mother Seigel's Syrup does it.

What is the value of a medicine like that? Why it is worth exactly what life and health are worth.

Marvellous Increase in Circulation ! !

SHORT STORIES.

A 20pp. 4to. Weekly Magazine.

It is now little over twelve months since this magazine came into the hands of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. It has during that period more than DOUBLED ITS CIRCULATION. This has been caused chiefly by the vast improvement in its literary standard, and the increased facilities for publication. Further efforts in this direction are being made, and a consequent further advance in circulation is confidently anticipated. A new story entitled "The Tenth of June," from the powerful pen of Mr. John K. Leys, has just commenced. This story will be illustrated by Mr. Raymond Potter, whose contributions will consist of a number of large sketches each week. No advance in the rates for advertisements has been made, nor is any contemplated until the circulation has reached

100,000 COPIES WEEKLY.

The scale is 10s. per inch, or £10 per page; and, as the advertisements are limited to four pages, the most effective publicity is ensured.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 332.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 11, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A Remarkable Episode

WHY shouldn't I look back on that night long ago? There are some bits of memory that gladden the waste of years; one can't help dreaming of them now and then in a foolish, haphazard sort of way. No matter what that night led to (for it was then we met her), I cannot hold it accountable for evil, it was just a compound of delights, forming one delicious whole.

We were young then, and I think I can say without egotism that both of us had excellent dispositions—frank, ardent, devoted.

That row on the river by moonlight, and the dance afterwards! There was a waltz of Strauss so divinely rendered that the memory of it electrifies the subtle machinery of these legs that now, alas! dance no more. I whistle it bar for bar; I shut my eyes, and hold again in a light embrace my fair young sylph in blue. Her golden hair escapes from its silken mesh, floats down upon her white shoulders, her little ungloved, gem-covered hands softly rest in mine, and round and round we whirl to the measure of that waltz.

Ah, me! The adolescence of passion for poor Phil began also upon that night, and it is with that we have to do. I saw him, dimly of course, and with that reflected light that glances from one's own happiness sometimes to that of another near and dear to him—I saw him walking through the corridors, lingering in some alcove, or appearing and disappearing through the arches of the masonry upon the balcony, always with the one Juno-like figure, tall and pliant, yet free, rich, mature.

Even with the fascination of whatever fair one shared the moment with me, I could not help noticing the seductive beauty of Phil's partner, and acknowledged to myself she surpassed any of the beauties there.

Not like my fragile blossom, the nymph in blue, or the pale, delicate, lily-like creature in white that seemed my second fancy, these were in the first bloom of youth, and naturally lacked many of the charms that would come to them after a succession of seasons in society.

The graceful ease of her manner, the wonderful skill in imparting this ease to those brought in to the magnetism of her presence, indicated that the lady who hung upon Phil's arm, and whom he introduced to me as Miss Diana Davenport, was an acknowledged queen in society.

It was plain to be seen that Phil was completely subjugated, enthralled. There was a subdued rapture in his voice, a latent passion in his eye, an abstracted tenderness in his manner, that told me at once it was a serious case with Phil.

Thus began this important era in the life of my friend, and before a fortnight it had reached a grand climacterie, a state of subdued frenzy, which rendered everything subservient to it.

He walked with her, rode with her; the pleasant and capacious house owned by her widowed mother in the suburbs became haunted by his presence. Hosts of people went there and enjoyed the genial hospitality graciously dispensed, but it began to be acknowledged that Phil was the favourite visitor. It was noticeable that Miss Davenport took the trouble to invent excuses to enjoy Phil's society and that was a rare, in fact, an unknown thing in the catholic proclivities of the heiress.

Phil began to wear that toned down, domestic mien that augured ill for our bachelor aspirations. He cut off the ends of his moustache, and religiously shaved himself every day, while his toilet occupied twice as long. He took an interest in investments, and watched the market as behoved a family man.

Smoking one night in my room, with my feet raised to a comfortable altitude on the window-sill, pondering upon many things, and last of how I should look as best man at Phil's wedding, I was suddenly startled by the entrance of Phil himself.

He burst into the room, flung his hat in one corner, his cane in another, and sinking into a chair, covered his face with his hands and gave vent to a groan of half-suppressed agony.

"Why, Phil," I said, hastening over to him, "are you hurt? Has any accident occurred?"

I looked at him from head to foot, half expecting to see the blood flow from a recent wound.

"There are no limbs broken, Hal," he said looking up with a face so distorted and pale I scarcely knew it for his own:

Miss Diana Davenport.

To enjoy Phil's society.

"only the heart. Hal, I have got my death blow. Diana belongs to another!"

"Married!" I gasped.

"Just the same. She's been engaged to a colonel in the army for two years. They are to be married this autumn."

"Why, what a monstrous——" But Phil put his hand on my arm.

"Don't, Hal," he said, pleadingly. "I can't bear it; besides I think she scarcely knew the danger we were in till it was too late. I believe she loves me, Hal, as I love her; as I shall always love her to the last moment of my life. It is more than I can bear, old fellow."

"Can nothing be done?" I asked.

"Nothing," he answered, with an accent of despair. "Only let us get away from here as soon as possible; let us hasten our old plans for travel. I beg of you, Hal, put as many miles between me and her as you can."

A fortnight afterwards we were upon the ocean. I had, after all, reached my old desire to be out of sight and sensation of land, and watch with Phil the sun rising upon a boundless, trackless waste of water. But half the delight of it was gone. I was defrauded of the symmetry and fulness of a communion with Phil because of his imbecile idolatry for a woman I could not admire.

I could have forgiven a chit of a girl, like my nymph in blue or the little lily in white; I might have reconciled myself to the thought that it was a mistake of impulse and feeling; but I could not be brought to believe that a beautiful veteran, with campaigns of stratagems and spoils for her experience, could be unconsciously guilty of murdering the heart and soul of a being so devoted to her.

I accused her in my heart as a cold-blooded, detestable coquette, who revelled in this prey as a gourmand delights in his pâté de foie gras, unmindful of the agony of which it is composed.

We went direct with a party of hunters and explorers to the heart of Africa; but, lost amidst this wilderness of nature, forcing our way step by step through dense forests of underwood, camping upon verdant prairies, or galloping over the desert, with its burned-brown grass and desolate monotony, ever and always there rested upon Phil's brow the melancholy mien of one absorbed by a bitter memory.

One night we sat outside the tents, Phil and I, and smoked long and contemplatively. It was oppressively hot, and, as the hours wore away, the southern constellations came on in such force that the vast extent of country was illumined as far as the horizon, and Phil, picking up an old newspaper dropped by one of our companions, declared he could read it word for word.

He held it to his eyes for a moment, then dropped it, and started to his feet, looking about him as if bewildered.

"What is it, Phil?" I cried.

He sank back upon the smooth bit of alkali that served him for a seat, picked up the newspaper again and read, in a trembling voice, that Colonel John Talbot had been killed in the hunting field by a fall from his horse.

"That's rather unlucky for Talbot," I remarked; "but I can't really see how it affects us."

"Colonel Talbot," repeated Phil in an impressive whisper, "is the man whom Diana was engaged to."

"A widow," I murmured.

Phil looked at the date of the newspaper and found it had been printed only a fortnight after we left England.

He dashed his hand to his forehead; a malediction escaped his lips.

"I might, after all, have been best man," I remarked.

Nothing now would do but to take up the thread of life for Phil where it was so rudely snapped asunder.

"All these months of travel, Hal," he said, with the peculiar selfishness of a lover, "have been merely existence for me, not life. Let me go back, my friend, to the air that is shared by Diana."

This was all very well, and would have been extremely apposite had we been upon any common or even distinguished line of travel. We might have put ourselves upon the lady's trail in the twinkling of an eye, taken a night train, embarked in a steamer, or even joined a caravan upon the desert. But our companions had not started with any such clog as an unsatisfied passion.

To go to them and relate this pathetic story of Phil's, and the vivid importance it was to him to breathe another air, would only be to subject ourselves to ridicule and defeat. They would shrug their shoulders with disdain, and stolidly refuse to understand; perhaps they would tell us that, in the following week, there would be a hunt for hippopotami from eight to ten feet long, and that, although there were plenty of fish in the sea and lovely women at home, all ready for the snare of the fowler, pachyderms of this description were wary in the extreme, and desperate when brought to bay; therefore the hunt and subsequent capture held the peculiar and irresistible charms of danger and rarity.

Phil was obliged to submit to destiny. Life was dearer to him than it had been of late, and he was not prepared to strike off into the wilderness alone. I noticed he was, for the first time, prudent in the hunt on the following day, and that he began to make a virtue of patience. For my part I was sorry for Phil, but, nevertheless, the pachyderms had a wonderful fascination about them.

After the pachyderms came lions, which were not quite so interesting, for various reasons. In the first place I had seen so many lions in menageries and shows of all kinds, and a lion isn't half so nice in some positions as in a cage.

Smoking one night in my room.

For instance, suppose you are idiot enough to join a party of madmen who track these animals to a defile in the mountains, and attack them, as you might say, with their foot upon their native heath, and get just a little simple tap with one of their claws that breaks your collar-bone, lays open your cheek, pulls down the skin of your forehead over your eyes, and smashes your right arm in two places. It seems to me natural to prefer looking at them from behind a good stout railing, with the demoralisation of captivity on their side.

At all events, poor Phil had to nurse me for many a long month after that lion hunt, and it was well into the following year when we at last found ourselves on a P. and O. steamer, bound for home.

Phil and I were old travellers by this time, and the wild freshness of enthusiasm that seized upon some of our fellow-voyagers as they neared their native shore was with us toned down to a calm but profound conviction that England was the only country in the world worth the rational affection of an experienced and cultivated mind.

I had been looking through the glass for some time and was just handing it over to a fellow passenger, who had eyed me with devouring envy the while, when a big steamer, outward bound, glided close by our side, and I could see the faces of the party nearest me.

One fleeting glance of mine contained a revelation. I glued my eyes to the glass again. Exactly opposite me there shone two glowing orbs wonderfully familiar. The face was one not easily forgotten, the form full, shapely, with a peculiar serpentine grace about it.

"Phil," I said, putting the glass into his hand, "look over there at that group of ladies."

He took it languidly, but, having looked, a quick, eager gasp escaped him; he dropped the glass into the hands of our envious fellow passenger, and seized my arm with a sudden frenzy.

"She is going out," he said.

"While we, alas! are going in," I added.

"But this is monstrous," he added in dismay. "We can't go in, we must follow her."

Here again was the absurdity of a foolish passion. It would have been useless to relate to the captain that my friend, seeing a person he was interested in on the passing steamer, would like to join her. It was impossible to throw a plank across the ocean; besides, she was already vanishing out of sight, and Phil rushed below like a madman. All we could do was to enquire her destination from the Company's offices, take an outbound passage once again, and sail as soon as possible.

I confess it began to wear the aspect of a chase to me, and appealed to my taste for hunting. Then, I suppose, beauty such as hers, seen through a strong glass, had an effect of nearness upon me. At all events I began to take a keen interest in the passion of my friend. When we reached Cairo, however, we learned she had gone back to Europe via Brindisi.

All we could do was to travel about the Continent in the hope of encountering her or hearing about her party.

One fine autumn morning we lingered on the heights of a mountain resort in Saxony. We leaned over the railing that incloses the plateau on the top of the mountain, and looked admiringly down upon the stretch of country beneath. Upon the river Elbe, that looked to our eyes like a trout stream, we saw one of those little Dutch steamers that continually paddle up and down, and suddenly the view became intensely interesting. I looked through the glass again; yes, there she was, without doubt more graceful and enchanting than ever, upon the deck of that lumbering little tug, fathoms below us. I called to Phil. He bent, he looked, and stretching over with a yearning, unsteady movement, he lost his balance and fell.

Fell down the sheer edge of the rock, grasping as he went at every tuft of lichen and grass, at every shrub that rapidly shot out of his reach. I watched him with agonised suspense, when suddenly his coat caught upon the jagged wall of the precipice, and held him suspended over the chasm beneath.

"She is going out," he said.

He was partly supported by a frail ledge beneath him, and to this bit of rock I was determined to descend if in the endeavour I lost my life. There was no other way of saving Phil—none whatever; it must be done immediately, and he who has risked his life in mad encounters with savage beasts can surely afford to do so in behalf of the friend of his soul.

Round me flocked a crowd of sturdy Germans anxious to help me in every possible way. A stout rope was brought, fastened firmly about my waist; and I was lowered, a hand-breadth at a time, by my honest friends above. At last my foot trembled upon the thin piece of slate upon which Phil rested.

Grasping the rope with one hand, I disengaged his unconscious form from its perilous resting place, slipped slowly into the position he had taken, and binding the rope about my poor Phil, I had the joy to see him finally lifted into the arms of my comrades above.

Loud shouts arose from the plateau, and were echoed from the little steamer below, from the deck of which my perilous undertaking had been watched with intense interest. With difficulty I succeeded in keeping my hold upon this ledge of the precipice until the rope came back for me, and when I bound it about my waist I had already experienced that fatal giddiness that precedes unconsciousness.

Reaching the top, I escaped from the embrace of my Teutonic friends, and made my way to the chamber in the hostelry where they had taken Phil. A doctor was already with him, and declared that, although there were no bones broken, his system had received a nervous shock, and that he would need careful nursing.

So I took my place by the side of Phil, and nursed him in Germany as he had ministered to me in Africa. He got well sooner than I did, but modesty compels me to say it was not because of better nursing. His collar-bone and right arm were not smashed, neither had he the skin torn direct from the scalp over his eyes—which leads me to the opinion that a collision with a rock is less formidable than one with a lion.

Then there were better facilities for nursing in the pretty Saxony town than in the heart of Africa, and besides, I wasn't the only nurse he had; a lady travelling in the vicinity kindly aided me. She was not altogether a stranger to Phil—nor to me, for that matter.

She was very gentle and beautiful, with that winning way about her that reaches the heart, magnetises it, enthralls it, without the exact knowlege of that organ.

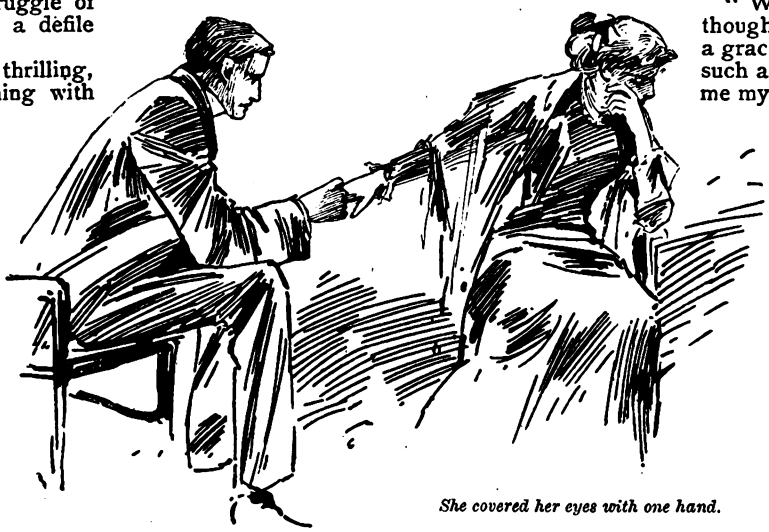
There was something in the slight pressure of her hand upon Phil's forehead, the floating of her diaphanous drapery about his bedside, the melody of her voice, the soft gleaming of her luminous eyes through the dimmed light of the sick room, that made her presence consoling, healing, divine.

Then when Phil had fallen into a slumber she came to me, her fellow-watcher, and ministered to my comfort through the dark watches of the night. She listened with tender interest to my relation of our adventures in Africa, and was especially never tired of a terrible struggle of mine with a male lion in a defile of the mountains.

She declared that it was thrilling, grand, heroic, and, touching with her slender fingers the scars upon my face, pronounced them beautiful; while I, alas! caught and kissed those gentle fingers and wished that Phil's convalescence were not so rapid, and that we might for ever—we three—rest together upon the verdure-crowned heights, "like gods together, heedless of mankind."

On one of those occasions I was relating to her a desperate encounter of ours in the jungle with a panther, and had reached the most thrilling part of it; she covered her eyes with one hand, as if to shut out the terrible scene, and the other she stretched in sympathy with my relation to the combat.



She covered her eyes with one hand.

Absorbed with my story, I just touched the white finger to my lips with a caressing movement, when suddenly Phil stood before us. He was pale to ghastliness, and my heart smote me, for I saw in his face a bitter hatred and reproach. He glared at me with hollow, burning eyes. But Diana rose to her feet. Taking the light shawl from her shoulders, she threw it about the shivering form of Phil, and gently forced him to the seat beside her.

"You wicked boy!" she said, looking upon him in tender reproach, "how can you be so imprudent? We want no relapses, you know, for I must leave you to-morrow. The Colonel will be here."

"The Colonel!" stammered Phil. "What colonel?"

"Why, my colonel," said Diana, "Colonel John Talbot, my husband!"

Phil seemed to have lost all power of articulation, and my own voice sounded strange and hollow, as I remarked that we were under the impression Colonel John Talbot had been killed years ago in the hunting field.

"Why, what a horrible thought!" said Mrs. Talbot, with a graceful shudder. "There was such a report, and it nearly cost me my life, but happily it was an exaggeration. He was badly bruised and carried home for dead. But you know," she added, turning to me, "how much a manly, athletic physique can stand."

"Yes, yes," I murmured, and as she bade us good-night and glided away, Phil and I looked at each other with an emotion that was impossible just then to analyse.

We remained in sombre silence, watching the jagged snow-covered peaks of the distant hills. At last our hands sought each other, a shiver of recollection passed over the weak form of Phil, his head sank upon my shoulder.

"Let's go home, Hal," he whispered. "Let's get back to England."

We left Saxony the next day, travelling by easy stages to the coast. And it is somewhat remarkable that, although both Phil's and my experience with women was limited and unsatisfactory, we never sought to extend our knowledge or ameliorate the paucity of it.

We never married, nor saw Diana from that day to this.

THE CABMAN'S STORY.

—o—

IT was a fearful night!

All the evening the rain had been coming down in torrents—at times whirled by the wind into perfect sheets of water—forming big puddle lakes in the road, and miniature rivers in the gutters.

The two miserable cab horses on the rank looked soaked through—the steam rising from their reeking sides—as they stood nodding in the downpour, the harness shining from excess of moisture. In the corner public-house the two drivers were seated at a small table—smoking, drinking, and chatting with a few of the "regulars" who had defied the elements, rather than go without their usual nightly jorum.

Rum hot was the "complaint" of the cabbies, and the soothing liquor had opened their hearts and set their tongues wagging.

"Dooky Jim," the acknowledged "smart-un" of the rank, was in good form, and rattled off anecdote after anecdote to the pleasure and careful listening of the select few.

The rain still continued to pour down, and, unmindful of the poor beasts out in the wet, the glasses were replenished and Jim started on one of his long yarns.

"I'll tell you a story," he commenced, "of what happened to me when I first started on the road. I was a young chap then, but I drove my own lot, and a good show it was. I remember it was in the afternoon of a day something like this one, raining blessed hard, and no chance of clearing up, and, what was worse, I hadn't earned a bob all the time.

"I was getting pretty sick of it, and had just made up my mind to take the horse home, when I saw a gent coming down the road full pelt.

"'Are you disengaged?' said he coming up to me.

"'Yes, sir!' says I.

"'Well, then, jump up, and drive sharply to Alcester Square,' and in he pops out of the rain.

"Well, I reckoned the bad weather meant a bit extra, and the fare looked one of these pasty faced swells with brass, so off I goes in good spirits.

"At the corner of Alcester Square he got out, telling me to wait, and then went into one of the big houses; and, d'ye know, I thought he had a strange look on his white dial. But I got down and waited in the rain, and after about ten minutes, out he comes again, looking whiter than ever, and stops me from mounting the box.

"'Have you change for a sovereign?' said he.

"'No, sir,' says I; but that wasn't true, chaps, for I always held a bit of ready in those days.

"'Well, do you mind getting the change for me?' said the gent—'I'll stand by the horse while you're gone.'

"Well, it seemed a funny thing to ask a cabman to do; but I went round the corner with his quid—where he couldn't see me—and counted out the silver in my pocket.

"I knew I mustn't go back too quickly or it would give me away—so, after a bit, I just popped my head round the corner to see how my nag was going on.

"Well, what I saw gave me a bit of a turn!——

"Two men were carrying somebody in their arms down to my cab, the gent holding the door open.

"I waited until they had got the person in and shut the door, and then, seeing my fare lay hold of the reins, I guessed he meant going off without me, so round I came like lightning and stood at my horse's head.

"'Ah! there you are, cabby,' said Mr. White-face—which was now turning red—'we are quite ready, and I want you to drive as quickly as possible to Merton Fields,' and he stood waiting for me to get up before he went inside the cab.

Here "Dooky Jim" shifted his position, recrossed his legs, and then commenced slowly filling his pipe.

"Well, chaps," he went on in jerks, "I tell you it was a funny-looking job, and I didn't much care about it, but I remembered he hadn't asked for his quid's worth of change—and I hoped he'd forgot it—and I give you my word I wasn't a-going to remind him.

"So I started off down the Alcester Road, through the rain, which was still coming down.

"Once, going across the common, I heard the sound of voices from inside, and something like a muffled scream, that gave me a bit of a start, but I thought I'd better go on and see it all out.

"After about three-quarters of an hour I arrived at the Fields, and pulled up sharp, intending to get down and ask for directions.

"But Mr. White-face was too smart for me, the window came down with a bang and out popped his head.

"'There's no need to stop, cabman,' he shouted—'drive straight over to that large house with the tall trees in front, go straight inside the gates,' and up went the window again, but not before I had time to hear a gurgling sound come from inside.

"'Well, what game's this?' thinks I; but don't you see, chaps, I had to think of the merry quid inside my pocket—and, besides, what could I have done?

"Over I went to the house with the big trees, and drove through the gates into the grounds, pulling up at the door, on which there was a big plate with the name 'Dr. Thurston.'

"I tell you the sight of that plate gave me a little relief, so I jumped down to open the cab door, but the gent was again too sharp for me, for he was outside, and holding the handle.

"'Stand at your horse's head, cabman,' he said sharply; 'and don't let it move. You understand?'

"At that moment the doctor's door opened, and out came two porters, and a woman dressed like a nurse, so off I hurried to the nag's bridle.

"But as they brought the person out of my cab I had a good look, and saw it was a pale young lady, with such a haggard face! She was a-going on and crying out loudly, 'Cabman, cabman, don't let them take me in!'

"The sight fairly upset me, but I felt the gent's eyes were on me, as the porters carried the lady into the house, he looking back as he followed with the nurse.

"I didn't quite know what to do—whether I should wait or skip it with the brass, but somehow I waited on.

"In a few minutes out came one of the porters and gave me another quid, telling me as how the gent wouldn't want me any longer.

"I suppose I must have looked a bit scared, for the man grinned at me, and whispered in my ear, 'You needn't be frightened; this is a private madhouse; but I suppose the gent didn't tell you, in case you wouldn't take the fare'; and he went in, grinning more than ever."

. . . .

The narrator made a big pause here, looked mysteriously at his interested audience, and finished up his glass, which was immediately replenished by one of the company.

"Look sharp, and get on with it, Jim," said his pal, "blow'd if it ain't like a detective story."

"Dooky Jim" cleared his throat, had a turn at the fresh liquor, and got on with it.

. . . .

"Well, chaps, I tell you straight, it didn't take me long to get away from that hole. I put the nag at it, all across that common; and how he did go, just as if he'd only just commenced the journey. He was a good-un, and no error; but there, I always reckoned I knew a bit about cattle, and you can stand on me to put you right at the game.

"Well, on the way back I kept on thinking of that poor girl, and wondering why, if she was mad, that she could know I was a cabman, for she did say right out, 'Cabman, cabman, don't let them take me in.'

"When I had come about halfway home, I felt somehow as if I must have a look inside the cab, so I pulled up in a quiet spot, and got down and opened the door.

"It seemed all right inside—and, mind you, I don't know what made me do it—but I pulled up the cushions, and there was a piece of paper slip'd down at the back On it was written, 'To the coachman.'" (Here Jim dived down into his breast-coat pocket, and brought out a big letter case, from which he extracted a dirty bit of paper, creased, and yellow with age, which he held up to the company.) "And here, chaps, is the very note to prove to you that I'm not telling lies."

He read:

"DEAR SIR,—I am writing this by my bedside, with the hope that it will be found in your conveyance, for I know they are going to take me away to-day to an asylum. They will tell you I am mad, but, for the love of Heaven, do not believe them. Listen to the prayer of a poor woman, and find out Captain Hall, telling him that I, his wife, am detained by these wretches. Go first of all to No. — Wigmore Street, but don't trust a soul—they are all in league against me. See the Captain in person, and tell him what they have done with me. And may heaven bless you for your kindness."

Here the letter was carefully refolded and placed in Jim's letter case.

"Well; this note kept me awake all that night," he continued, "but by the morning I had decided to find out Captain Hall, at any cost.

"So about 11 o'clock I started off to Wigmore Street, and knocked at the door of the house.

"A servant answered me, and finding that I wanted the Captain, asked me to walk inside and wait in the hall. Soon she came back and told me to walk upstairs, so up I went after her, stopping at a back room which she asked me to enter.

"You can guess I was a bit nervous about the job, but I was fairly flabbergasted to find, not a stranger, but the white-faced gent inside and waiting for me.

"'Well, my man,' said he, pretending not to remember me; but I knew that was a lie by the uneasy look on his face—'What can I do for you?'

"'I want to see Captain Hall, and nobody else,' said I straight out.

"'Well, I am Captain Hall,' said he, and then seeing the door was open he crossed the room and shut it, and do you know I thought I heard the rustle of a woman's dress outside, as if someone had been listening.

"Then he came back and sat down by the window, and I noticed his face was whiter than ever.

"'Now, then, what is it you want to say to me; come, speak out,' said he.

"'I tell you I don't want to see you. I want to see another Captain Hall, and if he isn't in I'll go away,' said I.

"'Not so fast, my friend,' and he got up and stood against the door. 'Now, then, tell me the meaning of your coming into my house and the business you want, or I'll send for the police and have you locked up.'

"Well, here was a pretty go! I was in a fine mess, for sure, but I didn't budge an inch, you bet. I simply told him I was quite ready to go to the station, and perhaps there they would tell me if he really was Captain Hall.

"That made him wince a bit, chaps. He stood there and gnawed his moustache with rage; then he went back to his seat, his body trembling, his face like death.

"'I recognise you now,' he said; 'you are the cabman who drove my poor sister over to Merton Fields, and you have come here to get money out of me—to blackmail me—or let everybody know that insanity is in my family, in fact to disgrace me. Well, I must buy up the secret, at any price, so let me know what you want——'

"'Your sister!' I said, and then I remembered that I might do harm by letting my tongue run, so I simply added, 'Look here, sir; I've not come for your money, and if you gents do such scurvy things, we honest working men are above it,' and then I made my way downstairs, and out of the house as fast as I could go.

"I had just turned the corner of the street when I heard somebody running after me, and a middle-aged old girl, dressed like a servant, came panting up.

"'I must have a word with you,' she gasped out. 'Come anywhere, so long as they don't see us together.'

"Well, I didn't know what to make of it, but I dropped into the first pub handy and called for some brandy for the woman, and a drop of beer for myself.

"The stuff seemed to pull her together, but I noticed she was still very excited, and crying fit to break her heart.

"She told me she had listened outside the door and heard me ask for Captain Hall, and then the white-faced gent said he was the Captain.

"'But it's a lie,' said she, 'don't believe him.'

"'You bet I'm not going to, missis,' said I, and then I thought to myself, supposing the gent had set this woman after me to pump me. So I was on my guard at once.

"'I was hoping you had news of my dear mistress, Captain Hall's wife, and I hurried after you to find out,' said she. 'They say she ran away with another man, but I know it ain't true, I know her better than that. But the Captain believes it, and is going abroad, and I feel sure that brute, Mr. Mearns, is the cause of it all. If the Captain dies, and my mistress is put out of the way, that wretch comes into all the money, because he is the only cousin. Tell me, oh, do tell me, if you know anything about my poor, young mistress!'

"Well, this sounded straight enough, but I thought I'd better hold on a bit, so I said to her:

"'Look here, what I know I'm not agoing to tell anybody, but mean well, trust me. Just you give me the Captain's address, and I'll go and see him myself.'

"'That I will, and with pleasure,' said she; 'but do please go quickly, or it will be too late. He starts to-night from Southampton to join his regiment in India; anybody on board will point him out to you; he went away last week to stay with a friend who is living at Cowes.'

"Well, I took all this down very carefully, and then said good morning to the dame and started by the first train to Southampton—landing there in the evening.

"Now, thought I, what's the best thing to do to find my man? So in I turned to a little pub to think matters over.

"As luck would have it, there I came across an old pal of mine, who had enlisted when I was a youngster.

"'The very man I want, Jack,' said I, as soon as we'd shaken hands and had a drink together. 'Can you help me to find a Captain Hall, who sails to-night for India? I've got something very important to say to him; I can't write it, I must see him.'

"'I can put you on to that gent, at once,' said he, 'he came over this afternoon from Cowes, and is up at the Hotel with some other officers.'

"Well, Jack Summers, my soldier pal, and I went down to the Hotel in quick time, and sent up word to the Captain, who was with his friends in a private room. Down came the message that the Captain could not be disturbed, and I was to tell the servant what I wanted.

"'Please tell Captain Hall I must see him for a minute before he sails'; and this time I didn't mean to be done, so I quietly followed the man up the stairs, and waited outside the room door.

"I heard my message given, and then a voice, which I immediately recognised as belonging to Mr. White-face, say, 'Tell the man to come again to-morrow morning.'

"'Don't be absurd, Lionel,' said another voice, 'you know I shan't be here then.'

"Well, I didn't wait to hear any more. I pushed open the door and went straight into the room, and shouted out 'Captain Hall!'

"'What the deuce do you mean by coming here and shouting out my name like that?' said a gentleman standing over by the fireplace.

"'Captain Hall, sir,' said I, 'I have a message for you; it won't take a minute, but it is very important, sir.'

"'Look here,' said the white-faced gent, 'we object to this intrusion, get out of it, or I'll put you out——'

"'You put me out?' I shouted, 'a scurvy thing like you!' and I pushed him bang up against the wall, and went over to the gent at the fireplace.

"'I've got a message for you, Captain Hall, from your poor wife. Let me tell it you, and then you can have me thrown out if you like.'

"No sooner had I said that than the Captain laid hold of me by my collar—his eyes glistening with excitement and his teeth set.

"'Tell me what you mean. What do you know of my wife? Come, tell me quickly, or I'll break every bone in your body!' and he shook me as he nearly screamed the words out.

"I told him all—of the carrying off of the poor girl to the mad-house; of my finding the letter in the cab, and my visit to Wigmore Street; and then I brought out the note she had written and which I showed to you chaps to-night.

"He recognised her writing at once, and then seemed to believe my story, for he sat down and cried just like a child. Well, the sight upset me and all the other gents there, and I couldn't stop a tear that trickled down my nose.

"After a while he pulled round, and then he asked me if I knew who had done this work.

"'That man there,' said I, turning round to point at the white-faced gent, but he had cleared out quietly, while I was talking to the Captain.

"Well, chaps, to cut a long story short, the Captain didn't go to India after all—I suppose officers can do as they like in the Army—but went straight up to London with me and on to Merton Fields.

"I shall never forget the sight when those two people met each other; it turned my heart over and over again.

"Of course, I wasn't forgotten, and, in fact, every Christmas I always receive a big hamper and a bit of 'oof,' with their united love."

JACK DAVIS—A BAD LOT!

A STORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

WHETHER it had been born in him or whether it was the fault of an obtuse fate they never knew; but one and all agreed that Jack Davis was "a bad lot."

Certainly his surroundings and life—in a small back street in the East End of London—did not tend to improve his civil or moral character, but he had a mother who worked hard for him and would willingly have laid down her life in his cause. Poor old soul, hers had been a life of care and trouble, with a bad husband who spent his life in low public-houses, and was never capable of a generous action till he killed himself with drink and left his widow with one less to keep.

The blood of the father seemed to flow in the veins of the son, and the grief-stricken woman saw, as years went on, the gradual development of the "virum," until one day she knew the worst—"her son was a thief," and the prison doors closed upon him.

This was the brimming of her cup of sorrow, and within a week the grave received the mortal remains of what had been "Jack's mother."

At the end of his term Davis returned to his old haunts with stolid indifference written on his features. Even the death of his mother did not seem to touch his hardened heart. But fate, now aroused to a sensibility of its obligations, cut him short in his evil career, and, directing him into the company of a recruiting sergeant, he was induced, while under the influence of drink, to accept the shilling and a soldier's uniform.

. . . . . .

Jack Davis's regiment had not been stationed in India many months before the Mutiny broke out.

This was a time when Englishmen were called upon to defend themselves against a more than ordinary foe—not men, but demons. This they did, with honour to themselves and to their country.

But the privation and misery was fearful. A terrible drought had set in, and, hemmed in on all sides, the British soldiers suffered that awful scourge—never properly realised in England—thirst.

Relief seemed to be far away, and the situation became so serious that short rations of water were allotted the men.

Still things went from bad to worse, and a guard had to be placed at the watering-places to prevent supply running out.

The consequence was hard fights—between men parched with thirst—the stronger robbing the weaker. One sultry night the surgeon-major, going through the place, found Jack Davis on duty at one of the water wells, and, recognising him as one of the "worst characters" in the regiment, took the trouble to examine the vicinity, with the result that a flask, half filled with water, was found under some rubbish.

The stealing of water was an unpardonable offence at those times, and the young soldier received full punishment for his crime before the eyes of his comrades.

But his Captain, a humane man, was ready to take over the care of the poor, suffering fellow, and visited him in the prison cell, forcing upon him the responsibility of each true soldier, and the fact that, in stealing water, he was robbing helpless women and children.

The kind way in which the words were put seemed to touch the man—unused to such treatment—and, before the officer left, Jack had promised to try and amend his ways.

Then came weeks of continuous fighting, wherein the young men showed bravery equal to that of the older soldiers.

Exposed to the heat of a tropical sun, scores dropped dead at their posts—sunstroke, the destroyer of men's reasons, dealing havoc among the ranks.

To add to the misery the water wells became exhausted, and plague set in.

One night Davis learned that his Captain was the latest victim, and lay near to death's door. The doctors were in constant attendance, but could lend no assistance—and this for want of water.

At midnight a form crept from one of the tents, looked stealthily around, and then disappeared in the darkness.

Not a soul had seen Jack Davis go.

The morning broke, and with it the light revealed the Captain on his hospital couch tossing with fever. He had laid in the sweltering heat for three long days, and the doctors knew that it was only the matter of a short period for the brave man to live.

A door was suddenly thrown open, and Private Davis appeared carrying a large can of water.

The stricken man clutched at the vessel and drank eagerly of the contents, while the medicals stood looking on with eager interest. With a sigh of relief the Captain's head slipped back on to its pillow, an inquiring and imploring look in his eye.

Jack seemed to read the look, for he dropped down on his knees and almost sobbed out—"No, no, Captain, don't think that; I did not steal it, as God is my Judge!" The words seemed to assure the officer, for a faint smile came to his lips, and then he closed his eyes and sank into sleep. The young fellow remained kneeling, his face buried in the couch—but the surgeon stepped forward, and touching him lightly on the shoulder, asked him to leave the Captain to rest.

Jack raised himself at the bidding, but suddenly seemed to swoon, falling prostrate by the bedside.

At the same time a large pool of blood stood revealed; while a dark crimson stain on his tunic showed where an Indian bullet had struck him, after he had gone through the English lines to the river for water. This, then, was the reason of his sudden disappearance from camp the night previous. With a feeling of reverence the doctors lifted the body of the young soldier on to a couch, and attempted to staunch the flow of blood.

But he was dying fast—beyond the help of earthly power.

Once he opened his eyes and gazed around him. The kneeling surgeon moistened his lips with a little water.

A look of thanks was flashed back, and then came the low words, "Don't tell—the Captain—I disobeyed—orders—I'm glad to die—for him." A pause, and then, "Mother—mother—I'm coming." The poor, tired eyes again closed, and the brave spirit winged its flight.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and a friend of Geoffrey.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Byngham—An army officer, and cousin to Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love for Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook.

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the first of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger. Sir Arthur, on learning from his lawyer that his cousin, Captain Byngham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Byngham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty. On the tenth of June Geoffrey goes to Wales, and is followed by Kuttapani, who attacks him in a lonely spot and leaves him for dead. Geoffrey, however, recovers, and tracks him to a house in Westbourne Park, named Lancaster Villa, which transpires to be the headquarters of the Hindoos.

CHAPTER XIV.

"GOOD-NIGHT—AND GOOD-BYE."

On receiving this unexpected check, Geoffrey went back to his lodgings, and sat down to reconsider his plans.

It was clearly impracticable for him to trace the Hindoos; and even had such a thing been possible, he could not see what was to be gained by it. He could do no good, he said to himself, by hanging round these men for twelve months. He thought he would find out in the first place, from the house agent, whether they had definitely given up the house. If they had not, he would be pretty sure to find them there again in the following May.

The only thing he had to see to was to make arrangements for keeping the adjoining house, Chester Villa, from falling into the hands of strangers. He must rent that house, or at least secure the refusal of it.

Then the question arose:—Should he simply return to his usual life, or should he absent himself altogether, so as still to leave the Hindoos under the impression that their attempt on his life had succeeded? There still seemed a chance that he might be able to thwart his enemies' designs on the General if they believed that they no longer had him to deal with. And another thing that helped to determine the young man to stick to his original plan was that he wanted to put the sea, for a time, between himself and Leila Chetwynd.

He had but a small private income; and his professional income was as yet in the clouds, and gave every sign of staying there. He could not, in honour, make love to Leila, and win her heart, knowing that he had no home of his own to bring her to, without her father's formal and willing consent. And he felt sure that if he were to be in Leila's company again—as he could hardly fail to be if he remained in England—he must betray his feelings to her. He would not be able to help it.

On the other hand, if the matter were already settled—if she were destined to become the bride of Captain Byngham, a man he had never liked, he would wish to be out of the way till it was all over. He could not stand by and see Leila plight her troth to another. The very thought tortured him.

No; he would leave England. He would go and see if he could shoot bears in the Rocky Mountains. But before he went, he would see Sir Arthur, tell him what had occurred since they parted, and at the same time find out, if possible, whether there was any hope that the General would accept him as a son-in-law.

He awaited, therefore the General's return, spending the interval in making all arrangements necessary for his departure. Among other things, he paid a visit to the house-agent. He was told that the tenants of Lancaster Villa had not given up possession of the house; and he had no difficulty in getting the agent to say that he would communicate with Mr. Linton (who had promised to look after Geoffrey's affairs during his absence) before letting Chester Villa to anyone else.

After waiting a fortnight, to allow the General time to return home, Geoffrey wrote to him, begging him to let him know when he would be in town. To his surprise, the General's reply was dated from a quiet hotel in the West End, where he usually put up when he came to London; and his delight may be imagined when he read the postscript:—"L. insisted on coming up with me—to see the Row, she said. Can you dine with us on Thursday? Seven-thirty sharp."

The happiness of meeting Leila was enough to drive every other thought out of Geoffrey's head for the time. The dark shadow that had come over his life, even the hopelessness of his love, was forgotten.

Time went on crutches with him next day, but the longest day comes to an end; and by half-past seven Geoffrey was shaking hands with Leila in her father's private sitting-room at "Mather's."

"How well you are looking!" he cried involuntarily, as he gazed, with eyes that spoke his admiration all too plainly, at the bright, happy face before him. Leila was radiant that night. She never looked more lovely; her cheeks were glowing with health; her eyes sparkling with innocent enjoyment of her life.

"We are both very much the better for our sea trip," said the General. "In fact," he added, with a significant look at Geoffrey, "I think I needed a change more than Leila. Too much of the country is not good for a man who has spent an active life. The Atlantic breeze scattered the cobwebs that had begun to cluster round my old head. Nothing like a breath of the sea air for dispelling morbid fancies."

Paid a visit to the house-agent.

This was said in rather a low tone, so that Leila might not hear it. She was busy removing the lid from a huge pasteboard box, which a waiter had just brought in. Geoffrey understood him to mean that he had ceased to believe in the reality of the dangers that menaced him. "I shall have to undeceive you persently, my good sir," said the young man to himself; but he thought it better to say nothing just then.

"What have you got there, Leila?" called out the General.

The girl had raised the large lid, and was gazing at the contents of the box with a look of serious but intense satisfaction.

"It is my new ball-dress, papa," she answered with a little blush. "I couldn't resist taking just a peep at it. It is lovely!"

The General laughed at her earnestness.

"Send someone to take that box to Miss Chetwynd's room," he said to the head waiter, who just then entered the room. "Discipline must be maintained, my dear. This isn't the place for inspection of dresses. My daughter is plunging into the gaiety of the London season with all the ardour of youthful folly," he said to Geoffrey.

"Papa! What a shame to speak in that way. When you know that this is my first season, and I have been out for years and years!"

"If you had been 'out' so many years, you wouldn't care to call attention to the fact, my dear," said Sir Arthur. "But here is the soup, and I'm very glad to see it. Sit down, Geoffrey, my boy. I thought it would be cosier to dine here than downstairs. I hate eating among strangers, though Leila seems to prefer it."

"Papa, you are simply unbearable to-night," said the young lady with an air of offended dignity, as she took her seat at the head of the table.

"I needn't ask you whether you enjoyed your cruise," said Geoffrey.

"Oh, Mr. Dundas, it was simply delicious! I felt as if I could have sailed on for ever, past those lovely islands, and fairy headlands, and great cliffs where the sea birds swooped round and round, sailing in the air, as we sailed on the sea! The delightful freshness of the mornings—and the moonlit nights on deck! Oh, Mr. Dundas, if you have never been for a cruise you have simply no idea how delightful it is! Then all the people on board were so nice; and Lord Lavington was so kind and thoughtful for our comfort."

"Were there many people on board?"

"About a dozen. You would never think, to look at the yacht, that she could hold so many. But Lord Lavington is going to buy a larger one next year; and he is going to ask us——"

"Hey! What's that?" asked the General sharply.

The girl stopped short in some confusion.

"I heard nothing about an invitation for next year."

"It wasn't an invitation, papa. Only, one night when we were talking about the new yacht—she is to be a steamer, Mr. Dundas, quite a large vessel—he said he hoped we would be able to judge for ourselves what she was like, or something of that kind. It was only a polite speech."

"And what did you say, puss?"

"I said we meant to spend next season in London," said Leila saucily, with a little glance at Geoffrey.

"The dickens you did! And who told you that? You know I hate the racket, the long formal dinners, the crushes—ugh! I wouldn't stay a day in town but for you getting that promise out of me."

"Well, papa, when Lady Churchwood asked us to her dance we couldn't very well refuse, could we?"

"We could have refused perfectly well, but nothing would serve you but to accept. However, my dear, I am very pleased that you should have a little pleasure, and see a little of the world."

"Thank you, papa! Lady Churchwood is Lord Lavington's sister," Leila added for Geoffrey's benefit. "She was our chaperon on board the yacht."

"Isn't Lord Lavington married, then?" asked the young man, with an absurd, jealous pang at his heart.

"Oh, no."

"I fancied, somehow, he was an elderly man."

"Not at all."

"Quite young," broke in the General. "Just at the time when a man is at his best."

"I thought he was rather old; he has grey hair," said Leila simply.

"That's because you are so unsophisticated, my love. Some men are grey at thirty; some are bald. Wait till you have gone through a season in London, my dear, and you will change your ideas on these subjects."

"Then we are going to spend next season in town?" cried Leila, her eyes beaming with the pleasure of anticipation.

"I can't say yet. Part of it, perhaps. I haven't made my plans—time enough to ask me eight months hence."

"Mr. Dundas," said Leila suddenly, "couldn't you manage to get a card for Lady Churchwood's dance on Monday evening?"

"My dear, how can he go if he is not asked?" asked the General almost tartly.

"But people do angle for invitations in London, papa. Flossie Chamberlayne told me so. And you know so many people, Mr. Dundas. I am sure you could get an invitation easily if you wished."

Geoffrey glanced at the General before replying.

"I don't think it is at all a dignified thing to angle for an invitation, as you call it," said Sir Arthur. "I may be old-fashioned, but I confess I should think it an impertinence for anyone to invite himself directly or indirectly to my house. And I should never dream of seeking an invitation to another man's house."

Geoffrey could hardly forbear smiling at the General's antiquated notions; but he was at the same time pained at his attitude. He seemed to be saying, almost in so many words, "It would suit my plans better if you were not to appear at Lady Churchwood's on Monday night." But Geoffrey showed nothing of this in his face.

Gazing at the contents of the box.

"I don't think people in society mind in the least if an intimate acquaintance asks for a card for a dance for a friend," he remarked quietly. "These dances are really semi-public affairs. But I hardly think I shall be able to go," he added, turning to Leila.

"Oh, very well. I'm sorry," said the girl. She was of opinion that her father had snubbed her, and that Geoffrey had not taken her part as he should have done. And Geoffrey was thinking that he would gladly give a hundred pounds for the pleasure of one waltz with Leila.

For the moment, he almost determined to break through the rule he had laid down for himself, and go to the ball. But the next moment, he saw that to do such a thing would be absolutely fatal to his schemes, for it was quite likely that if he were to go, next day his name would appear in the list of guests in the Morning Post.

"The fact is," he said, "I am thinking of going abroad, for some months——"

"Going abroad!" cried the General. "What has put that into your head?"

"I want to see life in the western States, and I want to shoot a bear or two, if there are any left."

"But your profession, my dear boy!"

"That's just it. At present I haven't any practice to speak of, so I can afford the time. Later on, I hope I may have so much to do that I may not be able to get away."

"Humph! When do you start?"

"Almost at once."

Sat and watched the traffic.

There was a momentary silence. Geoffrey could not help fancying that there was a shadow on Leila's face, a sad expression in her frank blue eyes, as she glanced at him.

"Have you heard from the Rajah since you returned?" asked Geoffrey, by way of changing the subject.

"Oh, yes," answered the General. "A most polite letter, full of courteous, old-fashioned phrases, thanking us for our hospitality, and so on. The Rajah's manners are decidedly superior to those of many modern Englishmen."

"Yes, indeed," cried Leila. "I like the Rajah. I think he is delightful. And I am so glad he is coming back to us next June. I quite fancy it will be a match between him and—somebody."

"Leila, my dear, you ought not to say such things," said her father. "The Rajah is by birth a prince; and yet—well I consider that a marriage of the kind you allude to would be most undesirable, in fact almost unnatural."

Leila said nothing; but there was a mischievous look in her eyes, which Geoffrey understood.

The conversation now drifted in the direction of the plays and pictures of the year, and it did not return to more personal topics while dinner lasted.

When the dessert was on the table the General and Geoffrey went out on the balcony to smoke, while Leila sat down to the piano, and began playing snatches from various composers as the fancy seized her. The two men sat and watched the traffic as it flowed ceaselessly on past the corner of the quiet side-street in which they were sitting.

"What is the real reason of your going to America?" asked the General abruptly.

"I will tell you when Miss Chetwynd leaves us for the night," answered Geoffrey.

That moment soon came. Coffee was brought in; and when, shortly afterwards, the General said:

"Now, my love, early to bed and early to rise, you know," Leila obediently rose.

Her father was busy shutting the French window, as she offered her hand to Geoffrey. He held her fingers a moment in his own.

"I will bid you good-bye now," he said; "it is hardly likely that I shall see you again before I sail."

"Confound it! I've left my cigar-case outside," said the General, opening the window as he spoke. He was only absent for a few seconds; but these were just the few seconds Geoffrey had been hoping for all the evening.

"I don't see why you need go away at all," said Leila, in a voice that was hardly quite steady.

"I am running away," said Geoffrey, and his voice was low and husky—"from myself. I cannot stay in England any longer at present."

"Why not?" was on the girl's lips; but just then the young man raised his eyes, and she read something in them which not only checked the question, but made a soft blush steal over cheek and brow.

She turned hastily away, and busied herself with the loose music on the piano; and, by the time her father had come back, closed the window, and turned round to bid her good-night, the blush had died quite away. Indeed, her face was pale as she offered her hand to Geoffrey for the last time.

"Good-night—and good-bye," he said softly. And she answered, "A pleasant trip, then, and a safe return;" and, as she spoke, she smiled.

Many a time afterwards, as he lay on his bed of fine twigs and snow, gazing on the stars that peered through the branches overhead, or watching the sparks as they whirled up from the red camp fire, Geoffrey remembered that smiling look.

CHAPTER XV.

"YOU LOVE MY DAUGHTER!"

"AND now, my dear fellow, what is the reason of this sudden freak of yours?" asked Sir Arthur, when Geoffrey had closed the door behind Leila.

For answer the young man told the General what had happened to him since he left Seacombe Towers. As he spoke, the ruddy, well-satisfied look which Sir Arthur had worn, the look of a man well content with himself and the world, left his face. His cheeks lost their colour; a hard, stern, set look came into his eyes. He continued gazing at the speaker in silence, till the last word had been uttered. Then he drew a long breath, and, throwing himself back in his chair, began gnawing the ends of his moustache.

"You had a squeak for it, Geof," he said. Being an Englishman, that was all.

Geoffrey nodded. "At one time I really thought I was done for," he said; "but one good thing is that you have now a capital excuse for refusing to receive the Rajah next June."

The General slowly shook his head.

"It would hardly be fair to hold the Rajah responsible for the acts of his servant," he said.

This seemed to Geoffrey to be straining the obligation of hospitality. However, he contented himself with saying that the existence of a conspiracy was now beyond question; and to this the General gravely assented.

"But there is another reason why I should wish to leave the country for a time," continued Geoffrey.

"Yes?"

The General was hardly listening. His thoughts were busy with the Hindoos and their conspiracy. Geoffrey was piqued into saying:

"I hope you will pardon my abruptness, but may I ask if Miss Chetwynd is engaged to marry her cousin?"

The young man had calculated that the question would "wake up" the old campaigner, and he was right.

"What, sir?" he cried in a voice of thunder, starting from his chair.

Geoffrey felt that he had gone too far; but nothing was to be gained by retreat.

"The question would be an impertinence, sir," he said, "if it were not that my own welfare and happiness are so closely bound up with your answer."

"What is that you say? Do you mean that you have the audacity to tell me that your happiness is bound up with my daughter's?"

Geoffrey also started to his feet. It was his turn to be angry.

"Good-night—and good-bye."

"Audacity is a hard word."

"Audacity is a hard word, sir, in that connection, for you to use to my father's son," he said proudly.

The General frowned, but remained silent.

"Yet you mistake me," went on Geoffrey. "I did not presume to bracket my name with your daughter's. I was excusing myself for putting what seemed an impertinent question by saying that my happiness depended on your answer. The fact is, Sir Arthur, I am leaving the country rather than stay to witness your daughter's marriage."

"My daughter is not going to be married."

"I thought it was settled that she was to marry Captain Byngham," said Geoffrey, his heart beating fast with hope.

"Well, she is not. Captain Byngham is—not the sort of man I would choose for a son-in-law. But I don't see that it is any concern of yours."

"Nor would it be, except that—that I love her."

"You! You love my daughter! How can you speak in that way? You know that your income——. I need not say more. It is quite out of the question."

Geoffrey was silent.

"It is quite out of the question," repeated the General.

"I cannot answer you," said the young man. "And yet it seems hard for us poor 'detrimentals,' as we are called. You invite us to your houses out of pure kindness, and we are allowed to sit by your daughters, talk with them, dance, ride, sing with them. Outwardly, we and they are on a footing of perfect equality. Yet the moment one of us dares to show himself a man, and not a mere talking, dancing, shooting machine, you cry out as if he had done something unnaturally wicked."

The General's stern face relaxed. He even smiled.

"You are an impertinent young puppy, sir," he said. "But you are your father all over, so I forgive you. Sit down, now, and let us talk over things in a rational way."

Geoffrey stared at the old man in surprise. He did not understand the General sufficiently to know that he was often the first to blame himself for his hot-headedness, and the first to regret it. He had already been quite subdued by the young man's spirited self-defence.

He sat down, with Geoffrey opposite him, lit his cigar, and for a few minutes smoked in silence.

"I suppose you are in earnest about this affair," he said, at length.

"In earnest? As much in earnest—more in earnest than I ever was in my life!"

"Have you said anything to my daughter about this—given her to understand the nature of your feelings?"

"No. Except——to-night. In bidding her good-bye I allowed her to know that I was going to America in order to put the sea between us."

"Humph! You needn't have done that. However, there must be no writing, you understand."

"Certainly not, Sir Arthur," said Geoffrey stiffly.

"Personally," went on the General, after a long pause, "I have no wish that my little girl should marry at all. I dread the parting with her. But I am not so selfish as to stand in the way of her happiness."

Another long pause. Geoffrey's heart began to beat faster. He could not help hoping that the General was going to give way. The General's next words undeceived him.

"But if she marries it must be suitably. There is nothing to prevent her occupying a very exalted station. I may tell you, for I wish you to see that I treat you with confidence, that Lord Lavington is a suitor for her hand. He came to me, and asked my permission, as a gentleman should. And I told him that I wished him success, but that in my opinon it would be better for his interests that I should not interfere at all.

"So the matter stands. He has been a good deal with us since we have been in town, and I have no doubt he will propose to her shortly. Now, my dear fellow, I have no objection to you personally—none. But really, you know, with your slender income, and your uncertain prospects——"

"Say no more, sir, if you please," said Geoffrey; and even in his own ears his voice sounded hoarse and strange. "I was mad. I see it now. It is best for me to go to America. I will carry out my original plan. I shall be away for nearly a year, and perhaps by that time it will be all over. Good-bye."

He rose, and held out his hand.

"Good-bye, my dear fellow"—(Geoffrey wished he would keep his affectionate phrases to himself). "Think of me as kindly as you can. This time next year things will look very differently to you, and you will see that I was right. But just at present, I agree with you, you will be the better for a complete change of scene."

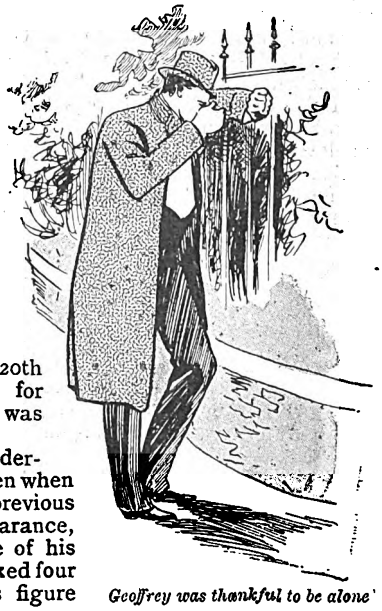
And so they parted.

Geoffrey was thankful to be alone, to be out in the cool, quiet summer night, under the stars. For hours he wandered on, through street and square and park, till the dawn broke, and the sparrows chirped loud, and the gas-lamps burned yellow and dim.

Not till that night, it seemed to him, had he realised how passionately he loved Leila Chetwynd. To leave the country and allow her to become the wife of another man was like tearing the flesh from his bones. But he saw there was no help for it. To depend on the general's purse after what he had said would be worse than meanness—it would be the action of a cur. And to marry Leila without his consent, even if such a thing were possible, would be to condemn her to a life of squalid hardships.

There was no help for it. But Geoffrey never forgot the bitterness of that hour. He must be more or less than a man—probably less—who can resign himself to the loss of one who is dearer to him than life itself, without many a wild and bitter thought, many a cruel pang. Geoffrey Dundas was young and strong, and able to suffer; but for many and many a day he carried on his heart the scars of that night's agony.

Three days later he was at sea.



Geoffrey was thankful to be alone

CHAPTER XVI.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

TEN months went by; and among the passengers who embarked on the City of Madrid on the 20th of April at New York for Queenstown and Liverpool was Geoffrey Dundas.

He was changed considerably from what he had been when he left England the previous summer—changed in appearance, and changed also in some of his mental qualities. He looked four or five years older. His figure was more upright, his movements more free and vigorous. His face was bronzed with exposure; it had lost the delicacy, the look of smart, precocious puerility, which is characteristic of the Londoner. His muscles were now as hard as the fibres of an oak. His eye was calm and strong, as the eye of a man must be who for some time has habitually faced danger.

Distance and time had done something to heal the smart of his wound—something, but not much. It was only by constant movement, constant excitement, that he could forget the pain that gnawed continually at his heart.

Sport had done much for him—not the "sport" of betting on a horse-race, or firing at a partridge or a rabbit, but the grim sport of risking his life in ridding the earth of beasts of prey. He had learned to face danger, not merely with the courage of a naturally brave man, but with the cool confidence of one who has more than once looked death in the face without flinching.

Through all his wanderings, the Times had followed him; for he had ordered that it should be sent to him regularly, that he might learn whether Leila Chetwynd had become Lady Lavington. Many a time had he tramped scores of miles to reach the little outlandish post-office, where he knew the bundle of newspapers would be waiting for him; and then felt such a horrible dread of reading the death-sentence of his love that he could barely find the courage to tear off the wrappers. But, so far, he had seen no announcement of the wedding.

Look death in the face.

He could hardly understand it. Leila, he knew, was heart-whole; she had openly said that she liked Lord Lavington, and had accepted without hesitation the attentions his sister had offered her, no doubt at his instigation. There was no reason why she should not be pleased and flattered by the viscount's preference; no reason why she should not return his love. Yet no announcement of the marriage had appeared; and Geoffrey was forced to clench his teeth to keep down the storm of emotion that threatened to overwhelm him if he had allowed himself to think what that might mean.

On arriving in London Geoffrey sent a telegram to Sir Arthur Chetwynd to advise him of his return, and received an answer by post. Both the General and Leila were at home at Seacombe Towers, and he understood from this that Leila was not married.

There was no invitation for Geoffrey; and from this he understood that the General was unwilling that he and Leila should meet. Unconsciously he had hoped for an invitation, and the disappointment was keen and bitter. If the young man had ever imagined that he was in any degree cured of his love for Leila that moment would have undeceived him.

But there was something, he told himself, that he could yet do for her. Her own life might not be threatened, but her father certainly was in danger; and for her, a motherless girl, to lose her father, would be a frightful calamity. And Geoffrey was convinced that by keeping up a watch on the Hindoos he might be able to defeat their plans, and save their intended victim. He resolved to take up the work where he had laid it down; and the first point, obviously, was to ascertain whether the Hindoos had returned to Lancaster Villa.

It was growing dusk when he paid his first visit to the house. Once more London had decked herself, as it were, in her spring raiment, and adorned herself with garlands. The air was cool and fresh, for it was still the first week in May; and Geoffrey was passing carelessly along one of the half-empty streets, not far from Lancaster Villa, when he saw a figure in front of him that he thought he recognised, the figure of Amavati.

At first Geoffrey literally could not believe his eyes. Knowing the Rajah's ideas, and the customs of his life, it was incredible that he should be found in this out-of-the-way corner of London at that hour, on foot and unattended.

Geoffrey drew nearer him. There could be no doubt it was he.

The young Englishman was about to step up to him and accost him, when he suddenly drew back.

What could this mean? he asked himself. Was Amavati after all in league with these murderers? If not, what was he doing here, without an attendant, contrary to the etiquette he adhered to so rigidly?

All the dark suspicions which Geoffrey had at one time entertained of the Rajah, and which he had afterwards dismissed as unworthy and unfounded, recurred to his mind.

Here was proof, something whispered to him—proof clear and unmistakable—of his alliance with the men who had twice attempted his life!

"I will not condemn him till I am certain," said Geoffrey to himself. "He may be going to some other house in the neighbourhood. I will wait and see."

Keeping a good way behind, Geoffrey followed the Rajah. Amavati made straight for Lancaster Villa. When the house came in sight, Geoffrey decreased the distance between Amavati and himself, so that, in the declining light, he might make no mistake as to the house he entered.

At the gate, leading to Lancaster Villa, the Rajah stopped short, carefully read the name of the house on the gate-post; and then put his hand on the latch.

In doing so, he turned half round, and, with a start, drew back his hand. He had seen Geoffrey Dundas.

In an instant Geoffrey had formed his plan.

He walked slowly up to the Rajah, and looked him in the face.

FORGIVEN

MISS Dalton paced the library with a restless step, glancing at the clock every now and then with anxious eyes. She was gowned, garlanded and gloved for a ball, but her escort had not arrived, and growing impatience was fast sending little ripples of frowns over her pretty face and mobile features. No man had dared to keep her waiting before, and the tender appealing eyes were losing their softness in the dusky gloom of indignation that was gathering in their depths.

There was a ring at the bell, and she prepared a volley of reproach to fire at her fiancé when he entered, but the well-known step did not echo upon the polished floor, and she knew he had not come. She pulled off her gloves impatiently, and threw them upon the table. She will not go now, even should he come. It is nearly half-past ten, and her toilet looks disarranged already, for she has a trick of running her fingers through her hair when she is restless, and the flowers on her bosom have begun to droop in the heat of the room.

"He should have sent me a note," she exclaimed between her teeth, as she flung herself into a chair.

A violent peal at the bell makes her start and prepare again to give her lover a warm reception, but, after the door closes, she sees Walters going towards the study with a telegram for her father, and her heart sinks into a sickening heaviness with the growing pain. The fire is getting lower, the carriages in the street roll by farther apart, and the great hall clock, tolling out the hour, seems to ring a funeral knell in her heart.

"Turn out all the lights, Walters, and admit no one to-night," she says, as she goes up the broad staircase, with her long white robes trailing behind her and the crimson wreath of flowers in her hair dimmed by the flush of anger on her face. There has been a fierce combat within her breast, a battle between love and pride, and the latter has conquered. She loves this man, but she loves power also, and she wishes to make him feel the weight of her power.

Before she retired she gathered together all the letters he had written to her, all the mementoes of the engagement, and bound them in a package with the ring, whose pure light had scintillated on her finger for months. These are to be given to him on the morrow—he will surely come then—and she prepares to put her heart in armour against the man to whom she had given her life and into whose care she had intrusted all her future happiness.

The next day he does not come, and her wrath deepens as the hours creep by. At mid-day the rankling bitterness is somewhat allayed by the burning of two of Graham's photos, and tearing from a doorway a mass of Eastern embroidery which he had sent her from Damascus.

She knows no accident has befallen him, else she would have learned of it at once, and that evening, at dinner, when her mother timidly inquires if Graham is ill, Tom replies that he had seen him just two hours before, driving rapidly in a cab. Miss Dalton turns the drift of the conversation to Melba's marvellous voice, and proposes the opera next evening.

"The Wilson girl is the cause," she concludes. "She has made every effort to ensnare him, and now her designs are accomplished." Her resolutions not to see him when he calls are swept away by a desire to exhibit her scorn, to show her contempt for his treachery.

"Mr. Graham," announces Walters very soon after the others have departed for the theatre, and Miss Dalton is left alone in the library.

"Ask him in here," she said quietly, as she glanced round to ascertain if her package was within reach. He held out both hands in greeting as he advanced, the joy and gladness in his face showing that no idea of dismissal had entered his mind.

"Estelle," he began at once; "did you think I would never come? I have been ——"

The words die unuttered as he notes scorn in the curl of her lips, the flash of anger in her eyes, and the uplifted hand that warns him not to continue.

"What is the matter? You surely are not angry! You know that only a matter of the utmost importance could have kept me away from ——"

"Here are your letters, Mr. Graham, together with the ring and other tokens of our engagement, which you will now consider at an end. I wish no explanations—I will not listen to them."

"Good heavens! You will not dismiss me this way—without a cause? You will, at least, allow me to vindicate myself in your eyes! I cannot go like this—have you think me a traitor to my vows! Last night ——"

"I cannot hear your story—leave me! Here is the ring—your letters. You have had no consideration for me, why should I for you? Only two events could exonerate your behaviour. You were not ill?"

"No."

"You met with no accident?"

"No; but there is something far worse——"

"I will accept no apology. No man shall think he can slight me, and then, at his pleasure, return and be reinstated by a few words of atonement. Our engagement is broken; it can never be renewed."

"Very well, Miss Dalton. I accept your verdict"; and taking the package from her hand, he continued, "Do not fear that I will annoy you—one dismissal is sufficient; but, before I leave you, I wish to tell you something—a story told me by a dying man; it will interest you, as it concerns someone you know—a woman." She did not ask him to be seated—did not seat herself, but stared at him in a pathetic, stony way, as though she would never look on his face again.

"I will never forgive you; so if it is for your sake that you tell the story, you may spare yourself."

"It is not for my sake," he answered coldly. "I do not ask your pardon—do not expect it."

She said nothing, but leaned lightly against the mantel-piece, while he continued slowly, as though each word was of vital importance, and he wished to use as few as possible: "Last evening at six, while bidding Carroll good-bye at the station, I noticed a poor drunken wretch, whose ravings were gathering a crowd round him, and I knew that he would soon be in a policeman's clutches unless some one cared for him. He had just come off a city train, and asked the way to Vernon Street, which I know well. In his hand he held a package of letters, which he waved through the air in a threatening manner, and assured the bystanders that they would bring him a fortune.

"I foresaw an excellent newspaper paragraph for some reporter, and determined to nip it in the bud. The man said he had letters for which the writer would pay, and as I think the dissection in the newspapers of everybody's business should be discouraged, I rescued him in time and offered to conduct him to his destination."

Graham paused, passed his hand acros his brow, while Miss Dalton frowned angrily, and exclaimed, "Really, Mr. Graham, perhaps you have forgotten that I do not belong to the Temperance Union, neither am I interested in any society for the reformation of inebriates." She had always admired his philanthropy, but upon this occasion she failed to comprehend his interest in a man debased by liquor when he should be overwhelmed with losing her.

"A few words dropped from this man's lips prompted me to take him to my rooms," he continued, ignoring her interruption. "I learnt there that he had made his escape from a retreat into which he had been put for treatment; that he held a woman's reputation in his hands; that his hatred for her treatment in former years made him long to injure her in some way. He had been out of the asylum long enough to revert to old habits, and was reckless."

Graham looked straight at Miss Dalton, and saw that she was becoming more interested. He took a long breath, and continued in louder, clearer tones:

"It seems that he met her while she was at a boarding-school. She eluded the mistress's watchfulness, and met him often, wrote him constantly, became engaged, and gave him her photograph. When she bade farewell to school books and college days, he learned that she had simply amused herself at his expense, that she had entered into this flirtation to beguile the tedium and monotony of school life.

"He reproached her with the fact that he had given up everything for her sake; that he had allowed splendid business opportunities to slip by that he might remain in the town that sheltered her. He told her, with all the fervour and earnestness of a broken-hearted man how she had come into his life to stay, and that to give her up would make a wreck, morally and physically, of him.

"She only laughed in his face, assured him that he would soon forget, demanded all her letters and the velvet case containing a face that had been his guiding star. He insisted upon keeping them as a reminder of his happiness, never intending to use them in any way; but drink had maddened him until he felt that he had been wronged and she should be made to suffer for the destruction she had wrought.

"His family had placed him in a retreat for inebriates, and for over a year he had watched his chance to escape, and when it came he journeyed to this, the city where she lives, and it was his desire to face her and let her see what she had made of his life, and to proclaim this schoolgirl episode to the world in which she moved."

Miss Dalton's face had grown so white that even the dancing fire-flames did not light it up, and she sank into a chair, where she watched with bated breath Graham's lips as he ended the story.

"Where did this man live?" she asked in a trembling voice.

"In Chelford. There is a convent there."

She screened her face from the fire-light as she asked again, in a scarcely audible tone, "Did he tell you the name of the woman—he loved?"

"Yes; and I have brought her the letters, together with her photograph." He laid a package in her lap, and added, with a sigh at the recollection of the journey, "I have taken the man back to the place whence he came—that is where I was last night—and put him in the care of keepers who will see that he does not leave them again. He is dying of some cerebral congestion, and can live but a few months. You have your letters, Miss Dalton, and I beg that you will not allow this affair to give you one moment's unhappiness, as your secret is safe with me. I wish you good evening."

"Geoffrey!" she cried, putting out her arms as she saw him striding towards the door. "Come back, my love, come back. Forgive me for not telling you all this before; forgive me for treating you as I did this evening. I never understood your noble heart, your generous nature before." And as Geoffrey Graham laid the dark head against his big, strong shoulder, looked down into the tear-bathed eyes and felt two soft, white arms about his neck, he did not wonder that a man's life was wrecked after loving and losing this woman.

THEY were talking about mesmerism in the green-room of the Arundel Theatre. Cordyl, the manager, was there, and did not believe in it at all.

"Mesmerism! it is simply another word for trickery," he said, confidently.

"Pardon me, but have you ever witnessed any mesmeric phenomena?" asked a man with dark, penetrating eyes. He was a journalist, a friend of one or two of the actors at the Arundel, and haunted the green-room. Cordyl had seen him there before, and did not take to him—perhaps because Tom Hallam, the journalist, had bothered him to accept a play of his. However, a manager cannot afford altogether to offend the press, so Hallam was not interfered with.

Cordyl answered him now rather curtly, however.

"Thousands of times," he said. "What they call phenomena: men eating candles and all that sort of nonsense; but it is all pure trickery."

"Mind, Mr. Hallam is a mesmerist himself," put in the leading lady.

The manager shrugged his shoulders.

"Would you like to see an exhibition of what I can do?" asked the journalist quietly.

Cordyl shrugged his shoulders again.

"Would you care to wager that I can't stop your play to-night by mesmerising the company?" went on Hallam, as quietly as before; and they all laughed, Cordyl with the rest.

"I am quite serious," said the mesmerist, "and if Mr. Cordyl does not object to my making the experiment—as he hardly can do after his assertions—I shall be happy to show him how easy it is to rule the wills of the subjects whom I have been allowed to bring a little under my mesmeric control."

"What should you do to us?" asked the leading lady.

"Simply make a few passes before you went on. I should not, of course, send you into the mesmeric sleep, or you could not go on at all, unless I willed you to, and directed your actions."

She turned to Cordyl.

"Oh! do let him try. There's a dear."

The manager frowned.

"I cannot have my plays humbugged about even for your sake."

"But, according to you, I cannot do anything," said Hallam. "If there is nothing in mesmerism, I cannot affect your play in any way that I can discern. Will you agree to a wager upon it?"

"Come, Mr. Cordyl," said everybody, "you cannot refuse to back your assertions."

"It is too absurd," said the manager.

"But there is no harm in having a little money on it," said Leon Kay, the comedian. "Suppose the experiment is made on the monologue. Mr. Hallam is welcome to make as many mesmeric passes on me as he pleases, but I don't think he will be able to prevent me going through with my piece."

Leon Kay was acting a monologue, called "The Old Letter," as the first piece every night before the drama. "The Old Letter" had been written to order by a well-known dramatist. Cordyl never under any circumstances risked a play not written by a well-known man, and it was not much of a success. Leon Kay made as much out of it, of course, as anybody possibly could; but it did not go very well for all that.

Perhaps this is why the manager allowed himself to be cajoled and bullied at last into wagering £10 that Hallam could not, while sitting in a box on the following night, prevent Leon Kay from performing the piece, or make him act in any unusual manner during the performance of it.

The wager was put into writing, and both Cordyl and Hallam deposited their £10 with one of the company.

Cordyl called upon Leon Kay to give his promise that he would not play any tricks, but Kay shook his head.

"No, Mr. Cordyl; I know perfectly well that if I did, I should quit your company on Saturday night. And I cannot afford to do that, even if Hallam offered me all his £10 as an inducement."

Cordyl laughed.

"How well you know me," he said.

. . . . . .

Next night every member of the company who had not to be dressing for the drama, was in front of the house, anxious to watch Tom Hallam's experiment. The journalist had made a few impressive passes over Leon Kay after he was dressed, and then went with the manager into a private box a few minutes before the curtain went up.

"Does Kay play nothing but light comedy?" he asked carelessly when they were seated.

Cordyl laughed his rather unpleasant laugh.

"He does not get the chance. They all think they are taking the wrong parts. Kay thinks he has the making of a serious actor—comic men invariably have; but it is lucky for the public that we managers keep them to the parts that they can really do."

"I think I'll make Kay play a serious part to-night," said the journalist thoughtfully; and, as he spoke, the curtain went up.

Everybody who had heard of the experiment to be made glanced up at Hallam, who, as the curtain rose, fixed his dark, penetrating eyes, with a concentrated look of command, on the face of the actor.

Half way across the stage, Kay seemed suddenly to feel the effect of his commanding glance. He had come in, as usual, with the little skip of a comic old man, but now he suddenly stopped dead. The members of the company in front ceased to look at Hallam, and fixed their eyes, full of attention, on Leon Kay. His pause was only for a moment—the ordinary spectators could hardly notice it—then he walked to the seat that he had to take by a small table, but he staggered as he walked with uncertain steps, and, when he reached his place, sank down with his arms on the table and his face on his arm.

"Why, the man is intoxicated!" said Cordyl.

And when Kay spoke, his voice sounded as though the manager was right. Worst of all, he was not speaking his lines, but something quite different. The audience, however, noticed nothing wrong, for the words were coherent and intelligible, although they certainly were not the words of "The Old Letter." The apparent intoxication seemed part of the play. The words were even interesting, and there was a listening hush over the place, which was not usually noticed when "The Old Letter" was played.

"It is a trick," said Cordyl; but Hallam, with his dark eyes fixed on the actor's face, did not seem to hear. His cheeks were unnaturally pale, and drops of cold perspiration stood on his forehead.

"Leon Kay shall suffer for this," growled the manager again; and Hallam, with his white concentrated face, turned to him with sudden excitement.

"Be silent, man, unless you want a fiasco. Leave me alone, and I can pull you through. Distract my attention, and see what happens."

The manager glanced at the stage again, in obedience to the journalist's directing finger.

The actor was sitting quite motionless with a vacant look on his face. Cordyl was conscious now that he had stopped speaking in the middle of a speech at the instant that the mesmerist had turned his eyes from the stage.

"For pity's sake go on," he said, conquered; and as Hallam turned back, the play went on again, the astonished manager not speaking another word during the whole performance.

The piece that Kay was giving, a piece Cordyl had never heard before, seemed to him to take hours in delivering. In reality, the monologue was quite a short one, and occupied less than half-an-hour; but the anxious manager, expecting every moment that something might disturb the mesmerist's attention, and cause the piece to break down ingloriously, the minutes passed like hours.

Even in his agony of suspense, the manager could not help noticing Leon Kay's acting. It was the wonderful part of the whole affair. He was completely transformed, and played with a depth and passion that astonished those who knew his ordinary acting in comic character, clever as that was. He had always been able to make the audience laugh. To-night, in the strange little monologue, he was making half the audience cry. When all too soon for everybody but Cordyl, the curtain came down, there was a perfect hurricane of applause, and the actor was called again and again.

Next day there was an enthusiastic notice in one of the chief morning papers, whose critic had been lured there, in time for the monologue, by a note from the leading lady. He could not say enough of the play or the acting. "Without any notice on the programme, and without even changing the scenery of 'The Old Letter,'" he wrote, "there was produced last night, at the Arundel Theatre, a short play as remarkable for its quite abnormal cleverness and beauty, as for the modesty of its anonymous author, who allowed it to appear without even a title." The criticism went on enthusiastically to describe the beauties of the monologue, and then gave a quarter of a column to Leon Kay's acting.

In the afternoon Hallam received a visit at his rooms from Cordyl and the actor who held the stakes. The latter handed over the money, and Cordyl asked if it was possible to get a copy of the monologue which Kay had delivered under the journalist's influence.

"It was a splendid thing," said the manager. "Where on earth did you get it from? I suppose you must have known it yourself word for word?"

"Yes," said Hallam quietly. "It was a little thing I offered you six months ago, which you said would not do at all."

"Well, I hope you will offer me it again," said Cordyl. "The public will expect it now. I only hope Kay will act as well when he is not under your influence."

"Oh, I expect he will," said the mesmerist with a smile; but it was not till a twelvemonth after, when his plays were being asked for everywhere, and Kay had married the leading lady and joined the Lyceum company, that Hallam handed him back his £10, and explained how anxious he and his "chum," Leon Kay, had been to get a hearing, the one for his plays, the other for his serious acting.

"But that pause, when you took your eyes away," stammered Cordyl.

"Oh! the pause was in the play," laughed Hallam.

THE DRUMMER BOY

HE was a little drummer boy who had been attached to a regiment of skirmishers. His name was Kadour, and he was one of the handful of Turks that had followed Vinoy's army into Paris. He had been in every action of the campaign from Wissembourg to Champigny. He used to flit across the battlefields like a bird of passage, with his iron clappers and derbouka (Arabian drum), so lively and restless that he seemed to actually dodge the bullets.

But as winter came on this little Turk, bronzed and reddened by the fire of grape shot, was unable to endure the long night watches. The immobility of the snow proved too much for him, and one morning he was picked up on the banks of the Marne with swollen and frozen feet. He was a long time in the hospital, and it was there that I first saw him.

Sad and patient as a sick dog, the Turk looked about him with a languid eye. Whenever anyone spoke to him he smiled and showed his teeth. That was all he could do, for our language was unknown to him, and he scarcely spoke the sabir, that Algerian patois composed of Provençal, Italian and Arabian words picked up here and there like shells along the shores of the Latin seas.

Kadour's only amusement was his derbouka. From time to time when his memory became very restless it was brought to his bed, and he would be allowed to play upon it, but very softly, on account of the other invalids. Sometimes he would beat the charge, and the gleam of his white teeth changed to a ferocious laugh, or his eyes softened at some Mussulman serenade, his nostrils quivered, and through the nauseous atmosphere of the hospital, amid the phials and bandages, he pictured to himself the orange-laden groves of Blidah and the little Moresks coming from the bath, veiled in white and perfumed with vervaine.

Thus two months passed away. A great many things had happened in Paris during those two months of which Kadour knew absolutely nothing. He had heard beneath his window the tramping of the exhausted and unarmed troops marching into the city, and after that the rolling of cannons from morning till night, and then the tocsin and the cannonade. All of these led him to believe that the war was still going on, and that he would fight again as soon as he might be able.

At last he set out, with his drum on his back, in quest of his company. He did not search long, for some passing troops took him to the Place. After a long interrogatory, from which they were able to learn nothing more than bono bezef, macache bono, the general of the day settled the matter by giving him ten francs and a horse, and attached him to his staff.

There was a little of everything in those staffs of the Commune, red coachmen's frocks, Polish mantles, Hungarian coats, sailors' pea jackets, gold, velvet and spangles. With his yellow embroidered blue vest, his turban and derbouka the Turk was one of the brightest figures of that wild masquerade.

Happy at finding himself in such good company, intoxicated by the sunlight, the cannonade and the confusion of arms and uniforms, persuaded moreover that the war against Prussia was still being carried on, only with more abandon, this innocent little deserter mingled naively in the great Parisian bacchanal and became the celebrity of the day.

Wherever he went he was applauded from the windows. The Commune was so proud at possessing him that it paraded and sported him like a cockade. He would be sent twenty times a day from the Place to the Minister of War, and thence to the Hotel de Ville. For it had been said so often that the marines of the Commune were sham marines and the artillery men sham also. But he was a real Turk; to be convinced of that one had only to remark the monkey-like mobility of countenance and savage agility of body revealed in his fantastic flights about the city.

Kadour felt that something was wanting to complete his happiness. He longed to fight and smell powder. Unfortunately the staffs under the Commune, as under the Empire, were not exposed to fire. When not engaged on parade or in bearing despatches the little Turk passed his time in the Place Vendome, or in the courts of the War Ministry, or in disordered camps encumbered with half-empty brandy casks and broken barrels of pork, amid feasting in the open air wherein one still recalled the famine of the siege.

Too good a Mussulman to take part in these orgies, Kadour soberly and tranquilly held himself aloof, performing his ablutions in a corner and preparing his kouss kouss with a handful of semoulia. Then, after a little air on the derbouka, he rolled himself up in his cloak and went to sleep on a doorstep amid the flames of the bivouac.

One morning in May Kadour was awakened by a terrible fusillade. The Ministry was in commotion; everyone was frightened.

Mechanically he followed the lead of the others, leaped into his saddle and joined the staff. The streets were crowded with disordered battalions and echoed with shrill trumpet peals. Pavements were torn up and thrown into barricades. Evidently something extraordinary was about to happen. Near the quay the firing was more distinct and the tumult greater.

On the Pont de la Concorde Kadour became separated from the staff. A little further on his horse was taken from him by a very important fellow wearing eight shoulder straps, under the pretence of bearing an important message to the Hotel de Ville.

Furiously the Turk began to run towards the battle, and as he ran he loaded his musket and muttered between his teeth: "Ma cach bono Brissien," for he still believed it to be the Prussians who were trying to enter. The bullets were already flying about the obelisque and in the foliage of the Tuileries. At the barricade of the Rue de Rivoli the avengers of Flourens called to him "He! He! Turk! Turk!" They were only a dozen, but Kadour alone was worth an army.

He stood erect on the barricade uttering shrill cries as he fought under a storm of grape shot. At one moment the dense cloud of smoke dispersed a little between two cannon shots, enabling him to see a mass of red pantaloons ranged in the Champs Elysées. Immediately everything became confused.

Suddenly the cannonade ceased. The last cannoneer fled after firing a parting shot. The Turk alone remained. Half concealed, ready for the assault, he fixed his bayonet and awaited the attack.

Amid the dull sound of the charge an officer cried: "Surrender!"

The Turk was bewildered for a moment; he then threw up his musket, and replied:

"Bono bono Francese," for he vaguely imagined that this was Faidherbe's or Chanzy's army of deliverance which the Parisians had awaited so long. In the twinkling of an eye the barricade was invaded and he was surrounded.

"Show me your musket!"

The weapon was still hot and smoking.

"Show your hands!"

His hands were blackened with powder, and the innocent Turk exhibited them with his naive smile. Then they pushed him against a wall and—bang!

He died not knowing why.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending Four penny stamps a book 'Corpulency and the Cure,' 256 pages, containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

"Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, 'Corpulency and the Cure' (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 4d.), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes—'I am just half the size.' A fourth—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 333.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 18, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

CLANK! Clank! The ring of his feet, booted and spurred, resounded on the rocky ledge. He was not used to marching, and his gun lay heavy on his shoulder.

Keene Judd, the condemned man, waiting his execution behind the bars of the impromptu gaol, saw with pleasure, not unmixed with amusement, that the sentinel now and then changed the gun's position and marched with the weapon on his left side.

There was no lamp or candle in the narrow room, and Keene didn't often lie awake, but to-night he could not sleep. His prison was the upper storey of the small log house, and there was no torch, so he crept to the window—if the slit in the wall could be called a window—and looked out. Since the day his sentence was pronounced his chains had been removed, and he had been made as comfortable as circumstances permitted. Vigilance over him had not, however, been relaxed.

The Northern engineers, who had taken justice into their own hands, captured Keene, and lodged him there in their own camp, had enough of that popular compound known as sand in their anatomy to carry through the thing they had undertaken. All day and all night an armed man walked the narrow ledge of the hillside on which the trappers had thrown the little hut as wasps build their nests on the surface of a side wall. To-night Keene watched him as he paced the length of the prison, watched the figure reverse itself and begin again the patient, persistent promenade.

Presently the guard looked up, aware by instinct that the prisoner's eyes were upon him, and as he did so met Keene's steady gaze. A look of resolution passed into his young features; he nodded, and the condemned man nodded back again.

"It air a fine night," called out Keene, "but it air not a night for sleepin'. I am a fair good sleeper, but not of moonlight nights. Ef you air sleepy now, supposin' we swap places? You come up here en have a nap en let me keep guard. You air young, you see, en need sleep more'n I do."

All Rights Reserved.

John Young laughed cordially in response to Keene's guffaw, but he kept up his regular tread.

"I can't sleep in the moonlight either," he called back, "though it's mighty civil in you to offer to give me the chance. They tell me it's unlucky."

He halted in front of the window, and as he did so he thought of how Admiral Byng took his accustomed dose for the scurvy the morning of his execution. On Friday Keene was to die, and this was Wednesday night; but it wasn't worth while to try and laugh him out of his prenatal and hereditary opinions.

"It air unlucky," said Keene with emphasis. He had come forward and was leaning against the hastily constructed bars. The engineers trusted their prisoner to the vigilance of the guard rather than to the security of the hut. Its single downstairs room had a dirt floor and no window, so they lodged Keene in the upper storey and slept in their own camp under canvas about fifty yards away, under the lee of the hill.

"I guess the idea that it's unlucky," said John, "came from your not being able to see straight in the moonlight. You can't tell your dog from your bird sometimes till you've fired and heard him howl. The fact is, it does make things look out of proportion. Now, this isn't a very interesting place by daylight—just the crooked red road on the edge of the precipice and the mountains piled up all about it; but to-night it's like—well—well, I don't know what it is like."

It might have been created that night for him and Keene. The sky, far lighter than the earth, gleamed with a blue pallor; the moon, a globe of yellow, threw long splashes of light across the eastern heavens, like the light in the tail of a comet, or the rays of a magic lantern, not mingling with the surface colour, but cutting across it as a rushing river cuts through a plain.

On the hillside the trees grew in mass, heavy and dark, but spurs of white rock jutted out at intervals, making rents in the sombre green garment. Above, and on every side, the circling hills rested as billows rest on the crest of the waves, their blue was the blue of a vapour and unreal as things look in the mists of fluctuating shadows; his own, as he caught a glimpse of it, was an armed giant, at whose spectre he started back, listening with quick heart beats.

For the engineers knew that at no moment was Keene secure. Barring the wives, sweethearts and parents of the men whom the freebooter had "got even with"—to use his own expression — the Tennessee mountaineers were not grateful for the foreign interference which was to rid the Gap settlement of its tyrant.

Keene was the most popular man in the district, and at any hour, now that his execution was close at hand, a rescue might be attempted. John felt in his pocket for the whistle whose shrill call would wake his companions sleeping over there in the clump of pines. There were only eight of them, and they had come to prospect for a railway, not to execute lynch laws, but they found that Keene Judd objected to their proposed peaceful employment.

One morning they received by one of his henchmen an ill-spelt letter in Keene's laboured chirography, ordering them to quit or die; but the engineers preferred the middle course. They stayed on and warned him they should fight.

When one of their corps, a young fellow from Louisville, was found dead a few days afterwards, shot through the heart, they set out to keep their word. Their opportunity came rather unexpectedly, and not in the manner most pleasing to adventurous spirits. It was on a Sunday morning, a still October day flooded with sunshine, and Keene was sauntering down the road, a bunch of red berries stuck in his soft grey hat, and dressed in his Sunday suit of blue jeans and long cowhide boots.

But the engineers could not afford to wait for the wily and popular hero to get himself in fighting trim. Keene was a difficult subject, as the photographers say, and would have to be taken on the snap, or not at all. The engineers walked up to him in a body and he threw up his hands. They were empty; so were his boot legs, his pockets, his coat-tails, and his sleeves.

The capturers walked him in their midst into their camp; heard his laconic statement that he "reckoned his time had come," and sentenced him to be hanged within ten days, without evidence, except the gaps in various households, which, it was known, were occasioned by a difference of opinion between the prisoner and the persons who now occupied places in the village graveyard.

John Young (Young John, the other engineers called him) had been hot in the pursuit of Keene, and firm in voting his death. The responsibility of executing a fellow-mortal without the jurisdiction of the law was a heavy one, but, as Virginius said to his little daughter, there was no way but this. Before a jury, Keene could prove a character as spotless as an untarnished shield fresh from the forge. John, therefore, had taken his share like the man he was, for all his sensitive mouth and his quick colour, and for three nights out of seven, for the last week, he had shouldered his rifle and walked between the hours of midnight and 5 a.m. in front of the gaol.

They were going to draw lots for a choice of executioner, but Young John had no idea, did the lot fall to him, of shirking his duty in the matter of hanging Keene Judd. His resoluteness astonished Marion, his chum at college, who had come with him to do prospecting for the new railway, of which John's father, a New York capitalist, was president, and which was to open this remote region to commerce and civilisation.

At college John was a dreamer. He edited the college journal and loved poetry. To see him pacing up and down before the cell of a condemned criminal looked odd. Marion confessedly hated his own job of guard-mounting, and wished the business over every hour of his life.

But though John was going to do his own part he was not the less sorry for Keene. He looked up at the narrow aperture where the tall, superbly-formed figure stood. The moonlight was playing on the bars that separated him from the deep, free woods. Only two more nights of moonlight in which to tempt Providence with eccentric dealings with him. The third would find him sleeping, fast and sound, no matter how brightly it shone upon his upturned face.

Young John put the whistle back into his pocket. No, it was his own shadow of which he was afraid. Afraid—he afraid? He was young enough for the hot blood to mount his cheek at the shaping of the word in his mental vocabulary.

"John!" It was Keene who called out to him as he made his four hundred and fiftieth turn at the corner. "When will the next number of the story paper git here?"

"Next Saturday," said John. He halted again beneath the window, always glad to be civil to his charge.

"That lets me out," said the condemned man despondently. "I'll never know ef that feller catched that gurl or no. I wished it could have come Thursday night. I dunno how it is, but the less time a man air got the heavier it hangs on his han's. I 'lowed es I'd pass Thursday night, which air boun' to be a long night, readin' about Lord Ernest en his vanished bride."

He sighed heavily, and John sighed in sympathy. He said nothing, however, but resumed his march.

"I love ye, John," the prisoner drawled as he passed on. "But I've got my mark on ye, en thet's a pity. Ef ye wasn't so mighty young, John, ye'd be an all-fired powerful man, but ye ain't ever goin' to git your growth. I've got my mark on ye, an' ye will always be Young John."

John laughed; his youth gave him a feeling of security, but the warning quickened his senses.

"Good night," said the prisoner, "I reckon I'll take a mouthful of sleep, es ye ain't so powerful interestin' es to keep me awake," and John renewed his march.

It was nearing midnight. The moon had climbed over the ridge and was riding high in mid-heaven. A white cloud rose from the narrow valley between the parallel lines of mountains—it looked like the veil of a bride, and the river shimmered and gleamed like a girl blushing and quivering beneath her lover's gaze. The dark hills stirred under the sweep of the wind. Down the pass the brow of Greylock shone out like a great knob of silver, a transparent drapery veiled the sky on either side of the path of the moon.

Hark! John arrested himself and stood all attention. Suddenly the twigs of an early frost-bitten bough emitted a cracking sound as if they had been put aside by out-reaching hands. In the clear mountain air, on which even the hoarse calls of the nighthawk fell like the clatter of nails upon a piece of tin, each note, distinct, though clashing down in broken fragments, he heard the approach of stealthy footsteps.

Again he felt for his whistle, though if the rescuer were alone he would risk the encounter. He drew the trigger of his gun and pointed it to the thicket whence the sound came. "Halt," he cried in his clear, high voice. The bushes parted. No rescuer, but a fair young woman stood there. John drew his breath.

She was a tall young woman, and held herself in the simple majesty of one who knows no artificial trammels. Her brown feet were bare, her supple waist, her soft round bust had known no bonds, but the straight gown that had taken the natural lines of her figure and clung to it, as the drapery of the winged goddess of victory clings to the woman beneath it. She had dark, brown eyes, and hair we call a rich auburn, that held the sun's warm rays, even in the pallid moonlight, in a reminiscent fashion. The small, imperious mouth and low brow, the aquiline nose with its delicate nostrils, the flood of warm, bashful colour that flooded her cheeks when the startled youth looked at her in amazement, all bespoke a nature too proud and too modest for her errand.

"Who am I, what do I want?"

She imitated his tone so that the young colour came to his cheek.

"Ef you don't know me, I reckon you ken fine out who I be frum——frum——Mr. Marion."

She started back into the bushes with the offended air of a tragedy queen.

John was about to dart after her, but he remembered his duty. He looked up at the window. Keene had gone back into the room.

"Keene! Keene! Asleep?" he called out, still keeping his eye on the bushes. Keene got up, after a pause, and came to the window.

"What?" he asked.

"No, nothing. I thought maybe you were asleep."

"Well, if ye did think so, I would be obleeged to ye ef ye'd keep on thinkin' so. I were asleep for the first time for many a night, en the las', I reckon."

It was the first surly word Keene had ever given him. John felt ashamed. Certainly he had no business disturbing the dreams of a man who had so little time to dream. Keene went back, and trusting to the fickleness of woman, John called softly:

"I say, just one minute. I'm short-sighted, you know; come out into the moonlight—oh, do, please."

The anxiety in his tone had the desired effect. The bushes parted again and the girl stood a few feet from before him.

"Oh," he said; "oh, it is you. I never dared think it was you after the dreadful way you treated me. How in the world did you get here? Did you know I was here? Did you come to see me?"

"I ain't got but one tongue betwixt my teeth," she answered coldly. "I karn't answer all them questions at onct. I live down in the valley miles an' miles from hyer. I walked all night. When ye spoke to me in the valley that day I didn't know ye frum a side of sole leather, an' that other Mister, he larffed, he did," she added with resentment. "I know'd ye was hyer guardin' of Keene Judd. You heard what Keene Judd did to we 'un, I reckon?"

She lifted her liquid eyes to his face awaiting an answer. John nodded; the mist began to clear. He knew too well the modesty and the rustic unapproachableness of the mountain maiden not to be puzzled and astonished at a midnight visit from Serena Hall, the most arrogant beauty in all Shene County. With what scorn she had walked away, not even vouchsafing him a look out of her untamed proud eyes, when he had ventured to offer her a treat of sweetmeats that day in the village; and how Marion had laughed at his discomfiture.

He had a boyish wish that old Marion could see her now, but that was quickly dissipated. He knew by his quick intuition, which was as sure as a divining rod, it was not love of him that brought the mountain Diana into the deep wood by moonlight.

He recollected the well-known killing of Talt Hall, Serena's father, a murder so daring and so open that in any other country the criminal would have been hanged within—well, within five years at least—if he had not proved an alibi, or become insane, or been pardoned. John remembered the law's delays and his back stiffened with renewed resolution.

John caught her as she fell.

"He shot him thar in the corn field," said Serena, "him, a pore ole man, mos' forty years ole, I reckon, an' he died in his sins."

"It air a pity Judd air got so much time to repent," she added passionately. "Likely he will git religion an' die happy an' go to glory, an' them he shot in their sins air in torment. It ain't fair," she ejaculated with fire in her eyes. "It ain't fair, I say. He shan't git religon. Air he got religion yet?" she asked suspiciously.

"Not that I know of," John hastened to answer, "I'm only here at night. I haven't talked to him about—about his execution."

"Yes, I know ye are only hyer at night. I couldn't er come (she blushed and her voice trembled; John felt a thrill pass over him) when the others were hyer, nor that Mister that larffed, an' I didn't mean 'em to know it, not anybody, so I came at night. I wanted to see him. I wanted him to know I was hyer an'—glad." She lingered on the word. "We on the mountains air afeard of Keene Judd, all but me. They air afeard of him hyer in goal, they'd be afeard of his haunt," she laughed scornfully. "They sont word they don't bar no grudge against him for shootin' my father—all but me. But I wan' to see him. I wan' to see him an' tell him jes' once how I scorns and hates him an' how I don't forgive him for shootin' thet ole man down in sight of his wife an' children. He shan't die happy," she called out in a shrill tone that woke the echoes. The uncanny light touched the bare limbs of a lightning-blighted tree. It looked like an animated ghost of vengeance, beckoning with its bony arms.

"Hush, hush," said John, impulsively. "You needn't feel so. It's not right to cherish hatred even for our bitterest enemies."

A soft glow of enthusiasm came over him. It would be sweet to quell that proud spirit and lead it into the higher life.

"He will suffer for his sins soon enough, but not through any revenge of ours."

Unconsciously he had classed himself with her, but the "we," as it fell from his lips, had a tender tone.

"I have not one feeling of enmity to Keene Judd," he added solemnly, "although I am here to see the right done by him as well as by us."

"I shall not res' till I see him," said the girl. "They tole me he never slep' none lately, but stood up thar at the winder all night long. I wan' jes' one word with him. I wan' say jes' one word. 'Keene Judd,' I wan' say, 'you shan't git religion en go to glory while them you killed is burnin' in fire that is not quenched.'"

"No, no," urged John. "I can't let you tell him that"—he had stepped from the door, and his gun hung slack on his shoulder. "He is asleep, poor soul, for the first time in six nights. I can't wake him. It isn't right—it isn't human to wake him for you to curse him. His guard will be trebled to-morrow night—it's his last, you know, and he'll be nervous, likely; to-night he has only me, and he shall sleep. Besides——"

The girl began to sob. John was not used to hear a woman cry. His heart thumped painfully.

"Ye think—ye think I ought to furgive him; I ought to let him die happy? When he kilt the kindes', bes' old man, an' him in his sins. Oh, I karn't. I karn't."

The noble youth swayed like a young tree in a storm. All the nobility of Young John's nature rose in a leap.

"No!" he cried. "No, Serena, I am not fit to preach to you or to anybody. I am not good myself. But, oh! there is nothing so high, so holy, as forgiveness, nothing half so sweet. If only you will cast revenge out of your heart, right now—cast it out — and, instead of sending Keene Judd word you curse him, let me tell him when he wakes that you came here and sent him your pardon!"

She drew his head towards her.

As he uttered the last words he saw the girl stagger, steady herself, and almost reel.

"It hurts me, it hurts me!" she moaned, "hyer, hyer" (she tugged at her breast), "but—ef ye say I mus'—I will!"

She stretched out her arms, tottered, and John caught her as she fell, clasping him in a close embrace. Tremblingly his lips touched hers. He had not meant it, but the gesture—that unconscious gesture of outstretched arms—he could but obey it. The fair head lay heavy on his shoulder, the beautiful arms were folded about his body. How heavily she lay! Was she dead? He laid his head upon her bosom; he could not feel her breathe, but the heart—it beat tumultuously. He tried to raise her, but she was taller and even heavier than John. She lay like a stone.

"Serena," he whispered hoarsely. He could not call for aid, for her simple confidence in his protection and his secrecy had made her sacred; the other engineers were good fellows, but they would never understand; Marion would laugh, and her good name be despoiled.

"Serena! Wake, Serena!"

The girl had fallen where she stood, some ten feet from the ledge on which the gaol was built. She stirred, like a child asleep. Again he felt the sweep of her encircling arms.

"Ef ye say I mus' furgive him, ef ye say I mus' let him die in peace"—closer and closer she drew his head towards her, that in her maiden modesty she might whisper, though there were no listeners to overhear the dear confession—"ef ye says so, I reckon"—she drew a long breath—"I reckon I mus'."

Keene, who had by this time torn the bars of the window from their fastenings and stepped to the ground as lightly as a down feather floats in the air, had just snatched up John's gun, which had fallen when he rushed to Serena. For one instant he stood as a deer stands in the midst of the forest, all his senses quickened to catch some warning sound ere he bounds into the thicket. He made a quick motion of his hand towards Serena and was gone.

John never knew how long those tender circling arms bound him in an embrace that revealed to him his sudden dearness. A hot blush mounted his face and he tried to draw himself gently from her. Poor child! what had she not told in her overwhelming excitement and emotion!

Like a flash it came over him. His station, education, wealth, her poverty and ignorance. He saw the great gulf, but it was not too wide for his strong limbs to overlap in impetuous generosity.

"Serena!" he was held in a vice. "Serena, no; don't be afraid or ashamed, dear heart; I will protect you." He bent his lips to hers.

"Ye perteck me!" Serena sprang to her feet. "Me!" The moonlight streamed over her.

"Ye little miserbul weak critter." She rushed forward and pressed him down as he made a bewildered movement to rise. "Ye little mealy-mouthed preacher, ye, with your pious words en your mean actions. You perteck me? I'm Keene Judd's wife, thet's who I am. Does ye think I'd come arfter enny man but my husband? He kilt my dad because he crossed him about my merryin' him. Pick yerself up ef ye know enough. Ye gun?——"

John had got to his feet in some fashion and stood there looking from Serena to the barrel of a six-shooter held on a level with his eyes.

"Keene's got your gun, en you'd es well hunt for some uf your scatterin' brains, ye silly fool ye. Ef them partners uf yours wants to hang ennybody—they can hang ye. Ye'll have to walk down thar to wake 'm to do it, for I've got your whistle."

She brushed the long branches aside, and, like the spirit of the woods, swept out of sight into the deep forest.

"SEVEN o'clock, sir. You haven't a minute to spare."

Such were the words that aroused me from a confused dream, in which horses, silk jackets, saddles and bridles were mixed up in indescribable medley. My awakening was sudden, but at the same time complete, for the servant's first words reminded me that I had to catch the ten minutes to eight train to Alveley, and there was consequently no time to "turn over" and indulge in that extra quarter of an hour which is so acceptable under such circumstances.

A glimpse at the weather from a hastily opened casement made me feel inclined to turn into bed again, for in the dim morning light I could see prospects of a wretched day, the air being fearfully cold, while an irritating drizzle was falling sufficient to damp the ardour of an even more enthusiastic sportsman than I.

However, I had given my word to Tom Dunkerton that I would ride for him in the Alveley Open Steeplechase, so, making the best of a bad job and a hasty toilet, I hurriedly crammed a confused heap of racing-breeches, boots, saddle-cloths and odd leads, together with a favourite five-pound saddle, into a capacious saddle-bag, bolted some breakfast, and was soon off through the rain to the station.

My time happened to be some ten minutes in advance of the station clock, the train was a quarter of an hour late, and the station-master seemed to take it as a personal affront that he should have to book a passenger at such an early hour, so when at length I took my seat in the train it is scarcely surprising that I felt on anything but good terms with myself, and entertained uncomfortable apprehensions that everything would go wrong.

Nor was the mission on which I was bound a particularly satisfactory one. Full well I knew that the result of the Alveley Open Steeplechase—of little account, as it was esteemed by the sporting world at large—meant a very great deal at least to one person. My old friend and schoolfellow, Tom Dunkerton, had been having a hard time of it for some seasons past, and, having at length outrun the patience of the Jews, was obliged to "go for the gloves," and had elected to sink or swim by the success or otherwise of his mare Lavinia in the chief event of the Alveley Meeting.

A general favourite with both sexes, Tom was one of those men of whom it is said "they are nobody's enemies but their own." Generous to a fault, of blameless character in all his dealings, and associating only with the better of the county families, Tom had found it impossible to cope successfully with the chicanery and low cunning too often encountered on the turf. Yet, though year by year he found his patrimony diminishing and his estates becoming more and more encumbered, he was unable to drag himself away from its pleasures, and still kept open house in the style which had made the hospitality of Dunkerton Hall a byeword.

"Molethorpe Junction! Change here for Alveley and all stations for the North."

My musings were thus rudely awakened, and I was quickly on the platform with my luggage. There were no signs, however, of the train which I had expected to find waiting to convey us on our journey, so I duly made inquiries on the matter.

"How long will the train be which goes to Alveley, porter?"

"What! Do you mean to say that it doesn't wait for the train from the West?"

"No, sir; though that generally gets in first. You see, it was twenty minutes late this morning, sir; and that's how you missed it."

"What time's the next, then?"

"Nothing for Alveley afore twelve o'clock now, sir."

Here was a nice mess to be in. I had so arranged matters that I should be at Alveley before that time, and thus have had a chance of walking over the course, to which I was a stranger. The next train would not land me at the station until 1.30 p.m., the time fixed for the first race, while the Open Steeplechase—in which I was to ride—was set an hour and a half later, so that I was left a very narrow margin, especially if, as had been my experience hitherto, the train failed to keep its time.

However, there was nothing to do but to grin and bear it and heap objurgations on railways in general and branch lines in particular.

Time passes somehow, even at a third-class railway station minus a refreshment room and every other resource of civilisation, and by the time I had read every word of my newspaper, and diligently studied the advertisements on the station hoardings, we were en route again. This time we rattled along in fine style, and I mentally shook hands with myself when the train pulled up at Alveley platform at exactly the time appointed—half-past one.

I was quickly out with my bagful of leads, etc., and, in response to a "K'rect kyard, sir, who says a kyard?" from a weather-beaten individual in a fur cap, duly purchased the necessary piece of pasteboard, which was being rapidly reduced to a pulp owing to the adverse nature of the elements.

"How far to the course?" I inquired of this worthy.

"Four miles, captin'; but you can do it in three by taking the cut across the fields."

"Cut across the fields, be hanged! Do you suppose I'm going to cut across fields with this confounded bag? I suppose I can get a cab or conveyance of some kind?"

On this head I was beginning to feel just the least bit nervous. There was hardly a soul about, and going outside the station I found that whatever Alveley might be, town or village, there was no human habitation in sight, except an unimposing-looking structure labelled Railway Tavern.

I inquired for the landlord of this establishment, but again was doomed to disappointment, for both he and the landlady—and, I shrewdly suspected, most of the inhabitants of the place—had gone to the races, taking their only available vehicle with them.

"Can't I get a trap anywhere?" I inquired, despairingly, of the maid-of-all-work left in charge.

"There was some traps, sir, and 'buses met the last train, but they're all on the course by this time. You can have the wheelbarrow to take your things up in, if you can get anybody to push it."

This was evidently my last resource, so, pressing my friend the card-seller into my service with promise of considerable largesse, we started on our long trudge. It was by this time two o'clock, and as we only had an hour in which to cover the four miles, we settled into a good pace, the gentleman in the fur cap keeping up with me by means of a gait which, for want of a better word to define it, I must describe as a shuffle.

Before we had gone a quarter of a mile, however, he had had enough of it. Seated on the handle of the barrow, and wiping the perspiration from his manly brow with his greasy cap, he expressed himself as "dead beat." If he couldn't stay this easy course, how was he to do the four miles?

There was only one way out of it. I was young and in the pink of condition, so, seizing the handles, I took his place between the shafts, and started off at a steady trot, leaving the card-seller limping slowly in the rear.

According to the ancient saw it is a long lane that has no turning, but I really believed I had found one at last. However, just as my watch showed me it was five minutes to three, I came to a bend in the road, and saw the welcome flags and booths. Shouldering my bag, and shouting to my companion, who was just in sight, to look to the barrow and see me after the next race, I scrambled through a gap in the fence, and arrived on the course just as the numbers were being hoisted for the Open Steeplechase.

Making for the paddock gate, almost the first person I saw was Tom Dunkerton, his face white with despair.

"Thank Heavens you've come, Jack; I thought you were lost. Jump into your things; you haven't a moment to lose. Put Lavinia's number up, Mr. Ashton, will you, please?"

This to the clerk of the course, who, after considerable grumbling, gave the necessary instructions, and No. 9 was added to the others already in the frame. While hastily dressing I found that Goldseeker, an animal well known for his prowess in this description of race, was a raging hot favourite, good odds being laid on his proving successful.

Nor was this state of affairs altogether unjustified, for the big brown was a veritable "Triton among the minnows" in the hunter class. As a two-year-old he had run the subsequent winner of the St. Leger to half a length, and being purchased for eight hundred guineas, after winning a valuable stake at Derby, had—owing, it was supposed, to unsoundness—taken leave of the turf, only to reappear some three seasons later as a duly qualified "hunter."

The others, I found, were mostly local animals of no great pretensions, and if Tom Dunkerton's estimate of Lavinia's merits was not grossly exaggerated, I did not fear much danger from them.

"Now, then, if you're going to weigh out for this race, sharp's the word. Time's up already, and we can't keep the starter waiting all day."

"All right, Mr. Ashton. I'm ready. Put ten-eleven in the scales. His weight's ten-twelve; that's a pound for the bridle."

My mount was standing at the paddock gate, and I was not long getting into the saddle. I had not had time to take stock of her, though she had tried to shake hands with me in demonstrative fashion with her near hind leg as I was re-adjusting the girths.

"Odd's I'll take! I'll take 5 to 2! Eight to one, bar two."

Such were the shouts which greeted my ears as we emerged from the paddock, Tom being at the mare's head.

"You've got something to beat, Jack, but I know you'll do your best. I've got a pot on her, and it's all over with me if it boils over. You must ride your own race, but make the weight tell on the favourite in the last mile."

I answered him as cheerfully as possible, and commissioned him to invest a "tenner" for myself, "just for luck," as I put it.

I had to scurry to the post as quickly as possible, for I could see the white flag was up, and but for the fractiousness of a liver-coloured chestnut, who would not join his horses, I might have been left behind altogether.

A few words of remonstrance from the starter, and I was amongst the others, waiting until the vagaries of the chestnut had worn them out. At length he became more tractable, and with a "Now, turn round! Go!" from the gentleman with the scarlet emblem, we were on our journey.

By this time the drizzle and sleet with which the day began had turned to a storm of snow, and the surroundings were about as unsuitable for a steeplechase as can well be imagined. It would have been impossible for me to make the running had I wished to do so, for I knew absolutely nothing of the course, except that we had to go twice round. The snow made it a matter of impossibility to see from one fence to another, and altogether I began to feel that I should not be sorry when we had arrived at the journey's end.

My first sensation after starting was that I was riding a beautiful mover with plenty of power, and that we were progressing smoothly over ridge and furrow. The next moment, however, and my heart was in my mouth, for at the first fence Lavinia had taken off a shade too soon, and, blundering on landing, had very nearly sent me over her head.

The little mare, however, recovered herself in splendid fashion, and was soon going again, though we had now dropped last, some lengths behind the leaders. We lay in this position over the next two fences, but on the far side of the course a sound piece of grass gave an opportunity of getting on terms, which I quickly availed myself of.

The two leaders were Prospero and an Irish Birdcatcher horse, the pair taking their fences side by side, half a dozen lengths in front of Phantom and Country Boy, while I lay next, clear of the favourite, who was going great guns, the others having already come to grief.

We now came to a very nasty obstacle—a big ditch on the take-off side, with a guard-rail in front and a substantial gorse hedge on the other side. The mare took it with ever so much to spare, jumping in the air as if on a voyage to the clouds. A slight peck, a touch from the spur, and we were righted again and holding our own over the plough.

We were now nearing the water-jump in front of the stand, and, anxious to show to advantage before the spectators, the leaders quickened their pace. Not being used to taking such obstacles at this rate of speed, though clever hunters, both Prospero and the unnamed one came to grief, much to the delight of the rustics, who assuredly would have been greatly disappointed with the sport had there been no falls.

We were now reduced to a quartette. Goldseeker was still pounding away with long, easy stride, making light of his thirty-seven, while Mr. Cunningham, who had the mount, was sitting as much at his ease as if in an arm-chair. The big horse took most of his fences in his stride—a reprehensible habit, I have always thought—and seemed to be merely playing with his opponents.

My mount was still going smoothly enough, and, having acquired confidence, repeated none of the mistakes of the first round. By the determined way she laid hold of her bit I felt I might take a liberty; so, when on the back stretch the second time, I let her out, and quickly established a strong lead. Turning slightly in the shadow I saw Goldseeker quickly pass the other two, and come in pursuit.

We were now again at the open ditch, and I knew if the mare took as long over it as at the first attempt it would seriously prejudice her chance, as we now had less than half a mile to go. Consequently, racing at full pelt, I drove her at it, trusting to luck for her to rise. Crash went the binders, but we went through all right still in possession of a three lengths' lead of Goldseeker, with the others now out of sight.

Next came the turning point into the straight marked by a white flag. Come what might, I had determined to have the inside position here, and so sent the mare along for all she was worth. Mr. Cunningham was also alive to the situation, and, rapidly overhauling me, we jumped the last fence side by side. Perhaps he had underrated the little bay mare after all.

The big horse was now fairly doing his level best. He covered a tremendous amount of ground in his stride, but in this instance that quality proved a drawback, as, being on the outside, his rider was unable to hold him together at the turn, which was very sharp, thereby losing three or four lengths. This cost him the race, for though Mr. Cunningham rode a grand finish, and got to my girths, he could get no nearer, and the judge's verdict was, "Won by half a length."

On returning to weigh in my fingers were so benumbed with cold that I could not take the saddle from my horse, a duty which the trainer had to perform; but after Mr. Ashton had called out a cheery "All right," I was more than rewarded for any personal discomfort I had undergone by Tom Dunkerton's warm thanks and congratulations, and the information that he had taken me £100 to £10 about the mare.

Altogether I found that Master Tom had won between fifteen and sixteen thousand pounds, having backed the mare all over the country at starting price; and for the time his difficulties were at an end.

A PRIME DUCK

It was the third day of our ocean voyage. The City of Chester had slipped her moorings on Wednesday, but it was not until Saturday that I was positively aware of anything except the miserable lurching of the ship and my own woe-begoneness.

During that time I had persistently endeavoured to reach the deck for fresh air, and had been as invariably forced, at short intervals, to seek the seclusion which the cabin grants, so that, when I was not actually seasick, I was practically unable to use my legs or observe anything but the swaying to and fro of my overcoat as it followed, from its hook on the wall, the motions of the vessel, or the meanderings of my bag as it tobogganned across the floor.

But on Saturday I awoke with a start, and was surprised to feel such a gnawing at the pit of my stomach that I instantly rose, and finding my strength of limb increasing in proportion to my hunger made my way to the dining-room, where a few half recuperated-looking specimens sat at breakfast.

Just as I began on my second chop, a cabin door opening into the salle-à-manger closed softly, and two people (a man and a woman) slipped into a couple of vacant seats facing me.

Glancing at them I observed that the lady was remarkably fine looking, yet she carried herself with the air of an invalid. Her hair, which was short, hung in fluffy curls of golden yellow over her forehead and covered even the tips of her ears.

The man? Pah! He disgusted me at once. Seasick and a lover; horrible combination! Evidently they were on their bridal tour, and the groom's head was too unsteady to take his seat without falling over the table.

"My dear," whispered this disgusting creature, "will you have some biscuits?" He looked across the table as he spoke, and, meeting my eye, scowled.

His wife, following the direction of her husband's glance, blushed, and dropped her fringed lids modestly upon her cheeks—not, however, with a scowl.

I took a long time over that breakfast. My appetite was simply enormous, and I was repaid by catching her name (which was Laura) and his (which was Dan).

Rising with a backward glance at my charming vis-à-vis, I found my way to the ship's list of passengers. On it were recorded Mr. and Mrs. Daniel La Farge, Chicago.

On reaching the deck I found the captain and a male passenger discussing a remarkable murder and robbery which had been, for some time, creating quite a sensation, and I paused near them, for the matter was one in which I was personally concerned.

It was, in fact, this same business which had caused my hasty voyage to America, for I had received orders from headquarters the day before the City of Chester sailed to secure my berth at once, and following certain clues hunt for the missing criminal in New York, which city it was believed he had reached by a steamer of the same line a few days earlier.

"I'll bet £5," remarked the passenger, "that Delibes is still in Liverpool, near the scene of the murder. This flying to the four quarters of the earth in search of escaped criminals is all a mistake. Take the case of Longstreet, for instance——." He paused, meeting my eye, and smiled, including me in the conversation.

"Here's a man," he remarked politely, "who probably never saw a murderer or a detective in his life, but who knows what he's about. Let's have an unbiassed opinion: Where do you think one should look for the villain who, after robbing the Liverpool Bank, got away with his plunder?"

I was about to reply, when, hearing the soft rustle of a woman's garments, I turned, and beheld my handsome vis-à-vis at breakfast standing with one hand on the railing of the poop deck. She lingered as if interested, yet fearful of intruding. Daniel was not with her.

"Well," I assented, "you are right, sir, and I perfectly agree with you. The Longstreet case, which we all recall and you were about to cite, is a similar incident."

The Captain, who had been silently listening with his eye upon the fo'castle, smiled with subtle meaning.

"I'm not a betting man," said he slowly, "but I do not object to hazarding an opinion, if you like. I believe that Delibes is——," he hesitated, folded his arms and glanced down at the deck—"on the whole, I postpone my judgment as to his whereabouts."

With these words he turned on his heel and walked towards the stern of the vessel.

As the week passed and we neared the coast, I became more and more fascinated by Mrs. La Farge. There was something especially fetching in the way she eluded me, yet drew me on by a hundred witching coquetries. One evening she had gone so far as to drop her handkerchief at my feet, in passing, yet when I had picked up the delicate piece of embroidery and restored it to her—after touching it to my lips—she had thanked me coldly, and taken "Dan's" arm.

Already, against the horizon, a green strip of land was visible, and the passengers, alert and excited to catch the first glimpse of land, were all on deck.

As I stood at the mouth of the companion talking to Mr. West, the first mate, I observed the Captain descending the steps which led from the poop to the main deck to approach me.

"A word with you, Mr. Z.," said he, murmuring an apology to the mate.

"Well, sir," I enquired curiously, "what is it?"

The Captain's eyes twinkled as he flashed them upon me, exclaiming laughingly:

"You are a prime duck!"

I flushed, too angry to express my astonishment.

"It's none of my business," continued he, trenchantly, "if you choose to look down your nose and allow one of the greatest rascals living to slip through your fingers; but I would advise you to keep your weather eye open."

"What?" I exclaimed. "Whom do you mean?"

"My dear Z——," replied the Captain, "Time is money. I have none to waste. Look at me—be spry! Have we never met before——."

In the light of an awakened idea I scrutinised his face.

"Aha! I see it all! Why, you have shaved off your beard since I got you out of that row with those Italians. But this rascal? Surely you do not mean to tell me that Delibes is in the steerage——."

"Sh!" whispered the Captain, turning on his heel and whistling a tune, but glancing, at the same time, over his shoulder at someone who was leaning over the poop rail.

It was Laura La Farge.

A fresh breeze was blowing, and the yellow curls that fringed her forehead were holding high carnival. From my position below her I beheld one ringlet dance away from her temples, leaving exposed a jagged red scar.

With one bound I reached the upper deck, but I was too late, for Delibes, who realised at once that the game was up, was not a man to suffer the penalty of the law when an easier death lay within his grasp.

Seizing the clinging skirts, which impeded his motions, he darted, like a flash, towards the stern of the vessel, and, ere I could reach him, had climbed the handrail, where he hung for a moment, suspended by his hands.

Then, as I sprang forward, he loosened his hold, and dropped like a log into the foaming water below.

"A man overboard!" I yelled, while on all sides there was an echo of "A lady overboard!" Fast scurrying feet—a wild effort to rescue the suicide, and a continuous threnody from "Dan," who made a brave struggle to keep up appearances.

But Mrs. La Farge was no bungler, either in the art of drowning herself or murdering others. When we found her she (or he) had passed beyond the bars of human jurisdiction.

It only remains for me to add that "Dan" was no criminal, but merely a dummy, hired for the occasion, and that among my intimate friends (to whom this story is familiar) I still retain the sobriquet bestowed upon me by the Captain, of "A Prime Duck."

THE TENTH OF JUNE.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and Geoffrey's friend.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Bingham—An army officer, and cousin of Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love of Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook.

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger. Sir Arthur on learning from his lawyer that his cousin, Captain Bingham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Bingham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty. On the tenth of June, Geoffrey goes to Wales, and is followed by Kuttapani, who attacks him in a lonely spot and leaves him for dead. Geoffrey, however, recovers, and tracks him to a house in Westbourne Park, named Lancaster Villa, which transpires to be the headquarters of the Hindoo. Geoffrey asks the General for Leila's hand, but is refused, and goes abroad. On his return he meets the Rajah outside Lancaster Villa.

CHAPTER XVII.

Friend or Enemy?

The Rajah stood motionless as a statue.

"You are surprised to see me," said Geoffrey, with a grim smile.

The Rajah was evidently disconcerted. Yet his inborn dignity did not desert him. His embarrassment showed itself only in his perfect silence and the rigidity of his face.

"No doubt you believed that I was dead?"

Amavati's face changed.

"Dead? No. Why should I suppose that you were dead? Have you been ill? You do not look in bad health."

"You had not heard that I was dead—murdered?"

"I? No! What has happened? I only returned three days ago from Paris, and have heard no news."

"If you will walk a little way with me I will tell you what happened to me," said Geoffrey, who did not care to remain any longer so close to the Hindoo's house.

After a moment's hesitation, Amavati signified his assent; and without so much as a glance at Lancaster Villa he joined Geoffrey, and the two men walked down the road together.

"First, let me ask," said Geoffrey, "how is that servant of yours, Kuttapani? Is he still with you?"

"Kuttapani?"

The Rajah had stood still, and was looking at the Englishman with wondering eyes.

"Yes. Don't you remember his name? He was with you at Seacombe Towers, in the capacity of cook, I believe."

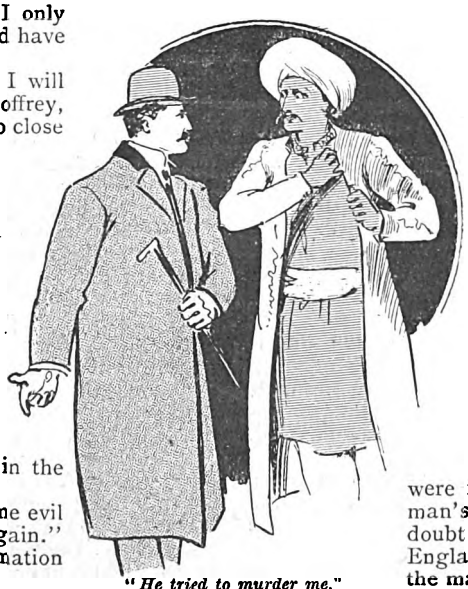
"Kuttapani was lost in London. Some evil happened to him. We never saw him again."

"Indeed! Doubtless you gave information to the police?"

"No. It would have been useless. If he was dead, it could have done no good. If he left us of his own accord, it was to return to India. Let him go."

"He may have returned to India. I hope he has. But you say you lost him in London?"

"When we arrived in London he could not be found."



"He tried to murder me."

"Did you not know that he stayed behind at Bristol?"

"That was most likely, as the train only stopped once on the way, unless he did come to London and hide himself there. But why do you ask so many questions about him? How does he concern you?"

It was not Kuttapani but the Rajah that was the real subject of Geoffrey's questions. He greatly desired to know whether the Rajah was privy to that attempt on his life or not—whether, in a word, he was to look upon him as a friend or a foe. And hitherto he had not been able to gather from Amavati's manner anything that had enabled him to come to a decision on the point.

True, the Indian seemed to be speechless with surprise at the first sight of him; but that might possibly be mere natural astonishment at meeting him in a totally unexpected place. He had also seemed amazed at being questioned about his missing servant; but that was perhaps natural enough. After that first exclamation of surprise, he had answered every query in a very natural, straightforward kind of way.

"My interest in your servant is easily explained," said Geoffrey. "The day after you and I parted at Bristol he tried to murder me."

As he spoke these words the Englishman looked straight into the Hindoo's face. But he could learn nothing there. The start of surprise, the look, half of incredulity, half of horror, were perfectly natural. "This man is innocent," said Geoffrey to himself, "or he is the greatest actor living."

"He—tried—to murder you?"

"And very nearly succeeded. It was, you remember, the Tenth of June. You had recommended me to keep myself secluded on that day, doubtless with good reason. I determined to follow your advice. I went to a secluded mountainous district in Wales.

"On the afternoon of the Tenth of June, your servant, who had secretly followed me, fell upon me from behind, and very nearly succeeded in killing me. I fell into a pool, and managed to make him believe that I was drowned. I followed him to London; but, unfortunately, lost sight of him when we reached town. Since then I have been in America. I wished to conceal from my enemies the fact that I was alive."

"You did wisely," said the Rajah.

"It seems to me you take this matter very coolly!" cried Geoffrey. "This wretched man was your servant. Where did you engage him? What were his antecedents? Who recommended him to you?"

"My secretary might perhaps be able to answer these questions," said Amavati coldly. "I cannot. And I do not see how I can avenge the outrage. If we were in Nagore, and Kuttapani—is that the man's name?—if he were taken, I might no doubt have him executed. But we are in England. I have no power here; and, besides, the man has escaped."

Geoffrey made no reply. Apparently the Rajah was unconscious of Geoffrey's suspicions; and the young Englishman shrank from charging him with complicity in Kuttapani's crime. Yet he could not forbear saying something.

"You are going to Seacombe Towers next month, I believe?"

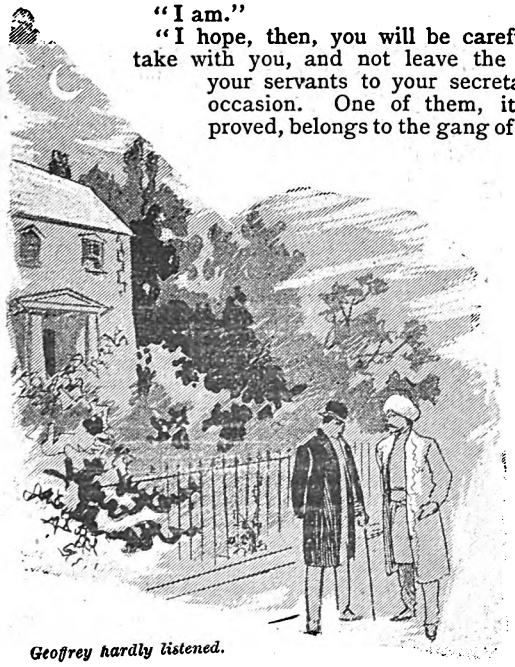
"I am."

"I hope, then, you will be careful who you take with you, and not leave the selection of your servants to your secretary on this occasion. One of them, it has been proved, belongs to the gang of murderers; and I know that the General has special reason to fear them. I cannot help telling you that I regard it as an unfortunate coincidence that you are to be under the General's roof on the fatal day."



Geoffrey hardly listened.

During this speech the Rajah had drawn himself up to his full height, and he was now regarding his companion with a cold, proud gaze, in which there was more of contempt than anger.

"Perhaps you think I would procure the assassination of my host?"

"I have not said so. Nor do I think so. But I distrust your servants—and with reason."

"Sir, the warning was not needed; but it shall not be neglected."

"Can you not choose some other date for your visit?"

For answer the Hindoo darted a strange look at Geoffrey.

"Would it surprise you to know," said he, "that one whom I believe to be the General's enemy has presumed to make the same suggestion to me?"

"The General's enemy? Who is he?"

"I cannot tell you."

"If you were a true friend of the General's you would tell me, and you would tell him too!" burst out Geoffrey. "You know that danger threatens him; yet you will not denounce his would-be murderer, nor even give him warning!"

"You are mistaken," said the Rajah, with the same air of cold, proud indifference. "Sir Arthur knows that his life is in danger every Tenth of June. He has long known it. His enemies—your enemies—would not be turned from their purpose if I were to denounce one, against whom I have no direct evidence. And he can do no more for his own protection than he has already done. I can do no more for his safety than I have done already—or, rather, it is not in my power to do anything."

Geoffrey hardly listened to these protestations. His mind was busy with conjectures as to the meaning of what he had just heard. Supposing Amavati to be speaking the truth, why should the conspirators wish the Rajah to be absent from Seacombe Towers on the coming Tenth of June? Did not the very expression of such a desire on their part betoken danger to the General or to Leila, or to both of them on that day?

The two men had turned, and were now walking, almost unconsciously, in the direction of Lancaster Villa. Amavati, as well as Geoffrey, was silent.

"I wish to ask you one question," said the Rajah, at length. "You need not answer unless you choose. Is the young lady, the daughter of Sir Arthur, promised to you in marriage?"

Geoffrey gave a short, bitter laugh.

"No," he said.

"Is she promised to that Captain, her cousin, or to any other man?"

"So far as I know, she is not."

"If she were, I might make some excuse to Sir Arthur, and give up my visit. But since it is otherwise, I hope to persuade her father to give her to me. Therefore I will go to his house as we had arranged."

"Could you not alter the date?"

"No, I have other visits to pay; and I leave the country finally in August."

"Why should you think of denying yourself the pleasure of this visit?" Geoffrey was tempted to ask.

"Because you were unjust enough to suspect me," said the Hindoo coldly; "and it is possible that the General may suspect me also. But since my purpose may yet be accomplished, I will not allow myself to be turned aside by your suspicions—of which you ought to be ashamed." This was said in the cold, even tone which the Rajah had used throughout.

"Ashamed!" cried Geoffrey. "If it were not that I can hardly believe that a man of your rank and character could lend himself to such a plot, my suspicions would be something like certainties. Not only does your servant, who could have no personal malice against me, try to murder me, but I find you, alone, and on foot, haunting the very neighbourhood in which the murderer was last heard of. And what is more, I find you in the act of entering the house which was, and I believe still is, inhabited by the man who tried to poison me two years ago."

Geoffrey had purposely kept this parting shot for the last; and he looked keenly into the Hindoo's face that he might see the effect of it. Amavati's habitual gravity was not disturbed; his face was rigid as that of a statue; yet there was a something, a marked avoidance of the Englishman's eye, an evident effort at self-control, which told its own tale. And, above all, he did not trust himself to utter a word. Geoffrey was determined to taunt him into speaking.

"I think you will admit that these things would be enough to justify suspicions in the minds of most men," he said.

"I know you suspect me," said the Hindoo calmly. "It does not greatly concern me. You may think what you choose."

"I have little doubt," said Geoffrey, stung by the cool indifference of the man, "I have little doubt that Sir Arthur Chetwynd will see the thing from the same point of view as I do, when I mention the full circumstances to him."

"That I would stain my soul with treachery like this."

The Rajah's calmness vanished as if by magic. He turned half round, and grasped his companion by the arm.

"No!" he said, in a low, earnest whisper, "do not do that. Do not tell Sir Arthur that you have seen me here. He, too, would interpret my actions wrongly. You would fill his mind with the most unjust, the basest suspicions.

You cannot really believe that I, a prince of royal blood, would stain my soul with treachery like this?—treachery against my host, against the father of the lady who may be my bride!"

"No; I cannot believe it," said Geoffrey; and yet—if your highness would explain——"

"I cannot explain further than this—that I may have occasion to use these men as my tools. I will not permit them to attack Sir Arthur."

"You wish to make them your tools; they may succeed in making use of you," thought Geoffrey to himself, but he did not utter the thought aloud.

"You will not tell Sir Arthur where you saw me to-night?" demanded the Rajah.

Geoffrey hesitated a moment. Then he reflected that he might put the General effectually on his guard without revealing the precise fact which had seemed to him so suspicious; and he answered, "No, I will not."

"I see you trust me, and I thank you," said the Rajah in his old proud manner.

By this time they were not far from the Hindoo's head-quarters.

"Are you going to that house—the house of the assassins?" said Geoffrey significantly.

"Yes, I am," was the answer.

"Then I must trust you not to betray my secret. As I told you, my enemies believe me to be dead. In that belief lies my safety; for it is war to the knife between these men and me. If you reveal to them the fact that I am alive, you seal my death-warrant—at least, you make it certain that they will make a third attempt on my life; and I could hardly hope to escape a third time. May I rely on you not to mention my name to them?"

In his turn the Rajah seemed to hesitate.

"I will say nothing," he said at last; and without another word he was gone.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GEOFFREY PLAYS THE SPY TO GOOD PURPOSE.

IT was with very mixed feelings that Geoffrey walked slowly back to his rooms, after parting with the Rajah. He had not been able to come to any decision on the question whether Amavati was to be trusted or not. In spite of appearances he was inclined to trust to the prince's honour, and under ordinary circumstances he would have done so without hesitation; but the matter was not one in which he ought to run any risk.

Sometimes he felt tempted to regret that he had not gone into the empty greenhouse, on the chance of overhearing what passed between the Rajah and the Hindoos who inhabited Lancaster Villa; but at the time he had shrunk from doing so. Considering what had passed between Amavati and himself, it had seemed like an act of treachery. Later he consoled himself with the thought that he had lost nothing through his honourable scruple.

Without another word he was gone.

Even if the Hindoos had held their conversation in the room at the back of the house, it was certain that they would talk in Hindustani, of which language Geoffrey only understood a few words. He wished now that he had gone to India, instead of to America, and learned Hindustani; but it was too late to repair that error.

"Where is Lancaster Villa?"

For some days Geoffrey did nothing beyond writing to Sir Arthur Chetwynd, advising him to be doubly on his guard, since he had reason to know that the Rajah's conduct was not free from suspicion.

Bitterly did he regret that the foolish promise he made to the Hindoo prevented his speaking more plainly; but he did not by any means feel sure that if he had told the General all he knew it would have made any difference. The old Anglo-Indian would have required not suspicion merely, but the strongest proof of intended treachery, before he would have consented to shut his door in the face of an invited guest.

That which chiefly perplexed Geoffrey was the absence of any indication as to what his enemies' plans were, or what steps he could take to secure the General's safety. He held one or two consultations with his friend Linton; but these conferences led to no result. The Hindoos were working, if at all, underground. Nothing, apparently, could be done till they chose to emerge into the light of day.

One evening, not long after his encounter with the Rajah, Geoffrey, following a vague impulse, walked out in the direction of Lancaster Villa. The evening was gloomy, and it was nearly dark.

As he passed along one of the more frequented thoroughfares, a voice fell on his ear that he thought he recognised. He turned his head sharply round. A stout man, who had evidently just alighted from a hansom, was squabbling with the cabman over the fare. Geoffrey drew a few steps nearer. He had not been mistaken. It was Captain Byngham.

The dispute was suddenly ended by the Captain turning on his heel and walking down a side street, while the cabman, grumbling and cursing, put his horse in motion, and slowly disappeared.

Geoffrey hardly knew whether he ought to speak to Sir Arthur's cousin. He had a strong, natural antipathy for the man; yet it seemed unneighbourly to let him pass without accosting him, since they had been on quasi-intimate terms at Seacombe Towers. "Besides," thought Geoffrey, "he may be able to give me some news of the General."

He hurried after the Captain, and had nearly overtaken him, when he saw Byngham suddenly pause. He had met an errand-boy, and stopped him, with the question—

"Where's Lancaster Villa?"

A kind of nervous horror stole over Geoffrey Dundas, as these common-place words fell on his ears. Was he dreaming? What could this Yorkshire squire want with those crafty Hindoos? What kind of net could they be spreading for the General's feet, that caused them to summon first one and then another of the old veteran's friends to their aid?

At first it did not occur to Geoffrey to suspect any sinister motive on Byngham's part. It was not until the Captain had moved on, and Geoffrey found himself unconsciously following him, that the question forced itself into his mind. Can the Hindoos have been using Byngham as a spy upon the General's movements? Is he coming here to report to them?

Even then he did not think of Byngham as being consciously a traitor. He imagined that the Hindoos had found some way of hoodwinking the Captain; he did not suppose for a moment that the Captain knew of the existence of a plot against his kinsman.

It seemed, therefore, to Geoffrey that it would be a good thing to question Byngham, and put him on his guard; and he was in the act of mending his pace to overtake him, when it struck him that it might be as well to delay speaking to the Captain until he returned from visiting the Hindoos. It might be of the greatest importance to learn what questions the conspirators had been asking, and what information they had obtained.

"Possibly," thought Geoffrey, "this may lead to my discovering the manner as well as the time of their attack. Fortune has favoured me for once."

He therefore allowed Byngham to enter the gate leading to Lancaster Villa without making any effort to detain him; and he began slowly to pace up and down the road, so that he might not miss him when he returned.

As he sauntered to and fro in the empty roadway, fresh thoughts, unpleasant thoughts, came into his mind. He remembered the expression which the General's face had worn when he said in answer to a question of his own, "Captain Byngham is not the sort of man I would choose for my son-in-law." There must surely have been a disagreement of some kind between the two men.

"Supposing," said Geoffrey to himself, "that Byngham proposed to Leila and was rejected, or suppose the General forbade the match, that might stir up bad blood between them. I rather think the Captain is a vindictive kind of fellow . . . . It is very odd that he should be consorting with the General's enemies."

Following this came a fresh wave of suspicion. He felt that he could not trust the Captain to give him a true account of what was passing in that silent house. He might very well refuse to answer any questions on the subject. "And then," Geoffrey asked himself, "what should I do? What must I think?"

As the minutes passed, and Byngham did not return, Geoffrey became more and more uneasy, till at last he could stand it no longer. An inward voice seemed to be calling on him to act, instead of waiting there in the faint hope of being able to induce Captain Byngham to be frank with him.

"Why should I not try to overhear their conversation?" something whispered, as it were, in his ear.

At first he repelled the suggestion, as an honourable man would be sure to do. But it recurred to him again and again.

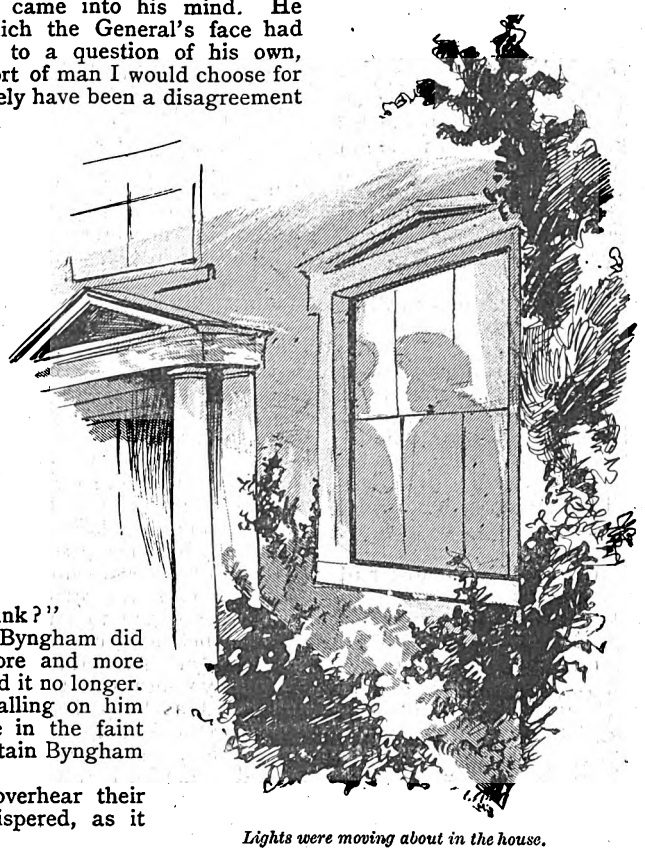
"Why," urged this persistent monitor—"Why should I allow a scruple, natural and proper enough under ordinary circumstances, to hinder my trying to save the General's life? If this Byngham has not gone over to the side of Sir Arthur's enemies, why should he be visiting them? The Rajah might have twenty good reasons for wishing to call upon his fellow-countrymen. I can conceive of no such reason in Byngham's case. And now I remember, he seemed to be on anything but friendly terms with the Hindoos who were at Seacombe Towers. He must be up to some rascality, and the sooner I find out what it is the better."

This last thought decided him. He walked rapidly to the gate leading to Chester Villa, the house which adjoined Lancaster Villa. It did not strike him as curious that the gate was unlocked. He was proceeding up the garden path, when he suddenly stopped short in consternation.

Lights were moving about in the house which he had supposed to be empty. He cautiously drew a few steps nearer. Some of the windows were fitted with curtains and blinds. There was no doubt about it. The house was inhabited. The house-agent, who had promised that he should have the first refusal of Chester Villa, had let it without informing him.

What was to be done? Go back to the road, and wait there for Byngham, or push his way on to the conservatory, at the risk of being locked up as a housebreaker? Geoffrey hardly took a second to decide. Keeping as much as possible in the shadow of the laurels, he made his way round to the back of the house.

Here all was quiet. Oddly enough, there was no light in the kitchen windows. Geoffrey moved slowly forward to the door of the conservatory, and felt for the broken pane. It was there. He opened the door and went in. The dim reflection from the glass roof, showed him that the shelves were all but empty. It seemed as if no one had been there since his last visit, nearly twelve months before.



Lights were moving about in the house.

Hardly had he began to move along the narrow passage, when the sound of voices on the other side of the wooden partition became audible. Rapidly, yet without the least noise, Geoffrey moved to the spot, from which he had once before gazed into the interior of the Hindoos' dwelling.

He mounted to the required height, and found that when he bent his head forward till it rested on the partition, he could hear distinctly the words spoken. He could distinguish the voices easily. One was that of Byngham. His heart gave a great throb when he recognised the other voice. It was that of Chunder Sen!

"You see, you can hardly fail to win the lady's heart," said the Hindoo, in his soft silky tones. "Common gratitude would make her willing to marry you. You become her protector. You rescue her from a position of the greatest danger, at the risk, apparently, of your life."

"That's all very well," broke in the gruff voice of the Englishman, "and I don't deny that it sounds all right as far as it goes. But you forget that what is wanted is her father's consent. Without that I don't want to marry the girl—at least, it would hardly be worth my while, as she would lose all the money."

"My good sir, I forget nothing. You have overlooked the most important result of all. You and the lady are thrown together under circumstances of—of what shall I say?—of great delicacy, in a foreign country, with no one of your friends near. There is nothing to prevent you keeping her there as long as you wish. You may practically compel her to marry you; and of course, for the sake of the lady's reputation, and to prevent a scandal, the trustees, as you call them, will gladly give their consent."

"The trustees! Why do you say the trustees? As long as Sir Arthur lives, it is for him to give or withhold his consent."

"True. Well; let us say the General. The same motives would apply to him—gratitude for saving his daughter, and the wish to prevent anything like a breath of scandal approaching her name."

"The General is not so easy a person to deal with."

"I think you may rely on it that he will give you no trouble."

Geoffrey's blood ran cold as he heard these words. Did Bungham attach the same sinister meaning to them? Apparently not, for his next words were spoken in the same cool, unconcerned tone as before.

"I shall need some men to help me."

"It is not at all necessary. You have nothing to do but hire a house——"

"What's that?" cried Bungham, sharply.

That was a curious, rasping sound on the other side of the partition.

Geoffrey, in his anxiety to catch every word that was uttered, had bent forward till his head and hands rested on the lower edge of the aperture in the partition.

The narrow shelf on which he stood, was at some little distance from the wall, and in his eagerness to hear all that was said, he had forgotten that his footing was rather precarious. He had, in fact, slightly over-balanced himself; his hands had slipped, and made a scraping noise on the wooden surface. His heart leaped, so to speak, into his mouth, and he remained perfectly still.

"There's a hole up there!" he heard Bungham exclaim.

"My dear sir," replied Chunder Sen, "you may make your mind perfectly easy. The house next door is empty—or rather, it is in the occupation of our friends, some of whom fancied that we were liable to be overlooked by anyone who might take it. They, however, cannot understand a word of English, so that even if one of them happened to be in the adjoining conservatory, which is most unlikely——"

"But the noise! I distinctly heard a sound, as of a something rubbing against the wall, just over our heads. You must have heard it."

"Yes, I heard it. It must have been a mouse or a rat."

"All the same, I mean to have a peep through that hole in the wall."

Geoffrey had not moved, hoping that the conspirators would go on with their conversation. But now he gave himself up for lost. He heard the Captain spring from his seat, and begin dragging a light table, or some other article of furniture, towards the partition.

What was to be done?

To get out of the greenhouse in time was impossible. There was no time to think, much less to act.

Suddenly he heard a crash.

The table to which Bungham had trusted his weight had overturned.

"What's that?"

In another instant Geoffrey had softly descended to the floor, and was moving swiftly but silently to the door.

Gently he turned the handle, and crossed the threshold. But he had hardly taken three steps from the conservatory than he went back, closed the door, and passing his hand through the broken pane, turned the key in the lock. Then he retreated to a thick clump of bushes that grew close by, and waited.

In less than half a minute, a soft step was heard on the gravel; and Geoffrey, peering out from his hiding-place, saw the portly form of the Rajah's secretary come round the corner of the house. Chunder Sen went up to the conservatory, and tried the door. Then, apparently, he discovered the broken pane, for Geoffrey heard him open the door, and go inside. In a minute or two he re-appeared, locked the door behind him, and returned by the way he had come.

Saw the portly form of the Rajah's secretary.

He waited just long enough to give the Hindoo time to make his way back to Lancaster Villa, and once more stole cautiously into the conservatory.

But now no voices fell upon his listening ears. All was dark and silent as the grave. He waited some time; but not a sound was to be heard. In his desperation, Geoffrey tried to get into the adjoining house, Chester Villa, by the French window opening into the conservatory; but it was securely fastened.

There was no more that he could do. He left the conservatory, once more locking the door behind him, and went round to the front of the house.

In one window a faint light burned; the others were dark. A thick privet hedge separated the front gardens of the two houses; and it suddenly occurred to Geoffrey that if there happened to be a similar hedge on the other side of the front garden belonging to Lancaster Villa, he might possibly, by standing behind it, catch a word or two of what might pass between Bungham and the Secretary when they parted.

Geoffrey went round to the other side of Lancaster Villa, and found, as he had expected, that a hedge separated the front garden from the ground belonging to the house on the further side. That house was occupied; but Geoffrey was beyond caring for a trifle of that kind. Only, he hoped that the people who lived in it did not keep a dog. Fortunately they did not; and Geoffrey was able to take up his station within two yards of the street door of Lancaster Villa.

For fully a quarter of an hour Geoffrey waited there, in perfect silence. He heard ten o'clock strike from a neighbouring church-tower; and shortly afterwards the rattle of a door-chain was heard, and the door of Lancaster Villa was softly opened.

Listening intently, Geoffrey could just make out the low tones of the Secretary's voice, as he whispered—

"Remember what I told you."

"Oh, I'll remember. The Tenth of June. That's it, isn't it?"

"Hush!"

And, to Geoffrey's intense disappointment, the Hindoo drew the Englishman back, inside the door, as if to give him some parting instructions. It was impossible to hear another word.

A few seconds later the door was opened again; the Captain said "Good-night," descended the steps, and strode down the garden path and out into the roadway, banging the gate behind him. Little did he imagine, as he walked rapidly along towards the heart of London, that Geoffrey Dundas was quietly following him, not fifty yards in the rear.

CARRIE'S BLUNDER

"I LOVE her, mother," cried Guion Esterhall.

He was not, in a general way, much of a talker. Consequently, when he spoke, his words had the weight of sense and rarity. But Mrs. Esterhall, the fine old lady who sat erect before the fire, was too much excited to consider all this.

"The wife of my son, Guion," said she, "should be a lady, born and bred—not one of those girls who have to fight the world until all gentleness, grace, and unselfishness are ground out of them. No, I can never give my consent!"

The young man smiled slightly.

"Mother," said he, "the diamond itself hardly possesses its true financial value until the facets are ground with much friction."

"Humph!" said Mrs. Esterhall. "No one is talking of diamonds."

"I may bring her to see you, mother?"

Mrs. Esterhall shook her head.

"I have no desire to receive her," said she. "But, Guy, here are the tickets for the Lyceum to-night. Carrie Chippendale has promised to accompany me—of course, you will be on hand at half-past seven to be our escort?"

"If you wish it, mother."

The old lady smiled to herself when Guion was gone.

"A little management," she thought, "a little judicious firmness, and Guy will get over this boyish fancy of his. The idea of a shop-girl for my daughter-in-law—for Mrs. Guion Esterhall! I think the lad must have taken leave of his senses."

And in her secret heart she rejoiced with an exceeding great rejoicing when Miss Chippendale arrived that evening, got up in the most elaborate style.

"If we are to have a private box," said Miss Chippendale, buttoning the seventeenth button of her glove, "one may as well go in full dress, don't you know."

"My dear, you are looking lovely," said Mrs. Esterhall approvingly.

Miss Chippendale was a sort of human camellia—fair, graceful, and serene—with big, expressionless blue eyes, cherry-red lips, flax-gold hair, drawn in fluffy crimps over her forehead, and an unchanging Society smile perpetually about her lips.

She had been highly educated, and she was destined by her parents to make a brilliant match. The Chippendales belonged to the upper ten—that is to say, they had never done any work, and had always spent a great deal of money. And Mrs. Esterhall had decided that Carrie Chippendale was the very wife for her son.

If only she could convert Guion to the same opinion.

Guion Esterhall was exceedingly courteous to Miss Chippendale that evening, but not a whit more so than he was to his own mother. The old lady was somewhat disappointed.

"But never mind," she said to herself, "one must have patience."

She went shopping the next day, to match a shade of Berlin wool, to buy some lace flounces, and to decide on new portières for her drawing-room down at Esterhall Manor. At two o'clock she experienced, not hunger, but a ladylike sensation that "tired nature" needed some sort of "sweet restoration."

"I will go into Maricotta's," she thought.

Maricotta's was full, as it generally was at that time of the day; but presently the old lady succeeded in obtaining a seat in a curtained angle, where the waiter took her order for a chicken-salad and a cup of tea. Just then she heard a clear, low voice on the other side of the curtain, as a party settled themselves at a reserved table—Miss Chippendale's soft, well-modulated tones.

"Oh, yes, Irving was very fine," said Carrie. "Oysters, please—stew for one and fritters for two and three cups of Vienna chocolate, nicely frothed, waiter. But all the same I nearly died of ennui. The old lady is the most dreadful bore you ever knew, and Guy is a regular prig. Handsome, you know, and very talented, of course; but one doesn't want to be on full dress parade as to one's brains the whole time. He isn't half as nice as Freddie Fortune—only poor dear Fred hasn't a penny to bless himself with, and papa looks thunder-clouds at me whenever he calls. But once I'm married, it——"

A chorus of well-bred giggling interrupted Carrie's words. Mrs. Esterhall rose hurriedly from her seat, grasped her gloves and eye-glasses, and made all haste out of the restaurant. When the waiter came with the chicken-salad and the tea, he found his customer gone. The unconscious Miss Chippendale and her friends enjoyed their Vienna chocolate and oysters very much indeed.

Mrs. Esterhall decided to return to the manor at once. Carrie Chippendale's graceful treachery had affected her more than she had deemed possible; and leaving a hastily written note to explain to Guion that she had altered her plans, she took the late express, which reached Clevedon Junction at nine, there connecting with a branch train for Esterhall Station. She was travelling alone, as her maid remained to pack up the last things, and follow her the next day.

There had been a heavy snowfall, the night had settled down dark and tempestuous, and the train was behind time. At last it came to a full stop. Mrs. Esterhall started from a doze, and looked anxiously around her.

"Ten o'clock!" someone said, consulting a watch. "Why, guard," as the man's head appeared at the window, "we are due at Clevedon at five minutes before nine!"

"Yes, I know, sir," spoke the official, "but the line is all blocked, and the T— Express is overdue at this point. We're waiting here for the signal to move on."

"And what's to keep us from waiting all night?" petulantly inquired the old gentleman.

"Nothing sir— unless the express comes along."

Mrs. Esterhall began to be a little frightened.

"Guard," she said, "is there any danger of a collision?"

"No, ma'am—not as long as we are on this siding."

Slowly the minutes dragged themselves by, gradually lengthening into hours. One or two of the more adventurous spirits among the passengers got out, peered into the darkness—flecked only by the driving snow—and then got in again with the customary uncomplimentary comments on the railway management. Mrs. Esterhall was nervous, and unaccustomed to travel alone. She began to cry softly behind her veil.

"Ah!" she thought, "if ever I live to get safe home again, I'll stay there. I'll never tempt Providence again on these night journeyings."

On the opposite side of the compartment two young girls were seated—the one pale-faced and rather plain, as Mrs. Esterhall had already noticed, the other a brilliant young brunette, with soft hazel eyes, peachy cheeks, and wavy dark-brown hair brushed carelessly back from a low, broad forehead. Presently the latter bent forward towards Mrs. Esterhall, and asked in a soft, sympathetic voice:

Digitized by Google

"Are you ill, madam?"

"N—no!" stammered the old lady, quite forgetful of her Society dignity. "Only I am so faint and weary. I expected to dine at home long before this hour; and I took almost nothing to eat before I started."

"I have some nice chicken sandwiches in my bag," suggested the pretty girl. "My aunt insisted on my taking them, although I dined heartily before leaving home; and I have a little spirit lamp with every convenience for making a cup of good, strong tea as well. If you will allow me to prepare it for you——"

Mrs. Esterhall was a genuine tea-maniac. A new brightness came into her eyes at this suggestion.

"You are very kind," said she. "But you will want it yourself?"

"No," smiled the girl. "I don't care for tea. But my kind old aunt would put the things in. Now I am glad she did so."

In five minutes Mrs. Esterhall had eaten and drunk, and felt infinitely better. How it happened she did not question herself, but she presently found herself reclining comfortably with her head on a pillow improvised out of the folded blanket shawl that belonged to the young girl; and, mingled with her drowsy reflections, came the soft, low murmurs of the sweet-eyed brunette, who had changed her seat and that of her companion to the one directly opposite Mrs. Esterhall, and was talking almost in a whisper.

"No, I am not going back; and I do not intend to communicate my address to anyone."

"Not even to him?"

"No, not even to him."

"But he loves you, dear."

"Yes; and that is the very reason I am determined to create no dissension between him and his friends. Perhaps he will forget me."

"He will never do that."

"But at least I shall feel that I have done my duty," said the hazel-eyed girl firmly.

"I shall love him to the end of his days, but I shall not have ruined his future."

"And all this," cried the companion, "out of deference to the whims of an old woman whom you have never seen!"

"Out of deference to his mother, Alice," gently corrected the first speaker.

"What a quixotic notion," dreamily mused Mrs. Esterhall. "But she has an excellent idea of duty, this dark-eyed little girl?"

"That is you, Effie, all over!" said the friend. "You always are effacing yourself in favour of someone else. Here you are giving all your tea and sandwiches to a person you have never heard of, and giving up the man you love and who loves you, because——"

"Because it is my duty," said Effie. "Please, Alice, don't let us discuss the matter any longer. It is because I love Guy that I am willing to sacrifice everything for his sake."

"Guy! Bless my soul! Guy!" thought Mrs. Esterhall, sitting suddenly up. "But, of course, there are other Guys than mine in the world."

Just then there was a tremble of the frozen ground under them; a roar and rush of lighted carriages passed them.

"The express at last!" shouted the choleric old gentleman, bobbing up in his seat like an india-rubber ball.

On moved the train at last, creaking and groaning like some monster serpent in pain. Mrs. Esterhall roused herself, and leaned towards the hazel-eyed girl.

"My dear," she said between the throbs of the engine, "is it Guy Esterhall that you are speaking of?"

The girl started and coloured. She could not repress a cry of surprise.

"Yes? I thought so. Come over here and sit by me. I am his mother, and I want to talk to you."

It was two o'clock when they reached Esterhall station, but the closed carriage was waiting for them, with hot foot-warmers and about half a ton of fur cloaks and wrappings. And Effie Dallas stepped into the luxurious conveyance with Mrs. Esterhall, for the old lady had insisted on taking Effie home with her to the manor.

"She is such a contrast in every way to that selfish, cold-hearted Chippendale girl," said Mrs. Esterhall—"I'll telegraph to Guion at once. Really it does seem as if there was a special Providence in our train being kept so long waiting for the express to pass."

As if there is not a "special Providence" in everything that happens in this world of ours!

A Mysterious Clerk

AN advertisement of the following tenor appeared in one of the daily journals of a provincial town some years since:—

"ACCOUNTANT.—The services of an accomplished and competent person are desired by the advertiser to take charge of the books and correspondence of a flourishing business. Liberal salary and permanent position is offered to one with proper credentials. Address,——"

A hundred candidates presented themselves at the establishment of Mr. Corlis, and among the competitors there came a modestly attired person, who, more than the others, seemed, at first sight, acceptable to the proprietor.

The address of this applicant seemed quiet and pleasant. His whole appearance that of an earnest, well-disposed man, who was desirous to get along in the world.

He brought with him, and presented to Mr. Corlis, a few brief letters of recommendation from persons residing in London, and exhibited a draft for a limited sum upon a responsible banking house in the town. His story was simple and straightforward, and his manners were altogether prepossessing. He wrote a fair business hand; his credentials proved satisfactory to the not over-cautious Mr. Corlis, and he was engaged.

Ernest Maywood—for thus the applicant signed his name—proved a model clerk. He must have been some thirty years of age when he entered the employ of Mr. Corlis. He might have been five years younger, perhaps. He reaped the experience of forty, at least, for he was cunning in accounts, and his knowledge of the ramifications of debt and credit was extraordinary.

His varied qualifications were quickly brought into requisition, and his employer very soon came to esteem him for his accuracy in mercantile matters, as well as for the every-day goodness of character that marked his continually upright and honest course of conduct.

Mr. Corlis had a daughter, his only child, in whom were centred all his hopes. The father thought he saw in the character of his new clerk business qualities most desirable, and he believed him to be a man of integrity and worth; and at the end of a twelvemonth he secretly determined upon bringing about an intimacy between Ernest and his daughter, with a view to making him his partner in trade at the fitting moment, and subsequently, if possible, to uniting his daughter with him in marriage.

Maywood had once or twice been the guest of his employer at dinner, where he had been introduced to the fair and agreeable Miss Corlis, and an evening or two had been passed by him at her father's house; but nothing occurred to offer the parent a hope that his employé had been affected in any wise by his daughter's charms.

Thus the months passed quietly by, Maywood continued on in the same plodding, indefatigable, untiring round of duty, always at his post, ever devoted to his master's interests, and more than satisfying the expectations of the thriving Mr. Corlis, who was fortunate indeed in the selection he had made in his now confidential clerk.

"Ernest," said his employer to him one morning, "I voluntarily increased your salary, a twelvemonth since, because you merited it, though you did not mention the subject yourself. Two years ago to-day you commenced service with me. The balance-sheet exhibits a handsome profit upon the last year's business, to which result you have largely contributed, directly and indirectly. I now propose to offer you an interest in the business, and from this date, if you agree to it, you shall become a partner."

The offer was a liberal one. The income derivable from such a share of the profits would have quintupled Maywood's earnings. On the part of his employer, it was the opening wedge for his future plan of marrying his daughter well, and to his mind. His decision—a declination—instantly, but frankly and kindly given, astounded the generous Mr. Corlis.

Maywood said he was content as he was! His salary was ample, and was a full equivalent for his humble services. He did not desire it increased. He had no use for more money than his place now yielded him. He had no wish to incur additional responsibilities. He was happy, and if Mr. Corlis was satisfied, so was he. And there the matter dropped.

Maywood continued in the performance of his duties, and Mr. Corlis quietly awaited another opportunity to carry out his long-cherished plan in reference to his daughter's prospects; while Miss Corlis lost no fitting occasion to second her parent's views and wishes.

"Time flies with silent wings." A twelvemonth passes away quickly. Another year elapsed without any peculiar change in the relations of the parties about whom we have written.

One day a frightful collision took place at the station close to Mr. Corlis's place of business. He and Maywood were among the first on the scene, and were actively employed in their offices of kindness to the unfortunates, when the figure of a plainly dressed man was brought out writhing in his last agonies.

Mr. Corlis approached him as he came forward in the hands of the men who were removing him, and Maywood followed closely upon the steps of his employer. The fatally injured and dying man opened his eyes as the clerk came up, gazed fearfully at him, and shrieking the broken syllable "May—" expired.

Maywood started back, horror-struck! For an instant he was paralysed! That face and voice—that last glance! The clerk was bewildered, and motionless as a statue—and the body was taken away.

Maywood, in the confusion, fled. Subsequent search for him proved futile. He disappeared altogether, and all efforts to find him, or to learn of his whereabouts or his fate, were alike in vain. After weeks of unavailing inquiry, the belief of his employer settled into no very satisfactory channel (though he feared that Maywood had either met with an accident amid the terrible confusion, or that he must have committed suicide), and his place was filled in the counting-house, while the business of the establishment went on as before.

What disposal the book-keeper had made of his surplus earnings, from time to time, if he had any, or whether he had saved any portion of his pay, was unknown to his late employer. Inquiries were instituted, and all the means at hand likely to afford any light upon the singular and sudden disappearance were availed of—but to no purpose. Maywood was gone!

Six years, with their round of joys and sorrows, pains and pleasures, changes and fortunes, had passed away, after the accident related, when one evening there halted before the door of Mr. Corlis a carriage, from which alighted a lady and gentleman, who inquired if the merchant were at home. They were shown into the drawing-room, and the cards of "Mr. and Mrs. Ervine" were sent up. The name was not familiar, either to Mr. Corlis or his daughter.

"Ervine?" said the father, "Ervine? I do not recognise the name."

Mr. Corlis soon after entered the apartment, followed by his daughter, and the strangers rose to pay their respects.

"Mr. Ervine," said the merchant, "I am happy to meet you; but, really, I do not recollect."

"No," said the stranger, "I never had the pleasure of meeting you before. This is my wife, however," he added, presenting the modestly attired lady who accompanied him. "She says you will probably recollect her."

The lady advanced, offered her hand to Mr. Corlis and his daughter, and said: "Surely, Mr. Corlis, you have not forgotten me?"

"Maywood!" exclaimed father and daughter together.

"You are right," said the lady calmly.

"But how is this?" asked the merchant. "When did this change occur? A woman!"

"Sit down, my dear sir," said the lady calmly, "and I will at once unravel what must have seemed a most mysterious proceeding, in your estimation; but which, under the circumstances, could not be otherwise.

"Nearly twenty years ago I married a man of whom I knew too little, and who proved himself utterly unworthy of the confidence and love of her whom he grossly deceived, before and after our union. His habits were dissolute; he soon became a confirmed inebriate; our prospectively happy home shortly became a scene of continuously riotous dissipation; his little property, with my own, was squandered, and, before five years had passed, we were homeless, penniless, friendless.

"When I could no longer bear up under the cruel treatment to which I was subjected, I made a final appeal to him. In his drunken wrath he forced me violently away from him, and, in despair, I fled from the scene of my early miseries. I adopted my maiden name of Maywood, procured the letters of credence, which you have seen; and, having acquired a knowledge of books and accounts in earlier years, assumed the habiliments of the ruder sex, believing that I could thus better earn a sustenance.

"I came here, entered your service, saved a few pounds, and you remember the terrible occurrence which immediately preceded my disappearance?"

"The accident at the station?"

"Yes; we were hurrying about among the wounded, as you recollect, when the figure of one of the dying sufferers approached us."

"Yes, yes; I remember."

"That man was my husband."

There were tears in the eyes of the little coterie who listened to this singular tale of woe.

"I recognised him, and he half pronounced the name of Mary, my baptismal name, as I hurried about amid the frantic crowd on that fearful occasion. Stunned and bewildered by the trying position in which I thus suddenly found myself placed, and fearful of the results of exposure, I knew not what to do, or scarcely what I did.

"He did not survive the accident, however; and, two hours afterwards, in homely female attire, I claimed his unfortunate remains. None recognised me in my plain apparel, and surely none could suspect that the veiled and humble woman who followed the corpse to its last resting-place was in fact the book-keeper of the well-known Mr. Corlis.

"I left town forthwith. Through your kindness and liberality I had been able to lay by a considerable sum of money, and I departed for the West, and, once more among total strangers, I continued the resumption of the habiliments and habits of my sex. With the means at my command, I continued to live quietly and respectably, until some two years ago I met this gentleman, who offered me his hand. I am now Mrs. Ervine, and this is my husband, sir."

As may well be imagined, a happy reunion succeeded this dénouement of the long-time mystery which had shrouded the sudden disappearance of Mr. Corlis's book-keeper. And the reader may be assured that Mr. and Mrs. Ervine were not only very welcome in the rich merchant's family, but that the newly wedded pair became the future fast friends of "Maywood's" former employer and his extended social circle.

I, THOMAS HOOPER, was a rolling stone; but still I had gathered some moss in my ramblings. The following incident in my career is as fresh in my memory as when it happened some sixteen years ago.

At the age of eighteen, having an intense longing to see something of the world, I had taken French leave of my master, to whom I was apprenticed, and with my savings had gone to Australia.

With this short preamble I will jump over fifteen years of my life in Australia, where I roamed about over the country, at times doing very well indeed. Towards the end of 1870 I found myself in Melbourne, with a little over £500 in hard cash—the fortune I had accumulated.

That longing to see the old country again, which had often attacked me during those long years, came over me once more with irresistible force, and I determined to go home; so I took passage on board a steamer.

We had not been many days out before I chummed on to a true-bred squatter, who was on a visit to England. He was a tall, lantern-jawed man, with a full black beard and pale eyes, ever on the look-out, as it were, for the main chance, but, as I subsequently found out, as honest and straightforward a man as ever lived.

About the fifth day out a nasty spirit of inactivity stole over me—a doing-nothing kind of feeling. It seemed a shame to be spending the time so idly, and with no chance of making money, so I strolled up to the colonial and asked him if he would play; a truly nice way to get out of my difficulty.

"Yes, I'm game," was the reply. "Poker, euchre. What's your weakness?"

I shook my head and said, "What say you to cribbage?"

"Well, 'tis a quietish game, but I'm your man to what tune you like."

Feeling proud of my money, and thinking to frighten him, I said boldly, "To the tune of £500."

Not a muscle moved in his face, as he coolly went to his berth and returned with a bundle of notes.

This was decidedly unexpected, but I would not withdraw, and we both solemnly sat down at the table.

I had always been considered a good cribbage player, and I knew the game thoroughly. Of course, I wished to play the five-card game, but the Australian said he much preferred the six-card, "because there was more scoring."

To save time we decided to toss for choice, and I lost.

I began coolly and played carefully, but the luck the squatter experienced in his cribs was something marvellous, and upset all my calculations. Gradually, under the influence of tobacco-smoke, wine, and spirits, combined with my ill-luck, I played recklessly, and I rose from the table a loser of no less than the enormous sum of £150.

With head splitting, eyes burning, and hands clammy with perspiration, I rushed on deck into the fresh air. When I retired to my berth sleep would not visit me. Tossing and tumbling in my berth I formed many plans to retrieve the loss of my hard-earned money.

I had often noticed in my ups and downs through life, when apparently in the most hopeless straits, something or other was sure to turn up and make a fairy-like change in my fortune. So I did not give way entirely to despair.

Next morning I had a cold bath, took plenty of exercise, and, in fact, did everything to steady and brace my nerves for a struggle with my successful antagonist.

Well, ultimately we sat down, and I think I somewhat astonished Mr. Squatter by saying, "Sir, I have lost a deal of money, and I want to get it back. I will play you for £100, the best two out of three games."

Slowly removing his cigar from his mouth, he cried, "Done."

How my heart palpitated, though I was cool outwardly. My spirits rose when I won the first game of the rubber pretty smartly, but the second fell to the Australian after a close game. In the third my ill-luck returned, and I suffered defeat. With trembling hands I handed over the money.

"Now, friend," said the squatter, "I like your pluck. It's agin my principles, but for once I'll go you double or quits, £500 or nothing."

This completely staggered me. As a card-player I knew it was a good offer. But, then, if I lost, could I live to face misery and perhaps starvation in the old country.

I went on deck and tried to think calmly and seriously over my position. At last, with a face as pale as death and clenched hands, I resolved to do or die. I went below again, and said I would play—aye, play perchance for life itself. One game only. £500 or death.

We tossed for deal; the Australian won, and the game proceeded. His luck seemed never to desert him. Hope was fast leaving me. The cards laughed at me; the picture cards smiled in derision, until my brain seemed as if it would give way. I was even deliberating in my mind whether to jump overboard or to end existence with a pistol-shot.

The game was drawing to a close. It was the Australian's crib.

Although the holes in the board were dancing to and fro, I found he only wanted six for game, and I the apparently impossible number of thirty.

Mechanically picking up my cards, I found my hand to consist of the fives of hearts, clubs, and spades, the knaves of diamonds and spades, and the two of hearts.

My heart gave a great jump, for I knew the biggest hand at cribbage could be made of such cards. I saw my cool friend opposite smiling with satisfaction.

Instinctively I threw away the knave of spades and the two of hearts.

With a hand that trembled as it never trembled before, I cut—great heavens!—the very card, the five of diamonds. How I shivered and shook with excitement. I still wanted to make one hole, and my opponent would in every probability play out with such cards as mine against him.

My heart was beating like a sledge-hammer. I could stand the fearful tension no longer. I shouted for a glass of brandy, which was swallowed at a gulp. This invigorated me, and I tried to calm myself until my very chest seemed bursting.

I played my knave.

"A pair—two," was the response. Four holes now. I played one of my fives.

"And six is thirty-one."

Only two more holes and I was a lost man. I had only my two remaining fives, and the odds seemed great that my opponent had a tenth card of some kind left.

I shall never forget the moment when I put the card down, and in a voice I could not recognise as mine, said, "Five."

The Australian only had a three left. Saved! I threw down my remaining five, and scored the necessary one for last card.

How hysterically I showed my hand, how the tears ran down my cheeks; what my feelings were, or what I did, I cannot tell. I know that five was the last card I ever played.

In my little sitting-room at home there is a frame hanging up containing those very five cards; above is inscribed:—

"A hand worth £500."

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

"Lowick-by-Beale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.

"Very truly yours,
"WILLIAM McISAAC."

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

"11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

"GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.

"I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"LEWIS C. RHODES."

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. Money returned if not as represented.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call, or send to-day for the Marvellous Increase in Circulation!!

SHORT STORIES,

A 20pp. 4to. Weekly Magazine.

It is now little over twelve months since this magazine came into the hands of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. It has during that period more than DOUBLED ITS CIRCULATION.

This has been caused chiefly by the vast improvement in its literary standard, and the increased facilities for publication. Further efforts in this direction are being made, and a consequent further advance in circulation is confidently anticipated. A serial story entitled "THE TENTH OF JUNE," from the powerful pen of Mr. John K. Leys, is now running. This story is being illustrated by Mr. Raymond Potter, whose contributions consist of a number of large sketches each week. No advance in the rates for advertisements has been made, nor is any contemplated until the circulation has reached

100,000 COPIES WEEKLY.

The scale is 10s. per inch, or £10 per page; and, as the advertisements are limited to four pages, the most effective publicity is ensured.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 334.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 25, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

"IT can't be as bad as that, Sophie. Must your father have 20,000 francs by the first of January?"

"Yes, Henri, dear, or else"—her lip quivered a little—"or else the mortgage will be foreclosed, and father will lose all his land, and we shall be homeless."

"Not if I can help it," said Henri, stoutly.

Sophie looked proudly at him, and then at the wall of the studio. What an artist Henri was!

She came to him, and laying her hand gently on his shoulder, gazed sadly into his eyes, and said:

"I know, Henri, I know. But then you are poor now."

"I will rise—get a picture into the Salon—make money——"

"Yes, dear; but if papa loses all his property; and, besides——" and her grey eyes grew moist, and she looked wistfully away.

"And, besides?" repeated Henri, with anxious inquiry.

"And, besides, papa has been hinting at the marriage proposals of Jean Bertrand, an old playmate of mine, who offers to pay off all the mortgage on the day of his betrothal to me."

"To you, Sophie! You don't mean that you—that your father——"

Sophie looked sadly at a neat little pair of feet.

"Henri, you know I love you, and that I have promised faithfully to be your wife; but think of poor papa, and think of all I owe him. Oughtn't I to be ready to make any sacrifice to save him from ruin?"

Then they both looked sadly away in silence. Suddenly Henri squeezed Sophie's hand so hard that she started violently.

"Wait, Sophie," he exclaimed, "I've got a plan. We—you and I—can earn that twenty thousand."

"Yes, yes; how?"

"Why, you be my model, and I'll paint you."

"Oh, will you? But—but you couldn't sell a picture of me for twenty thousand francs."

In answer Henri drew her before a little square mirror, hung between the two windows, and made her look at her own reflection.

"See there, Sophie. Just look at your eyes; are they not the deepest grey, with golden lights in them? and are not your lips as red as this carmine? and just see that little pointed chin, how I could paint that; and those pink cheeks—fresh as a baby's!"

Sophie began to blush at Henri's enthusiasm, and turning from the glass, looked into his dark face, which was lit up with the glow of an almost poetic inspiration.

"And, you know," he went on, "something tells me that I shall paint you better than I have ever painted anything before—that you will be my inspiration. You must wear a loosely fitting lilac—very soft lilac—robe, and you will have your hair down, hanging down over your left shoulder, which will peep through your curls like a white dove in a golden cage. And you must hold a spray of lilacs in your hand, and be reclining under a lilac bush, and I'll call you the Lilac Witch.

"Didn't you ever hear of the legend of the Witch? She was a very beautiful fairy, and man came to catch a smile from her red lips, and the man she smiled on was made bold to do high deeds; but if his heart was drawn away to another woman, in a moment she spoiled all he had done, and made a beggarly wretch of him. Besides, you know, the lilac will go so well with your complexion and hair and eyes."

And so it was planned. The sittings were daily. Sophie was a very patient model, and Henri was full of inspiration, and worked with a certainty of success. He made studies of her face in all possible moods and expressions, till, by culling what was most entrancing in each, he began to create an ideal.

He threw the whole vigour of his poetic soul into his work, striving to get that longing, inspiring look in the large, grey eyes which, mingled with an expression, half of pity, half of triumph, in the rest of the face, was to make up the ideal of the Lilac Witch. He found the look of longing and inspiration in Sophie's eyes but the pity and triumph—that divine mixture of pride in victory and sorrow for the conquered—were wanting. By his own talent, Henri created them, inspired by his love and the prize set before him.

One day in December he was working away with his brush while Sophie reclined on the model's platform. He could see how tired she was. His own face showed that, but for the indomitable fire in his black eyes, he would have given out long ago. But the day of foreclosing the mortgage drew on apace. Still to-day was a happy day—Henri had a surprise for Sophie, and as he occasionally searched his palette for colours, the corners of his mouth twitched with his suppressed secret.

Sophie was just saying how Jean Bertrand kept repeating his offer to her father, and how, as the days went by and the first of January approached, her father seemed more and more inclined to accept. Henri smiled sweetly.

"Very good for M. Bertrand," he said; "but I have something to tell you. Something splendid—superb," and he kissed his hand with a theatrical gesture.

"Oh! what is it?" exclaimed Sophie, jumping up and spoiling the folds of her carefully arranged drapery.

Henri forgave her that for the sake of the news. Then he told her that the agent of a rich Englishman was looking all over Paris for paintings of beautiful women; how he had seen the Lilac Witch, now nearly finished, and how he had, with a millionaire's extravagance, offered the fabulous sum of 30,000 francs. That ended the sitting for that day, for Sophie insisted on taking Henri at once to her father, telling him the news, and making him break off all further negotiations with Jean Bertrand.

And so it was arranged. Henri was to pay off the mortgage as soon as the picture was transferred, keeping the surplus of 10,000 francs to start life with Sophie, while her father dismissed Jean Bertrand, with the precautionary hint that, in case the Englishman should fail them, he would immediately accept Bertrand's offer.

It was the evening before the great day when the picture was to be formally sold, the 30,000 francs handed over, and Henri and Sophie married. Henri was in the studio, standing before the picture. In one hand he held a lighted cigarette, in the other an acutely-pointed paint-brush. He was scrutinising the face of his beloved Lilac Witch with a look of intense exultation. Every now and then he would make an infinitesimal stroke with the brush, after which he would take a long pull at the cigarette, letting the smoke slowly exude from his mouth and nose in a manner that bespoke keen satisfaction.

He was putting on what he called the last touches before he said good-night to the picture, and went to call on Sophie. He looked at his watch. It was already past nine, and he had promised to be there at eight. Still there were only a few more tiny touches needed, and then he would go.

He lit cigarette after cigarette, he walked up and down the room, changed the lamps, and surveyed the painting from twenty points of view. Finally, he seemed satisfied, threw down the brush, drew a sofa up in front of the easel, and lay there watching the Witch's face with a lover's rapture. His chest heaved, his eyes grew bright, the muscles round his mouth softened into an expression of supreme delight.

Suddenly he started and looked at his watch. It was twelve o'clock and he had forgotten, and Sophie had probably gone to bed, wondering why he never came. He blamed himself for being so thoughtless.

This changed the current of his thoughts, reminding him that to-morrow he married Sophie, and they would always live together; a bright smile lit up his face, but it was a commonplace smile compared to his look of a few seconds ago. Yes, to-morrow Sophie would be his, and they would come and pay him 30,000 francs and take away the Lilac Witch. Take away the Lilac Witch? Why, of course; he had only painted it for the sake of marrying Sophie.

Henri looked away from the picture with a dull ache at his heart. Somehow, life with Sophie, when the Lilac Witch was gone, did not seem so sweet as it used to in the old days when they had the first sitting. Then the picture only meant to him the portrait of his dear Sophie. Now, when he was gazing into that fair, arch face on the canvas, so triumphant, and yet so pitying and tender, he never thought of its being Sophie's face at all. He seemed to see there something that was all his own and had come out of his own soul. How could he bear to part with it? But he was winning Sophie by giving it up. A horrible doubt came to him. What if after all he should love the picture better than the model? He shook his head resolutely, and went to bed. All that night in his dreams that awful doubt tormented him.

On the morrow Sophie appeared before the hour of the business transactions, so as to tidy up the studio. She found Henri there before the picture as usual. He had wheeled the easel up near the window, and was devouring the painting with his eyes. He never so much as turned his head to greet her.

He saw there, on a bank of moss, half sitting, half reclining, a beautiful woman, the image of his sweetheart, yet wearing an intangible something about the eyes and mouth, something that Henri, with feelings of misgiving, felt that Sophie had not. The wavy, light brown hair, hanging in ringlets over the bare shoulder, and the vermilion tint of the pure cheek, were simply a clever copy of Sophie's charms

But in the grey eyes was a look that seemed to tell of a great, unsatisfied longing, for love—or, perhaps, victory—while the delicate, slightly curving lips had a tender, pitying expression that was strangely contradicted by the pointed chin, which boded forth a scornful joy of triumph—perhaps the very triumph which the eyes were longing for, and whose victim the mouth pitied. The very compositeness of the face, full of contradiction, was the origin of its charm.

Henri looked long at the face, and then turned and glanced half timidly, half hopefully, at Sophie. She thought she caught his meaning, and smiled back at him.

"Is it like?" she laughed.

Henri's face lost the look of hope. He turned eagerly back to the picture, looked at it a minute, then turned away with a sigh. Sophie came to him, and, looking over his shoulder at the lovely reflection of herself, asked him why he sighed. He answered:

"Ah, Sophie, you cannot understand, you cannot know the feeling of adoration which an artist has for something into which he has poured his whole soul. This is my masterpiece. I shall never do anything as good again, no, never! All the strength, all the purity, all the poetry of my inmost soul are embodied in that one painting, and now—now, I must part with it; must say good-bye for ever to what has been meat and drink to me for months past. You cannot know what it has come to mean to me: how I have worshipped it as I created it. It is more than a portrait. It is an ideal in which I have lived for months. Oh, where, where shall I find anything to take its place?"

And Henri, kneeling before the picture, spread out his hands in supplication. Sophie knelt beside him, and gently passing one arm over his shoulder, whispered softly to him, as if they already knelt before the altar:

"Henri, Henri, here I am! Have you not me? Did you not paint that picture to marry me? And now it's done, are we not to be married, and you are to have me always?"

She paused. Henri gazed long and steadily, with a blank, searching look, into her sweet pale face. Then he turned towards the Lilac Witch, shuddered, and sorrowfully shook his head. He noticed that in a spot near the edge of the canvas the varnish had worn a little rough. He got up from his knees, and, pushing aside a curtain, went into a side room to get a pot of varnish.

Sophie remained motionless, kneeling before the picture, her bosom heaving, her eyes flashing, her hands clutching convulsively at her dress. She repeated his last words: "'Where shall I find anything to take its place?'"

Jealousy, cruel as the grave, jealousy of her own self, jealousy of the image of her own person reflected in the artist's imagination, was taking hold of her. Oh, how she hated the picture that had stolen her only possession; had cheated her of Henri's love! She rose and looked savagely at the lovely Lilac Witch. Then, glancing wildly round the room for a weapon, she spied on a little table Henri's mixing-knife. It was of steel and quite sharp. She ran to it, seized it, and then coming up so close that her hot breath made the canvas moist, she hissed:

"There, you thief, you!"—and with a few strokes of the knife, she cut and slashed the lovely face and tore out the grey eyes, and hacked the poor head and bosom into shreds. Then, throwing back her head, she stood upright, panting and trembling before her disfigured rival.

At that second it seemed as if the scornful, pitying, triumphant look of the Lilac Witch had passed to her own face.

Just then came a rustle at the curtain and a rattle at the door. Henri slipped in quietly from the inner room, and Sophie's father came bustling in from the hall. The two men came forward and greeted one another cordially; then they turned towards Sophie and the picture.

With a sharp cry Henri bounded forward, and pressing his forehead against the mutilated painting, cried like a child.

Sophie looked wildly about, and staggered towards her father. He roughly led her to a chair. Then, pulling his hat over his ears, he said hoarsely, half aloud:

"I must go and find Jean Bertrand."

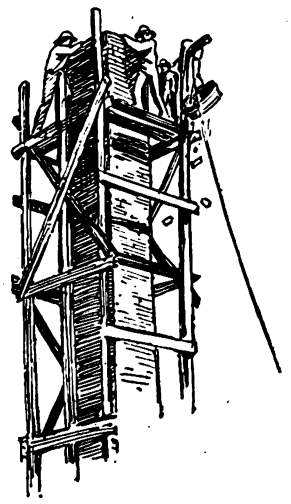
On the Chimney



"LAST summer," said Dannie McLean, the mason, to his friends at the "Dog's Tail," "I took a contract to build a chimney for the tanning company at Millville. It was to be eighty-two feet high, and they wanted the job hurried through.

"The foundation and lower part were plain sailing; but as we got higher I had trouble with my help. The local men became frightened, and left one after another, till at last I had to send back home here for Charley French.

"You see, at that height, hod-carrying was out of the question, so we had a block and tackle rigged, and lifted all our stuff by horse-power. The upper block was fastened to one of the upright posts of the staging; the lower one to a post sunk in the ground.

"It was not a very safe arrangement, as we could not make the staging very secure. But we got a quiet, steady horse, and a cautious chap for driver, and didn't feel as though there was much danger.

"There were six uprights in the staging. Of course, each of them was not all one stick. They had to be spliced about every twenty feet. This made three joints in each upright, and they were far from being firm.

"Down nearer the ground, where the brickwork had hardened, and the staging was well fastened to the chimney, it was all right; but the upper part of it was decidedly unsteady. The posts creaked and vibrated more or less every time a bucketful of brick or mortar came up.

"We had made a bet of a bottle of whiskey with the manager of the company that we would finish the work by Saturday evening. At dinner-time that day it was so certain we were going to win easily that Charley suggested to the manager that he had better pay half the bet in advance, in the shape of a flask of whiskey. He agreed; and we took the flask up with us to finish off on.

"We had drunk most of it, and had only one more course of bricks to lay, when the son of the manager made his way up beside us. He was a wide-awake, independent-looking youngster, fourteen or fifteen years of age, but he had no right to be there. He would have been sent down in a hurry if the whiskey hadn't made us a little too easy-going.

"As it was, we both had sense enough to order him to leave at once. Instead of obeying, he put his hands into his pockets, eyed us knowingly for a moment, and remarked:

"'Aren't you two a little high, for eighty feet above ground?'

"We laughed, and let him stay. He moved about the staging, not in the least disturbed by the elevation. Finally, when he got tired of looking about, he picked up a hatchet which had been in use for driving nails, and began chipping at one of the posts.

"In the meantime the last brick was laid. We finished the whiskey, and gave three cheers, while the boy stood watching us with anything but respectful eyes. Charley French was leaning against the chimney with the empty flask in his hand, looking somewhat tipsy.

"'See here, Dannie,' said he, solemnly, 'there's the old horse down yonder, and we've forgotten all about him. He's seen us right through this job, and he hasn't been offered so much as a smell of the whiskey.'

"'Hello, old chap! Here's the flask for you, anyway,' he suddenly shouted, as he gave it a toss.

"It went flashing and circling through the air, and fell with a crash on a big stone just behind the horse, whose driver was with a crowd of loafers some twenty or thirty yards away.

"The horse gave a frightened leap, and galloped off at a speed that I hadn't thought was in him. The rope whizzed over the pulleys, and the half-filled bucket shot up towards us like a rocket.

"It came against the upper block with a crash that threatened the overthrow of the whole staging. Posts swayed and bent at their joints; boards, loose bricks, and tools slipped from their places and went rattling down below.

"We clutched at the top of the chimney as the steadiest object within reach. But the newly-laid brick moved under our hands, and gave little promise of holding us up.

"The horse was checked for a moment when the bucket came against the upper block; but he bent wildly to his traces, and the fastening of the lower block gave way. He had now a direct purchase on the upper corner of the staging.

"The only thing which saved it from being torn away at the first tug was the horse being unable to bring his full strength to bear. The rope ascended at an angle which lifted the traces above his back, and shifted the strain from his shoulders to his neck. He was half choked and thrown to the ground.

"The staging groaned and reeled as he struggled to get on his feet again. His driver stood stupidly looking up at us without moving a step. The whole thing happened in so few seconds, that it is not much wonder the man's presence of mind left him. The horse scrambled to his knees, then to his feet, and pulled frantically. The strain at the top of the chimney became frightful. It seemed as though not only the staging, but the whole upper part of the chimney would be pulled away and fall at the next plunge.

"Neither Charley nor I had spoken a word. We just held on, and gasped and wondered how it would feel when everything gave way. And we forgot all about the manager's son until he spoke up behind us:

"'It's about time to cut the rope, isn't it?'

"Before we could turn our heads there was a sharp click of the block. The clean-cut end of the rope shot downward.

"The boy stood with the hatchet in his hand, watching the horse. Of course, the moment the rope was cut the straining animal pitched forward.

"'It'd be a good thing for you two men if you were just as frightened of rum bottles as old Dobbin down there seems to be,' remarked the boy calmly, as the horse disappeared round a corner, while the rope trailed behind him like a long snake.

"Charley and I were both sober enough by that time, and we wanted to shake hands with the manager's son, but he refused.

"'No use making a fuss,' he said. 'I happened to have your hatchet in my hand, and I cut the rope. That's all. Another pull from Dobbin would have brought the whole thing down, and that'd have been about as rough on me as you.'

"So you see, I came near not curling any this winter, concluded Dannie, but as it is, I'll just quit the 'conveeviaulity' o' the game."

THE WEARER OF THE VICTORIA CROSS

THE soldiers are coming into the city.

The clank of swords and sounds of horses' hoofs, and then the band commences to play as it leads the sunburnt warriors through the old town of Chesterbury—the horses tossing their heads to the sound of the music.

At the head of his regiment rides Major Clement Homfreys, V.C.—familiarly known to his body of horse as "Old Clem"—his tall, martial figure, set off by the elaborate uniform of the "Devil's Own," being a prominent attraction.

Many a little heart fluttered, and many a sly, winning glance was cast, as he rode forward, the admired of all, he—the hero of the Egyptian Campaign and the wearer of the coveted Victoria Cross.

But the iron-grey warrior saw nothing of the bewitching smiles and sly glances, but, like an automaton, rode on through the narrow streets into the barrack-square, with its blocks of greystone buildings which constituted the new quarters of this regiment.

In a few days the excitement had abated and society imagined that dull times had passed now the acknowledged smart and fashionable regiment were ensconced within the walls of their town.

Neither were they to be disappointed, for before long polo, ennis, military dances, and all kindred sports dear to youth, were in full swing.

But the Major did not join in the gaiety, but spent his time in antiquarian research among the cloisters and historical landmarks with which the old cathedral city abounds.

"Society" at first resented this slight from their idol, but, finding argument of no avail, very reluctantly slipped the prosy Major for the acknowledged smart set of officers attached to the regiment.

So things went on, month after month, and Homfreys was left in peace to lead the sleepy existence he had mapped out for himself. But one day a fresh era opened in his mundane life.

It was while strolling through the Cathedral grounds in research that he came across a young lady painting at her easel.

Without thinking what he was doing, he wandered up behind the artist, and looking over her shoulder stood, for some minute or two, admiring the half-finished water-colour.

Then, suddenly seeing the lady about to move, and realising the apparent show of bad taste on his part, he lifted his hat, and mumbled out some indistinct words of apology and regret.

"There is no need of an apology," she said, turning to him. "I take it as a great compliment that you should care to look at my poor efforts."

"Scarcely that," he replied. "I was attracted by the cleverness of your work, and that must be my excuse for intrusion."

"Ah! Major Homfreys, like all officers, you are not above flattery," she answered, with a sweet smile and the least suspicion of colour mounting to her cheek—and then she turned to pack up her easel and sketching pad. The Major seized the opportunity and begged to be allowed to help her. Receiving assent, he went down on his knees to arrange the portable apparatus.

For a few minutes there was an awkward silence—both experiencing shyness in each other's company.

"Now, come, tell me how you knew I was a soldier," he said at last, and without looking up.

"What modesty!" she replied. "As if all Chesterbury does not know Major Homfreys, the wearer of the Victoria Cross. Has not the description of how the hero rode out under heavy fire and saved the life of a wounded soldier been published in all our local journals?" this with an admiring little laugh.

Shall it be admitted that he, the hero of many a fight, and one of England's most gallant warriors, blushed at the words of praise issuing from the lips of a little country maiden? But indeed it was a fact, and his shyness and awkwardness increased.

He tarried over the packing of the easel until his equanimity was re-established, and then sprang to his feet with a bright look in his eye unusual to him.

"And now let us come to a mutual understanding," he said. "You seem to know everything about me, won't you tell me the name of the artist who delights to hide her artistic abilities in this little place?"

"You know my father, surely, Major?" she replied. "He is the mayor of the borough—my name is Edith Chester"—this in the meekest of voices. "Papa, as you must have heard, has a strong prejudice to soldiers; but, believe me, there is a reason for it. My brother ran away from home, years ago, and enlisted in a regiment that was sent out on foreign service. The shock unsettled papa for a long, long time, and now we are forbidden even so much as to mention my poor brother Fred's name."

"Is that possible?" said the soldier kindly. "Accept my sincere regrets, Miss Chester, for intruding myself upon you."

"I think you make a mistake," she said hesitatingly. "The prejudice to soldiers rests with papa alone. I—er—you must please excuse me now, I am long behind my time, and they will be waiting tea for me." And with a red face, and not noticing the extended hand of the Major, she picked up her easel and case and ran off through the grounds.

For the rest of the day the Major walked about with a pleasant smile, which was duly noticed by his officers, and many theories were advanced as to its probable cause by the smart throng in the large billiard-room attached to the barracks.

But the Major knew nothing of this, and, indeed, such remarks had no chance of coming to his ears.

On the following afternoon his steps took him again to the Cathedral grounds, and, with pleasure, he saw his little friend seated at her easel deeply interested in her work.

She turned at the sound of his footsteps, and came forward with an outstretched hand and a sweet smile to greet him.

He took her hand within his grasp and looked tenderly down into the grey eyes upturned to his, while both hearts beat quickly.

Then he turned to the picture with a few complimentary criticisms on the girl's work.

"It seems so strange," she said, in answer, "that you soldiers should have time to care for this sort of thing."

"Perhaps I'm an odd sort of soldier," he replied, looking down upon her.

"I think you are a very nice sort of soldier!" she answered—and then, noticing a smile lurking under the heavy moustache, added—"of course, I mean to come and admire my poor little picture."

So they both stood, somewhat abashed, yet happy in each other's company, not noticing the approach of a grey-headed gentleman, who came striding towards them, with evident anger written on his face.

They turned simultaneously at the sound of footsteps, and then the girl shrunk back with the startled cry of "Father!"

The situation was a delicate one for the Major, but, in the presence of his own sex, he found words and endeavoured to explain his intrusion on Miss Chester.

"I have nothing to say to you, Major Homfreys," the Mayor answered curtly. "It came to my knowledge that my daughter had been seen in your company, and I thought it my duty to come and escort her home."

"How can you act so rudely, papa?" the girl cried. "This gentleman was merely looking at my drawing, and——"

"Enough," said the Mayor. "The introduction to Major Homfreys was not my seeking; besides, you can finish your work at some other time. For the present, I want you at home."

With tears in her eyes the girl packed her easel and accompanied her father from the grounds, leaving the soldier standing there, gnawing his moustache.

"And to think that she will suffer for my sake," he thought, as he walked moodily back to the barracks.

"Old Clem" is down again on his luck, was the verdict of the select few—assembled that evening in the billiard-room.

. . . . .

Three weeks had gone by and Major Homfreys had not once caught sight of his divinity. He realised now what it meant to be parted from her. He, the callous disciplinarian, who for years had resisted the attractions of the opposite sex, was now pining for the presence of a little country girl—and day by day the furrows seemed to be deepening in his forehead.

One evening, on returning to his rooms, he found a letter written in a strange hand awaiting him.

With a nervousness not to be accounted for, he tore open the envelope, and read:

"Langlebury, Chesterbury.

"DEAR MAJOR HOMFREYS,

"I have such good news for you—my brother has returned home and made peace with my father, to the great happiness of us all.

Edith Chester.

"But there is a certain amount of secrecy between them that I can't quite understand; but my father wishes me to make an informal request that you will honour us with a visit this evening.

"May I, on my own behalf, tell you how pleased I shall be to see you?

"Yours very sincerely,

"EDITH CHESTER."

The Major read the letter again and again, scarcely believing his own eyes—what did it all mean?

Ten minutes later he knocked at the door of the Mayor's residence and was shown into the reception-room, where he was met by Mr. Chester himself.

"Major Homfreys," said the Mayor, grasping his hand, "I have to make a sincere apology for my rudeness to you in the Cathedral grounds some days back. Let me commence by formally greeting you and introducing my daughter Edith and my eldest son, Fred."

As he spoke a sturdy young fellow came forward and saluted the officer:

"Major Homfreys," the young man said, "you don't know me by the name of Chester, but you will remember me in Egypt under the name of Private Easton, and I shall never forget you, Sir, for you saved my life at the risk of your own."

The Major stood dumfounded at the working out of events. Then he found his tongue:

"Mr. Chester," he said gravely, "when I had the fortune to save your life, I did only what hundreds of others would have done under such desperate circumstances, and in return you gained for me the Victoria Cross; so you see I have been well repaid for any risk I ran," and he shook the young man's hand heartily, while the Mayor and his daughter stood smiling at the unexpected meeting.

It was a happy little party that sat down to late dinner that evening, and many stories of military heroism were told by the young sergeant that brought a colour to the Major's face and admiring glances from Miss Edith, seated at the officer's side.

. . . . . .

From a fashionable paper some six months later:

"ON the 26th inst., at Chesterbury Cathedral, Major Clement Homfreys, V.C., of the Royal Fordshire Regiment, to Edith, daughter of Frederick Henry Chester, Esq., of Langlebury, Chesterbury."

THE BLACK PEARL

A NIGHT IN ACAPULCO.

THE harbour of Acapulco is an ideal one for shelter, and, after the steamer is once at anchor, it is a source of mystery to the passengers who have not been on deck how she ever entered the quiet little bay. The high, blue mountains in the background, the tall palms and tropical green down to the water's edge; along the shore the tiled and thatched houses—among the oldest on the coast; and, on the rising ground to the right, the ancient fort and military prison. All these make a sight that fills a lover of the picturesque with enthusiasm. The waters about the steamer are thick with the boats and dugouts of the bumboat-women and dirty native boys peddling fruit, shells, pearls, and a world of indescribables, all keeping up a constant din of jabbering jargon, that, with the hundreds of half-naked natives passing from the ships to the lighters discharging cargo, makes an exciting scene, in sharp contrast to the peaceful outlook on the shore beyond.

From the ship the city seems but a collection of small adobes, scattered here and there along the hillside, with an occasional long, white building in view. But no sooner has the traveller passed the gates of the custom-house than a little city of twelve thousand inhabitants lies before him under the shelter of the hill, with thriving stores thronged with dark-eyed señoritas and men in white linen or bespangled velvet, many of the latter with the flaming serape hanging over the shoulder.

Edmund Warren represented the English house. He had taken the place of the traveller who for years had made the annual visit to the Mexican seaport. He had never seen Acapulco before, nor had Henry Sanford, who accompanied him on this trip. They had only just landed and become settled in the miserable excuse for a hotel in time to enjoy a delicious comida, when they felt an impulse to join the throngs which filled the clean-paved streets as evening came and night soon followed the footsteps of the sultry day.

Passing down the street leading by the stores, the market, and the plaza, just behind the custom-house, a small place under sheltering palms opened to view, where, night after night, the lower classes assembled to watch the fandango. The crowd of dark-skinned men and women, all dressed in the garb of the locality, stood out in the dim light of the long torches planted here and there among the throng, like ghosts of departed señoritas and caballeros. All were watching the couples dancing the monotonous clog-quadrille on the low platform to the music of drum, tambourine, and guitar.

The Englishmen had mingled with the throng about the dancers, watching alternately the platform and the groups of girls about. Soon soft eyes had discovered the strangers, and coquettish glances went out from beneath long lashes. Warren was never happy unless in love, and in love with every pretty face that came across his path. His heart beat faster as he caught the glances shot at himself and Henry, and he nearly pinched the latter's arm off as a smile came from a dark-eyed beauty on the edge of the throng.

"Gad, Henry! Such eyes! Did you ever see their like?" he exclaimed. "I must see where she lives. Are you with me?" And he rubbed his hands in anticipation of an adventure. Henry was quite as ready for a lark as his companion.

Ten o'clock. The dancing was over, and the crowd scattered through the dark streets.

"You had better look out for that tall Mexican with your beauty, Ned. He may stick a knife into us," cautioned Henry.

"Nonsense! Come on," was the other's rejoinder.

They did not notice the native police—not uniformed, but armed—following some distance behind as the Englishmen dogged the footsteps of the first conquest of the amorous Warren; nor did they know their custom of "running in" the foreigner on any pretext whatever for the revenue of the paltry fine. Muriella Narvaez knew full well that her new admirers were close behind, and so did her tall lover. He bade her good-night as Warren and Sanford passed, and went back towards the plaza. If the Englishmen could have heard his consultation with Old China, the bumboat woman and character of Acapulco, they might even now be back in their native city.

The young men retraced their steps, and found the olive-skinned beauty still in the door. They saluted. The bow was returned.

"Adelante, señors," a pretty voice said, and they accepted, with alacrity, the invitation to enter. Candles burned dimly in a corner filled with bottles—mescal, aguardiente, and tequila. Several other girls, quite as pretty as the captor of Warren's transitory affections, were seated about, some on stools and some on the low couch in the corner; two had guitars.

"Here's luck, Henry," whispered Warren, and they were soon quite at home in the little white adobe, though to Henry there seemed something uncanny about the place. To the Englishmen, used to the luxurious fittings of a metropolitan home, the bare walls and dirty floors, covered with palm patates, were a new experience.

While laughter and song came from the little house, and the Englishmen were whispering love-nothings in the ears of newly found amoureux, in another house, not far from the water, more serious words were passing between Old China and the tall lover of Muriella. The old dealer in green cocoa-nuts and occult mysteries was listening with ill-concealed pleasure to the man who was begging a favour at her hands. No love-scrape about the shores of that pretty bay ever escaped her notice, and nothing pleased the stout old bum-boat woman so much as to be sought out by the amorous of the upper classes to listen to such information from her lips as is sought from the "second-sight" mediums of our own country.

"So you want to buy the Black Pearl? To buy it! You fool!" shrieked Old China, when the Mexican had finished his story. "What do you know about it?"

"I know what was said when the commandante was found dead, and that the police were afraid to search for it. Five hundred pesos for its use to-night—that is all I ask."

"The police are fools, and you are a fool! I know nothing about the Black Pearl."

"Come, China. A thousand pesos for its use and the knowledge how to use it."

"A thousand pesos," muttered the old woman. "Have you the money with you?"

"Aye, that I have; and I want its use for only this one night."

China waddled into an adjoining room, whence, after much delay, she brought forth a package, carefully wrapped and sealed. "You must not undo this Señor," she said, "or you will suffer, if you see the Pearl."

. . . . . .

The laughter and song in the adobe casita stopped at a knock on the outer door, and Ned Warren's pretty Acapulcan answered the summons. A neat parcel was handed her by the messenger, which she eagerly unfolded. "With the compliments of ——" it said, but she knew the handwriting.

"How funny, at this hour," she thought; but her snapping black eyes danced with glee as she undid the parcel and found it to contain an immense black pearl, set in beaten yellow metal of quaint workmanship. At her exclamation of delight the others grouped about, and their object of admiring glances was laid upon the table for inspection.

An instinctive shudder passed through Sanford as Muriella laid it under the candle light. It seemed to emit a peculiar light, and a queer, prickling sensation went through his veins as he viewed the jewel—the largest of its kind he had ever seen. As he looked a feeling of exhilaration came over him, such as he had not felt during the evening.

"That last drink of tequila was too much," he thought, but the others, too, were beginning to evince signs of liveliness even greater than all the hilarity of the night had brought forth. A faint blue haze seemed to cover every object in the room. The figures of the girls at intervals looked far away and then near by, while a feeling of utter recklessness pervaded his whole being. All the phantasms of the opium-eater could not be more weird than those which came into Sanford's brain as his gaze was riveted on the jewel lying among the candles grouped around it on the table. In their dim light it seemed to grow and grow, emitting a demoniacal glow that, but for the spirit of recklessness which possessed him, would have filled his soul with dread.

"The fandango!" cried one of the girls, with a wild burst of laughter. "Let us dance once more, for I feel as though my feet were on fire," and when the guitar sounded the notes of the dance, the dancers seemed to enter into it with fiendish delight and boisterous enthusiasm. Back and forth they crossed, their feet pattering and stamping to the twanging of the guitar. Faster and faster their movements became, as the music seemed to fill ever fibre with its wild action.

. . . . . .

Five bodies were found dead in the adobe casita next morning, but with no marks of violence or other signs to show the cause of death.

The gossips of that quaint Mexican seaport tell a weird tale of a black pearl taken from the gulf, that acts upon beholders as does the loco-weed upon all who taste that evil plant; and they tell, too, of a mad dance of death years ago, when two foreigners and three beauties of the place fell exhausted about the jewel, whose demoniacal fire kept them treading the fandango till all energy was gone and life went from them.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.—Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and friend of Geoffrey.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Byngham—An army officer, and cousin to Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love for Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook.

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger. Sir Arthur on learning from his lawyer that his cousin, Captain Byngham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Byngham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty. On the tenth of June Geoffrey goes to Wales, and is followed by Kuttapani, who attacks him in a lonely spot and leaves him for dead. Geoffrey, however, recovers, and tracks him to a house in Westbourne Park, named Lancaster Villa, which transpires to be the headquarters of the Hindoo. Geoffrey asks the General for Leila's hand, but is refused, and goes abroad. On his return he meets the Rajah outside Lancaster Villa, and subsequently discovers that Captain Byngham is in league with the Hindoos.

CHAPTER XIX.

FOREWARNED.

Sir Arthur Chetwynd was sitting on a garden-seat, under the shade of a fine old beech tree on his lawn; at his side was a large bundle of letters and newspapers, some opened, others unopened. Sir Arthur had been from home, and this heap of correspondence had accumulated during his absence. He had only arrived late on the preceding evening, and had postponed the task of opening his letters till after breakfast.

Among these letters was one addressed in a handwriting that was evidently disguised. To his surprise, the General found that the letter inside was written by Geoffrey Dundas.

After reading the first few lines, Sir Arthur's face changed. He became very pale; and the lines in his cheeks deepened. He read a little further, and gave a start.

"Is anything the matter, papa?"

Leila had stolen up to him unobserved.

"No, child, no; but I am busy. I don't wan't to be disturbed. Here, take these"—thrusting some unopened illustrated papers into her hand. "Just go off somewhere, will you? and look at the pictures. I want to be alone just at present."

He spoke in a peremptory, harsh tone, though he was not conscious of the fact; and the tears sprang to the girl's eyes.

"He treats me like a child," she said to herself. "I can see that something has happened to cause him pain or anxiety, and he expects me to go away and look at pictures, as if I were a baby."

But Leila knew her father too well to utter a word of remonstrance. She took the newspapers, and went slowly back into the house.

"Let me see what this foolish boy says," said the General to himself, beginning to read the former part of the letter again before finishing it. "I wonder if it is all sober earnest, or if the poor fellow's nerves have been shaken by those attempts to murder him. He seems to have written under some strong excitement." He pulled down his straw hat over his eyes, laid down his cigar, and fixed his eyes on the sheet of paper before him.

"I have just discovered," wrote Geoffrey, "that those rascally Hindoos intend to make a serious attack on you; and I believe it will occur on the old date—the tenth of June. I cannot now enter into particulars of the method by which I came into possession of this knowledge; but I do beseech you not to disregard the warning. Not only you, but your daughter, are in great danger; and I have positive certainty—not merely suspicion, but certainty—that your cousin Captain Byngham is in some way connected with the plot."

Here the General stopped, and shook his head.

"That I can't believe," he said aloud. "Byngham may be a spendthrift, for anything I know; but he never would be—good Heavens!—a murderer! Geoffrey must be either mad, or insanely jealous, to hint at such a thing."

Yet the next words in the letter made him feel that he had done Geoffrey an injustice.

"I do not believe—it would take a great deal to make me believe—that your kinsman has anything to do with the main object of the Hindoos, or that he would knowingly be a party to any attempt on your life; but he is certainly in communication with Chunder Sen, who, I have no doubt, instigated Kuttapani to try to murder me. He has allowed himself to become the tool of these men for purposes of his own, and these purposes have your daughter for their object.

Began to pace up and down the lawn.

"All this is certainly true, for I overheard part of a conversation between them, and their words could bear no other meaning. I could learn nothing of the details of the plot, except that it is intended to be carried out on board ship, and that Captain Byngham is to play the part of rescuer to Miss Chetwynd, and so win your gratitude and hers. This, at least, is the arrangement. Whether he will be allowed to carry out such a scheme, or whether his Hindoo allies will play him false, throw him over, and——"

The sentence had been left unfinished. The General drew his breath hard, and read on.

"You will think that I am mad. I am not mad, but I confess I am almost beside myself to think that we are comparatively so helpless against these malignant enemies, with their secret methods and their undying hate. It encourages me to think that a little more knowledge of their plans would enable us to defeat them, this time at all events, without trouble, and that without that knowledge we must run tremendous risks.

"The question is, what can we do? I think you should come up to town and see me, when we could perhaps hit upon some way of eluding the danger that threatens you. At any rate, I beg you to allow me to become your guest for the ninth and tenth of next month. Knowing that danger threatens your daughter as well as yourself, I cannot remain away from you."

The General bit his lip, and turned to the date of the letter. It was more than a week old; and a look of perplexity came into the Anglo-Indian's handsome face.

"I can't have that. I really can't have that," he said to himself. "Luckily I wasn't at home when this arrived, and now that the yachting trip is settled, of course the thing is impossible. And yet, if there really is any danger threatened, Geoffrey would be the very fellow to have at one's back. But there can't be—there can't be. On board Lavington's yacht there can be no danger. Geoffrey himself said so last year. He will be relieved to hear that we are to spend next week at sea. I must write and tell him at once."

The General went back to his letter:

"As to your own movements, if I may venture to give you advice, I would say, whatever you may have intended doing, change your plans at the last moment, taking good care that not a living soul, not even Miss Chetwynd, knows that you purpose changing them. That is your only safe course. If you have given out that you are to be at home on the tenth, go somewhere on the ninth, you and Miss Chetwynd—to London for example. But if you have thought of spending the tenth of June at sea, change your mind at the last moment, and stay quietly at home, allowing no stranger to approach the premises.

"One word more. I know that your friend the Rajah is in communication with your enemies. Innocent communication it may be. I don't know. You will know best whether it will be prudent to have him as a guest under your roof on the coming tenth of June. But as to two men there can be no doubt. I do hope that you will permit no scruples about hospitality to stand in the way of your safety; and if either Captain Byngham or Chunder Sen is to be with you on the fatal tenth, it is quite imperative that you should get rid of them before that day."

"Upon my word our young friend is very free with his advice," said the General to himself with a smile. Apparently the same thought had struck the writer of the letter, for he went on to say:

"I fear you will think me very officious, perhaps impertinent; but I can't help that. If I had failed to put the thing in the strongest possible light to you, and if anything were to happen through your neglect of obvious precautions—forgive me. I am perhaps offending again. But you cannot imagine how great is my anxiety!

"Your most devoted

"P.S.—The conspirators' plans involve the use of a boat. That much I know. I should therefore think it safer for you and Miss Chetwynd to keep on shore, and not even go down to the beach, until some days after the tenth."

Here the letter abruptly ended.

The General rose, and began to pace up and down the lawn, with his hands, in one of which he still held Geoffrey's letter, folded behind his back.

"Poor fellow, he is terribly anxious," he said to himself; "and I daresay he has discovered some evidence that those blackguards have got hold of Byngham. What for, I wonder? Probably as a spy. But in any case we are safe—absolutely safe. On board the old yacht it might have been different; but in the new yacht, a fine steamer, five hundred tons burden, with a strong crew of English sailors, most of whom are personally known to Lavington—Danger? Pooh! The thing is impossible.

"Yet, Chunder Sen! I confess I should feel easier if he were to be left behind."

Half mechanically the General went back to the garden seat, where he had left the little heap of unopened letters; and opened one of them. As soon as he had read the first few lines, his face cleared wonderfully.

The letter was from Chunder Sen, writing in his capacity of secretary to the Rajah. He wrote, he said, by his master's permission, and at his master's request, to say that neither his religion nor his health—he was extremely liable to sea-sickness in its worst form—permitted him to make one of the party on board the Aphrodite. With the Rajah's and the illustrious General's permission, he and the other members of the Rajah's suite would return to London on the ninth of June—the day fixed for the Aphrodite to leave Plymouth. And as the Rajah would require an attendant he would feel obliged if the General would allow one of his own servants to accompany him as his valet; or, if not, he could, perhaps, recommend an English servant who would not object to a sea trip to serve for the occasion.

Such was the purport of the Hindoo's letter.

The General gave a little exultant laugh as he tossed the letter down again among the others on the garden-seat. There was just to his mind one element of real danger in the situation—the Hindoos whom the Rajah might chance to bring with him in his suite; and this danger had been removed by the Rajah's own act! Of the Rajah himself Sir Arthur had never been suspicious.

To suppose that he would descend to be an assassin was absurd. And he now proposed to leave all his attendants behind, except one, and that one an Englishman, to be selected by the General himself.

Nothing could have been better. This decided the question of giving up the intended yacht expedition, which Sir Arthur had never, in his own mind, intended to abandon. No asylum could now be safer than Lord Lavington's yacht. Chunder Sen and his fellow countrymen might possibly reach him in London, or even at Seacombe Towers, but not on the open sea.

With a pleased smile on his face, very different from its former expression of stern anxiety, Sir Arthur proceeded to open the rest of his letters. Among them was a second one from Geoffrey Dundas, written a[bout] a week after the other.

"I was so surprised and a[nxious]" wrote Geoffrey, "at not hearing from you, that I s[hall] [go] down to Seacombe Towers, to make inquiries. He reported that you were from home, and I concluded that you had left directions that your letters were not to be forwarded. But I have no doubt you will get my former letter before sailing.

"I can only repeat my earnest hope, that you will change your plans with the utmost secrecy before the tenth of June. Make some excuse to Lord Lavington, if you are engaged to take another cruise with him, and join the yacht, if you will, later on—anything rather than aid your deadly enemies by carrying out arrangements which must be known to them, and on which they must have calculated.

"I would come to you to urge you by word of mouth to take my advice, but I cannot leave this place at present; and, after all, I could hardly say more to you than I have said in my former letter. I trust you will not stir out of doors on the tenth of this month. May I beg you to give my kind remembrances to Miss Chetwynd?

"Yours very faithfully,

"GEOFFREY L. DUNDAS."

"Poor lad!" said the General, half aloud, in a compassionate tone, as he folded up the letter, "he has got those rascally Hindoos on the brain. And no wonder, I must say, after the experience he has had of them! 'Can't leave this place,' he says. Where is he, then?"

He unfolded the letter again and glanced at the top of the first page.

"Oh! Asnières; some town in France, I suppose. What craze can have taken him there? I will write to him at once, and tell him not to be under any anxiety on our account. With Lavington we shall be as safe as if we were in the Tower of London. I wonder if Lavington means to take this opportunity——"

The General's thoughts did not shape themselves in words after this point; but he could not help wondering why Lord Lavington had not already asked Leila to be his wife. The fact was that Lavington was a slow, cautious man; and he had decided, twelve months before, that it would be as well to see a little more of Miss Chetwynd, charming as she certainly was, before taking the irrevocable step.

He had a remarkably high opinion of the greatness of the house of which he was the head, and a tolerably good opinion of himself. Lady Churchwood had a young friend of her own, whom she had destined, in her own mind, to be her sister-in-law; and her brother's attitude to Leila on the night of the dance in London had opened her eyes, and made her regret that she had so readily yielded to him when he had asked her to send invitations to the General and his daughter.

So, with a woman's skill, she had taken the opportunity a few days later to throw cold water on the Viscount's passion, by letting fall some slighting remarks about Miss Chetwynd's appearance. She did not speak ill-naturedly—she had more sense than that; but she let her brother understand that she looked on the General's daughter as a countrified miss, quite unfit to fill a place in the "smart" world.

These remarks sank into the Viscount's mind. He did not say anything; but he was annoyed with his sister. He had thought Leila Chetwynd delightful, perfectly charming, in fact; yet Gladys did not seem to consider her quite up to the mark in some way. It would not do for him, he acknowledged to himself with a sigh, to marry a woman who was not in all respects worthy to wear a coronet.

He turned the matter over in his mind a good deal, and finally came to the conclusion that Miss Chetwynd was good enough for anybody. What did it matter if her childlike delight in amusements and scenes which were everyday, common-place affairs in the world of fashion were such as to amuse women of the world like Gladys? She would soon throw off that unsophisticated style.

He resolved to ask the General and Leila to join their yachting party for a trip to the Mediterranean in the spring. He would then be able to renew his acquaintance with the young lady; and if she seemed as desirable as she had appeared to him during the last cruise, he would take the plunge before the yacht returned to England.

The trip to the Mediterranean had to be delayed, however, because the new yacht, the Aphrodite, was not quite ready for sea; and it was nearly the end of April before Lord Lavington, meeting the General one day in Plymouth, pressed him so earnestly to accept his invitation for the first cruise in the Aphrodite that Sir Arthur felt compelled to say "Yes."

After a little hesitation—for the General was a little hurt to think that the Viscount had not spoken to Leila during the preceding summer—he asked Lord Lavington to spend a few days at Seacombe Towers. The invitation could not be accepted, as Lavington had made engagements up to the time of the yacht sailing; but his sincerity in declaring that he would gladly have accepted the offer if his time had been at his own disposal was manifest; and the two men parted very good friends.

Leila was looking forward to the trip with even more than her usual enthusiasm. She was sure that Italy and Greece must be beautiful beyond words; she thought of the cruise all day long, and dreamt of it at night.

"Have you got through your letters by this time, papa?" she called out from the terrace.

For reply, the General beckoned to her; and Leila soon joined him on the lawn, bringing some "work" with her.

"I have just heard from Geoffrey—Mr. Dundas, I mean. He desires to be kindly remembered to you."

The General did not fail to notice the start and quick look of glad surprise that came into his daughter's eyes as he spoke.

Preferred the company of a little orphan niece.

"Confound the fellow!" he said to himself. "He may have done more mischief than I know of."

"Please send him my kind regards when you write," said Leila demurely.

The General grunted, but said nothing.

"Where is Mr. Dundas now? Is he still in Canada or the States?"

The girl tried to speak in a common-place voice; but she could not control her blushes, and she felt that she was betraying herself.

"He is in France," said her father coldly.

"In France! What is he doing there?"

"I don't know. He didn't think fit to tell me."

"Papa!" cried the girl, alarmed at her father's tone, "is anything the matter—I mean anything wrong—between you and Geoffrey—I mean, Mr. Dundas?"

"Since when, Leila, have you taken to calling young men by their Christian names? But there, my dear," he added, seeing that the girl looked terribly confused, and almost as if she were going to cry, "never mind. I've no doubt your doing so was a mere accident—good thing no one but I overheard you. You must really be more careful. Geoffrey—er—I mean, Dundas seems all right."

"Don't you like him, papa, as well as you used to do?"

"Like him! Of course. Why shouldn't I like him?"

"Why doesn't he come down here?"

"How can I tell? I don't suppose he has been in England since his return."

Leila would have liked to hint that an invitation might be sent to him; but she did not dare to say more.

"I expect the Rajah on Friday," said the General abruptly.

"Oh, that reminds me! Papa, I meant to ask you as a favour to let me invite Jane and Emily Stoddart to stay with me while he is here."

"Hum, my dear! They were here the last time the Rajah was here. Won't it look just a little odd?"

"Odd, papa? No! How? Why?"

"Why do you want them?"

"To keep me in countenance. You see, with the Hindoo for our only guest, if I am alone in the house——"

"It might be awkward for you—I see—I see. Very well, my dear, have them by all means. And their father, too, if he'll come. A British officer is surely good enough company for an Indian prince, whatever the difference in their purses may be."

"Thank you, papa. I will ask him; and I am sure he will be pleased with the invitation, whether he accepts it or not. Is it quite settled, about our trip?"

"Quite settled, my love. Why do you ask?"

"I was afraid something might interfere to prevent our going. It seems almost too good to be true that we are to go on such a delightful cruise!"

"No, my dear," said the General, lighting his long-neglected cigar, and settling himself down behind the Times; "nothing has happened to prevent our going, and nothing is likely to happen. God willing, we sail on the ninth—and lucky it is the ninth," he added, under his breath. "If it had happened to be the tenth that had been fixed for our departure, that foolish boy, Geoffrey, would have been ready to swear we would never come back; and I, myself—well, under the circumstances, I confess I should not have cared to sail on the tenth of June."

CHAPTER XX.

TRAPPED.

ON the day after this conversation, Jane and Emily Stoddart arrived at Seacombe Towers. The Lieutenant excused himself. He was too old, he said, to care for society. He preferred the company of a little orphan niece who shared his house, his pipe, and his newspaper, to that of all the Hindoos in creation.

A day or two later the Rajah made his appearance, bringing with him Chunder Sen and two Hindoo servants.

The house party was not so gay as that of the year before had been; but the Rajah seemed to be enjoying himself in a quiet way.

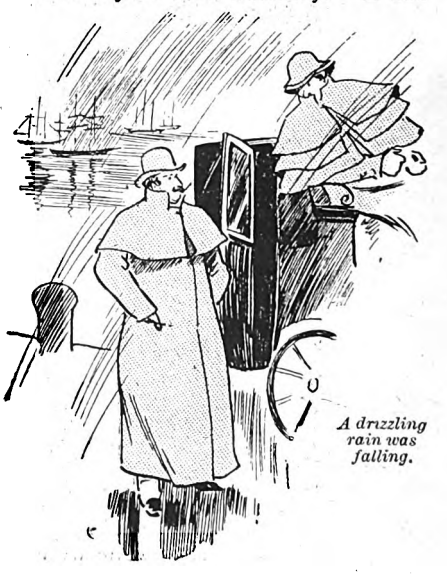
He played at chess a good deal, sometimes with the General, sometimes with one of the Stoddart girls, both of whom were very fair players. He made several attempts to teach Leila the royal game; but she always declared, after a quarter of an hour's close attention, that she was too stupid to learn; and the Hindoo relinquished the effort with a sigh, and a bow which made the simple English girl feel almost as if she were being ridiculed.

But the ninth of June, the day of departure, was fast approaching; and soon everybody who was to be of the yachting party was busy with preparations—all but the Rajah. He never seemed to concern himself about anything. His arrangements were all made days beforehand; his wishes were carried out with the certainty and smoothness of clock-work.

He never was in a hurry, never showed more than a languid interest in any subject of conversation. There was an aloofness about him that would have distinguished him from the rest of mankind—Anglo-Saxon mankind, at all events—even if his skin had been as white as an Englishman's.

One of the General's footmen, a young fellow named Brown, volunteered to sail with the party as personal attendant to the Rajah; and for two or three days he had to submit to be instructed by the Rajah's valet in his new duties.

The ninth of June fell that year on a Saturday. It had been arranged that the Aphrodite should leave the Thames, where she was taking in stores, in time to reach Plymouth on Saturday forenoon, and the final start was to be made on Sunday, or early on Monday morning. Lord Lavington and his friends were to embark at Gravesend, while the General and his party were to leave Seacombe Towers on Saturday morning, and join the yacht at Plymouth on the afternoon of the same day.



A drizzling rain was falling.

On Thursday of that week Chunder Sen and the Hindoo who acted as the Rajah's personal attendant left for London. A difficulty had arisen as to providing a cook for the Rajah; but this was fortunately overcome.

One of the General's old army friends who lived near London had a Hindoo servant who had been with him for many years, and had proved himself to be thoroughly trustworthy; and the General asked his friend to let this man accompany the Rajah in the capacity of cook, if he could be spared a few weeks.

The Hindoo was willing to go, and the old Anglo-Indian was delighted to oblige his friend; so it was agreed that the man should join the Aphrodite at once, in London. The Rajah's own cook was to leave his master at Plymouth and proceed to join his fellow-countrymen in town.

On Friday forenoon, while Leila was kneeling beside a trunk in her little boudoir, her father burst into the room, his face a fiery red, and an open telegram in his hand.

"Here's a pretty thing to ask!" he cried out. "Confound the man's impudence, I say. I shan't go! I shan't change my arrangements for any peer in the country."

"What is it, papa? I don't understand," said Leila, rising to her feet.

"Just listen——" and the General read the telegram aloud:

"'Yacht Aphrodite, Plymouth, Friday morning. Compelled to sail at latest daybreak, Saturday morning. Can you possibly join us here to-night? So sorry to put you to inconvenience, but cannot possibly be helped. Our sailing on Saturday a necessity. Will explain when we meet. Please wire reply. Will wait arrival of last train. — LAVINGTON.'

"There! What do you think of that? Do you call that civil? To invite us weeks ago to take this confounded cruise, and then change the time of joining at the last moment. I shan't go!"

"Oh, papa!"

Leila's hands hung down by her sides. She looked the picture of despair.

"Why couldn't he have let us know sooner?"

"I suppose they have just arrived in the yacht from London."

"Then why couldn't he have telegraphed before leaving town? Eh?"

"I don't know, papa, I'm sure."

"It is treating me with something like—with a want of that consideration which is due to a guest," said Sir Arthur, in his grandest manner. "I will not go."

"But the Rajah, papa?"

"The Rajah is a gentleman. He will see the matter as I do. But I am sorry, I am humiliated, to think that one of our aristocracy should put this affront on him."

"Papa, don't you take this matter a little too seriously? After all, Lord Lavington ——"

"Seriously! Too seriously! Upon my word!"

"I beg your pardon, papa; I do indeed!"

"That's right, my girl."

"Of course, I shall be awfully disappointed."

"I am sorry; but I see no help for it."

There was a silence, during which Sir Arthur stood with his hands in his pockets, looking out of the window. Then an inspiration came to Leila. She waited for a minute or two, and then said in a tone which was certainly unusual with her:

"There's some sort of entertainment on board to-night."

"It is abominable conduct in Lord Lavington! It is unpardonable. I suppose you will cut him next time you meet."

"I'm not sure, my dear," answered her father, after a pause, "that that would be the proper course to take. It seems hardly important enough for that. I don't think I would be justified in cutting him."

"He ought to have told you the reason of his changing his plans"

"Perhaps it was too long to be explained in a telegram."

"Well, it doesn't matter. I shall never speak to him again."

The General walked up and down the room, thoughtfully pulling his moustache. Now that he saw the thing a little closer, in the light of Leila's remarks, his anger was beginning to cool down.

There might be some really urgent reason for setting off a day sooner than had been intended. Lavington might wish to avoid having to ask some bore to accompany them. At any rate, it was civil in him to bring the yacht round to Plymouth for them, when they were in such a hurry to be off.

And it would be a pity to upset all the arrangements—Leila's whole future might depend on her going. And Lavington was really a good sort of fellow. "He must have had some strong reason for putting us all to such great inconvenience," said the General.

Leila, standing by, watched her father's face.

"It really doesn't matter, papa; and there isn't time now to pack up in time to catch the evening train."

This was touching the old campaigner on his tenderest point.

"Not time!" he growled out. "Why, I could pack for a voyage to India let alone a trip to the Mediterranean, in something under half an hour. But with you it may be a different matter."

"Oh, don't let me stand in the way," said Leila in an indifferent tone. "As it happens, most of my things are packed already, and I can easily be ready in time."

"Come now, Leila," said the General, smiling; "don't pretend that you don't care whether we go or stay. You would be disappointed if we didn't go, wouldn't you? You said so a little while ago."

"To tell the truth, papa, I would be more disappointed than I have ever been before, all my life!"

"Then, my darling, we will go."

He rang the bell, met the servant who answered it on the stairs, and issued half a dozen orders in as many seconds.

At half-past six that evening the General and his party left the Towers.

* * * *

It was dusk when they reached Plymouth; and a drizzling rain was falling. By the time Sir Arthur had seen his luggage loaded upon two cabs, and put his daughter and the Rajah into a third, it was almost dark.

When they got down to the sea front, they found that the wind had risen. It was coming in from the sea with a moaning sound, and sending the salt water up on the rocks in great smooth billows.

"Boat, sir?" cried half a dozen men at once, surrounding the cab in which the General was seated.

"I want to go on board the Aphrodite," said the General, putting out his head.

"All right, sir. This way, sir."

"But do you know her? Have you seen her?"

"Can't say as I do, sir; but we'll find her if she's in the harbour. What sort of a vessel might she be, sir?"

"She's a steam yacht, of a hundred and fifty or two hundred tons, I fancy. She only came round from the Thames to-day."

There was a momentary silence among the group of watermen.

"Oh, I know," said one of them at last. "She'll be that new-looking black yacht that came in yesterday."

"Not yesterday," said the General. Then he remembered that it was only an inference of his own that the yacht had only arrived that day.

"That's her, sir, showing the white light at the side. Take you over in a jiffy."

At this moment a burly figure pressed through the crowd. "Be you for the Aphrodite, sir?" he asked, touching his cap.

"Yes. And you?"

"I was sent ashore for your party. Been lying here about three hours," said the man in a surly tone.

The General looked at him. He wore a sort of undress uniform, such as is worn by the petty officers on board well-appointed yachts.

"Where is your boat?" he asked sharply.

"Just down here, sir. But I have only two men in her, and they can't leave her with this wind blowing on shore," and he glanced at the pile of luggage as he spoke.

"That needn't trouble you," said the General drily. "Bear a hand, one or two of you, and carry the luggage down," he said to the men standing near.

They sprang forward at once; and a few minutes later Leila found herself seated in a boat that seemed dreadfully small and low in the water, being pulled slowly out seaward.

The General said something by way of encouragement to one of the men rowing, but the sailor did not answer him.

"They're Lascars," said the English seaman who had first accosted them.

"Oh, that will be so interesting!" whispered Leila to her father. "There were no Lascars on board the Pallas, were there?"

"No, my dear; there were not. And I rather wonder at Lord Lavington—however, I suppose it is usual nowadays to fill up with foreign sailors."

As he spoke, the portholes of the yacht which they were slowly approaching became lit up.

The caged lion.

"There's some sort of entertainment on board to-night," explained the boatswain. "Lord Lavington gave orders that if you didn't come before it began you was to be took straight to your cabins in the first place. He said you'd most likely take some supper after your journey."

"Very true," cried the General. "I, for one, shall be glad of something. And of course we must have it in our own cabins, as the saloon will be occupied."

All this time the Rajah sat without uttering a word, his eyes fixed on the yacht.

As they drew near the boatswain hailed, and an indistinct sound floated over the dark water in reply. The rain was coming down faster now, and Leila wondered whether she would be able to get to her cabin before she was wet through. Of course by this time it was quite dark, and nothing could be made out on board the Aphrodite. It was evident, however, that they had been heard, for a lantern was hung over the side, and a short step ladder was run down.

In a very few minutes they stood on the vessel's deck.

"This way, sir; I'll show you to your berths," said the boatswain.

The thought passed through the General's mind that Lavington might have left the saloon for a few minutes to welcome him and his daughter; but he was anxious to be under cover, and hardly gave the matter a second thought.

He found that the cabin allotted to him opened from a small open space just outside the saloon door, at the foot of the cabin stair. There was a corresponding cabin on the other, the port side of the ship; and to this Leila was conducted.

The General's cabin was of fair size and comfortably furnished. On a small tray in the lower of the two berths—there were two berths, though only one was to be occupied—was a tray with cold ham and chicken, and other eatables, as well as a decanter of sherry. The soldier eyed it wistfully, and then, deciding that he might as well eat first and dress afterwards, he drew a camp-stool up to the side of the berth, and attacked the provisions.

Before his meal was ended he felt the throb, throb of the engines, and knew that the vessel was moving through the water.

"Hallo!" he said to himself, "Lavington has lost no time. I remember he said they must sail at daybreak at latest. I suppose he thinks we may as well escape from this climate—and quite right too."

Having finished supper the General went to his cabin door to call the steward.

The door was locked.

"I say! What the dickens!"

Even then no suspicion of treachery crossed Sir Arthur's mind. He simply supposed that some bolt had been accidentally pushed home, or that something was the matter with the lock.

He knocked on the door, and called aloud.

No answer.

He knocked again, and before an answer could have come it seemed as if a lightning flash had darted through his brain, withering up all ideas, all feelings but one—they were trapped, they were prisoners!

"My God!" cried the old man, clutching his heart.

In that one moment he seemed to taste the bitterness of many deaths.

Could he be mistaken?

He sprang to the door, and rained blows upon it, then paused to listen. No sound but one only—Leila's voice answered him indistinctly.

"Oh, Father in Heaven! My innocent child!" cried the unhappy man, sinking on his knees. "Let not my past sins be visited on her head!"

For a few seconds he remained so, his face covered with his hands.

Then he sprang to his feet. It was well for Chunder Sen and his friends that none of them were at that moment within reach of the caged lion.

Lifting his foot he drove it with all his force upon the lower panel. It split—and revealed the fact that two narrow, but thick, pieces of wood had been fastened lengthwise on the outside of the door. The cabin had been converted into a cell.

He put his face down to the split panel and called out:

"Leila! Leila, my darling, do you hear me?"

"Yes, papa, I can hear you. But I can't get out. Somebody has locked the door, or else the lock is out of order Was it you who made that dreadful noise?"

"Yes, it was I, my child. I, too, want to get out."

"Have both our doors got fastened? Why doesn't somebody come and open them?"

"Because, my love—Leila, you are a brave girl, I know. Remember you are a soldier's daughter."

"Yes, papa."

"Can you bear some very bad news?"

"I will try."

"You won't faint? You must not faint, for no help can come to you if you do."

"No, papa, I won't faint. But what does this all mean? I can't understand it."

"My dear, I'm afraid I've made a dreadful mistake. I don't think we are on board Lord Lavington's yacht at all!"

"Oh, how funny! And they have shut us up, taking us for bad characters, I suppose. But why don't the people of the yacht come and let us explain who we are?"

The General could not speak.

"Why don't they come, papa, or send someone?"

"My child, I fear that the yacht does not belong to—to honest people."

"You don't mean pirates, papa?"

"Something of that sort. What they mean to do with us, I don't know."

"Do you mean we shall have to pay ransom for our lives?"

"Perhaps. But, Leila, my dear, since I have got you into this horrible mess, try to put a bold front on it. We are quite helpless, I fear, at present. We must put our trust in God that no harm will befall us. Is there a lock on your door?"

"There is a bolt."

"Bolt the door, then, so that it cannot be opened during the night. And—you have blankets, and sheets, and so on?"

"Yes, the berth is ready."

"Take off some of your things then, and lie down. Try to sleep, and perhaps sleep will come. Promise me that you will."

"Yes, I will try. But isn't it all very, very strange?"

"Yes, my darling. But I can tell you no more."

"Good night, then, papa. Isn't the yacht moving."

"Yes, I know she is."

"Where are we bound for, then?"

"Ah, my darling, I wish I could tell you!"

"Well, good night, papa. You must try to sleep, too!"

"Brave girl!" cried the General to himself. "Not a cry, not a tear, though she must know, she must guess, that we are in terrible danger."

It may be imagined that the General did not close his eyes that night. "Oh, fool! fool! fool!" he moaned to himself. Now that it was too late, it seemed madness to have neglected Geoffrey's warning, to put implicit faith in a telegram that any one might send, to trust that villainous seaman with his Lascar comrades.

"I might have known the instant I stepped on board," he said to himself. "But by that time it was too late. And the Rajah? What has become of him? Is he a prisoner, too? No; for we should have heard him shouting. Besides, they would never dare to imprison him. Then he must be one of the gang—a traitor, a double-dyed traitor! And I would have trusted that man with my life!"

Her Answer

THE fishing fleet had set out early in the morning. The atmosphere was very clear, and the boats could still be seen in the distance, strung out in a long line across the horizon, between the Criel beach and the Points de Cayeux.

A few sailors' wives, children, and old men, still loitered on the jetty, all in excellent humour, for with such weather there should certainly be a fine haul of fish. The sea was admirably blue, but, lashed by the wind, it broke into little waves, which rushed, white-capped, towards the shore.

"Do you see it yet, mamma!" asked a little fellow who had stayed away from school that morning in order to see his father start with the fleet.

His mother had a telescope—a luxury that her neighbours envied her. In such clear weather as this if they could not distinguish the men they could at least make out the numbers on the sails.

He would have remained a long time watching his father's sloop as it grew smaller and smaller in the distance, but his mother led him away. They must go back to the house to their work.

They loitered by the side of the harbour, which had lost its animation now that its fleet of fishing craft was gone.

Madame Fournier stopped mechanically in the centre of the quay to look at a fine English three-master, the Harding, which came every week with a cargo of coal. A sailor, leaning over the rail of the ship, saw her, and waved his cap gaily to her. She turned away and hurried up the Rue de la Falaise to her home.

Two hours later the loungers of the Rue de la Falaise were greatly surprised to see Master Fournier, the owner of the fishing sloop T 672 hastening angrily homeward.

He had not entered the house before the neighbours had run to learn the reason of his sudden return.

Why had he come back?

It was that way that they had of leaving port with all sails set, whatever the weather, which was known all up and down the coast as "Treport sailing."

Her backstay had been broken, and Fournier had had to come back to port for repairs. These were already under way, and, once he had seen his men at work, he had come up to see his wife a moment.

"Your wife—she has gone out, but she will be back directly."

He was pouring himself out a glass of thin wine from the pitcher he had drawn that morning before leaving, when he noticed the inkstand open on the table, and the pen beside it, still wet with ink.

It was his son's pen and inkstand, but as the little fellow never wrote during the day he concluded that his wife must must have been writing. Almost at the same moment he noticed a letter in the blue vase on the mantelpiece, and, without thinking, he opened it and read:

"MADAME FOURNIER,—I love you more than I can tell. I implore you to set a time when we can meet. You are free—your husband is gone.

"HARRY EVANS."

"Oh, heavens!" cried Fournier, "Harry Evans!"

He knew him well, this handsome English sailor of the Harding, who had already ruined more than one home in Treport—a tall fellow, as tall as Fournier himself, fair, with the complexion of a girl and tender blue eyes.

He sprang up to rush to the quay and strangle the Englishman when he heard his wife returning. Evidently she had answered that insulting letter, and she would tell him what answer she had given. He trusted his wife.

"I hurried back," she said, as she came in, "I heard of the accident as I was doing my marketing."

As she laid the purchase she had made on the table he had time to thrust the letter back into the vase. He would wait for her to speak.

Madame Fournier continued to busy herself with her household duties. He watched her and he found her still young, browned like himself, almost as tall, gracefully poised on her pointed sabots, and with a waist still slender.

From time to time she looked at him with a smile: she was not surprised to see him looking sombre after the accident. She did not say anything about it, for she had given him her advice on the subject long ago, and it was the sole matter on which they disagreed.

"Wife, have you nothing new to tell me?"

"Nothing, my dear husband."

His face contracted as with a sudden pain. His wife, thinking it due to chagrin at the accident, kissed him tenderly.

He pressed her to him with unaccustomed force. Never, even in the fiercest tempest, had he suffered as he suffered now. Suspicion entering his simple, loyal heart, ravaged it terribly.

"Well, good-bye. I am going to the harbour. We shall go out with the next tide if the backstay is repaired. Good-bye!"

She accompanied him to the end of the street, and bade him farewell so frankly, that he asked himself if it were possible that such a woman could lie.

He was about to go to the Harding, when one of his crew saw him and came after him. Compelled to return to his vessel he had time to reflect. A sudden fit of rage—a fight—would prove nothing, and he would never know the truth.

So he calmly watched the work of reparation, which was going on apace. At twelve o'clock his wife brought him his breakfast; at five his son came to kiss him good-bye; and that evening he set sail again, after having seen the Harding leave Treport for England.

The following Saturday, after a terrible tempest, the fishing fleet returned to Treport laden with a fine catch of fish. Master Fournier looked quickly to see if the English three-master was at the quay, but she was not there.

Disembarking, he learnt that the Harding had gone down in sight of Spithead, and that all on board had been lost.

Harry Evans, then, was dead. His wife alone knew the truth; he would not dare to question her; he would never know the truth—he would doubt her always!

From that time every one in Treport remarked that Master Fournier had grown taciturn. They asked his wife the reason, but she replied evasively that she did not know.

His crew found him rougher than before and more avaricious. He often returned to Treport on Sunday morning and left again the same evening without a night's rest.

One week he came back on Tuesday and the news spread that the St. Laurent had brought back the corpse of a drowned man. According to the custom of that part of the coast Master Fournier had given orders to return to port, losing his catch of fish in order to bury the dead.

Accompanied by two of his crew he made his deposition before the commissioner, and the latter had him sign the declaration that "the body of a drowned man had been recovered by the St. Laurent at a point fifteen miles south-south-west of Spithead, measuring five feet ten inches in height, dressed in a blue shirt, trousers of grey cloth and neckerchief of red cotton; no papers, no marks to establish identity; supposed, from the place of drowning, in default of other evidence, to be one of the crew of the Harding."

Early the next morning a funeral procession traversed the little village and bore to the church the remains of the unknown sailor found by the St. Laurent. Behind the coffin walked the crew of the St. Laurent, their master at their head, and behind the men came the wives or mothers of the sailors.

The religious ceremony was brief, but respectfully followed, and the unknown dead was conducted to the cemetery by the great family of sailors of Treport, who honour themselves in thus honouring the remains of others.

"Get yourselves ready," announced Master Fournier to his men; "we go to sea directly."

Fournier led his wife to a little knoll a few paces away from the cemetery. He wished to speak with her without witnesses.

"Wife," he said, "do you know for whom you have come to pray?"

She trembled and pressed her husband's hand. She had never seen him so solemn. "The man we have just buried was Harry Evans—wait!"

Madame Fournier turned pale. Her husband tendered her a paper, stained as if with water.

"Wife, I have doubted you. My punishment is to accuse myself of it. I read the letter he dared to write you, and I have been very miserable. The other night when this drowned man was found, I searched him. I could not show to others, not even to the commissioner, the only paper he had on him, in a little bag of oiled silk. The water had dimmed it a little, but I have read it nevertheless."

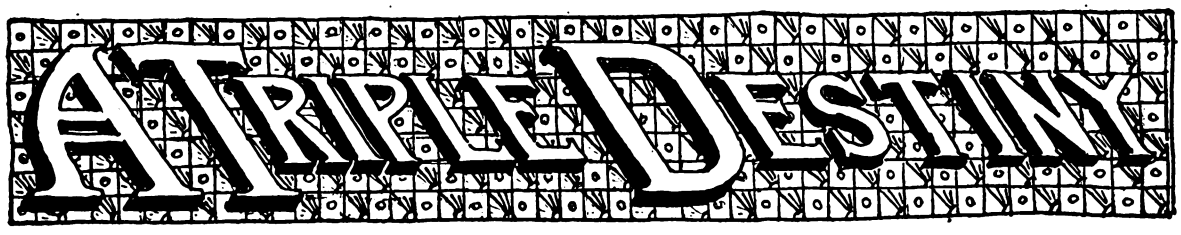
It was the answer written to the handsome English sailor by Madame Fournier.

"Sir; I love my husband; that is the sole answer I can make to your letter. I shall say nothing to my husband, for he would kill you. Never come here again."

"Wife, do you forgive me?"

"Oh, my poor husband, how you have suffered."

From that day Master Fournier grew young and gay again; but nothing can keep him from going out with all sails set.



I.

ALTHOUGH she was barely fifteen, the daughter of the King of Mataquin took pleasure in dwelling on the delights that must follow a maiden who was loved by a really charming prince. One morning, whilst the ladies of her bed-chamber were occupied before the great mirror in dressing her hair, which was very long and very beautiful, the Princess took it into her head to declare that she would be very glad to be married.

No doubt such an avowal was hardly the correct thing. It is not fitting that a damsel should so openly lay bare her secret thoughts on this subject. If such frankness ever ceases to be considered reprehensible, the day will not be far distant when we shall be deafened by the voices of the countless multitudes of girls, young and old, pretty and ugly, rushing through the streets and crying, "A husband, a husband!"

However, the Fairy Hulda, who was godmother to the Princess, was not angry with her for the desire that she so unceremoniously disclosed. She was an amiable fairy, full of indulgence, although she was not wholly devoid of a certain coldblooded jesting humour.

The doors of the bed-chamber of the Princess suddenly flew open as if by magic, and the fairy entered, gloriously clad and with a very good-humoured expression. Six little negroes, who must have been African gnomes, bore three coffers after her. These coffers were the most beautiful that ever appeared in the world. The first was made of chased silver, the second of refined gold, the third was all glittering with jewels.

"Good-day to you, god-daughter."

"Good-day, god-mother."

"So it is true that, like the impatient rosebuds that are anxious to unfold their leaves, you are in a hurry to find a husband?"

"It is true, god-mother, that I should have no great aversion to marriage if I was offered a husband such as my fancy has painted. To say all in one word, he must be like the young prince whom I see now and then—in my dreams."

"What is he like, this prince that you dream of, god-daughter?"

"Oh! more charming than any prince that mortal eyes can see!"

"That is of not much value as a description; is there nothing more?"

"In the first place, he is clothed with all the magnificence and good taste that are possible."

"Kings' sons richly clad are not rare in the neighbouring countries."

"In his exquisite face are placed lips that are fresh and rosy as a rose that is wet with early dew."

"There is no lack of princes with good mouths."

"In his blue eyes I saw so infinitely deep a sweetness, that one who looks at them imagines that he sees all the depths of heaven through two translucent sapphires."

"Hum! hum!" said the fairy. "Eyes with all that in them are not very common. Perhaps it will give you some trouble to find their fellows. Happily, as I am kind, and do not desire to expose you to the possibility of repenting of whatever choice you make, you will be allowed to marry three times. It is surely very hard if in three chances you do not meet with a husband who entirely suits you."

"What! three times, godmother?" cried the Princess, with a furious blush.

"Not all at once, of course. You must take care to put reasonable intervals between your successive weddings Besides, although you are allowed to marry three times, the fates will not force you to do so. Nothing forbids you to stop at the first, if you are happy in it. But at the worst you can have three chances. So I have brought you these three coffers. In the first, which is made of chased silver, there is a robe of white satin and point lace, which you shall wear for your first nuptials. In the second, which is of refined gold, I have caused to be put a dress embroidered with the sun and stars, which you shall wear to enrapture your second husband. And the dress for the third wedding, the most beautiful of all, is enclosed in the third coffer, that which is all glittering with jewels."

II.

Not long thereafter the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda came to the Court of the King of Mataquin to ask for the hand of the King's daughter in marriage, for the fame of her beauty had gone out through all the nations of the earth. Never had it fallen to anyone's lot to see a prince so gorgeously apparelled as this. Over satins that seemed to be made of luminous snow, and muslins light and rosy as the clouds of the dawn, he wore broidery of pearls and rubies, beryls and carbuncles that shone like blossoms of fire. The Princess was dazzled by them, and made no difficulty about marrying the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda.

She opened the coffer of chased silver, and drew from it the robe of white satin and point lace, in which she attired herself with delight for the wedding ceremony.

But it was not long before she discovered that fine feathers do not make fine birds. When her husband appeared of a morning in his dressing-gown he had nothing in common with the young prince of whom she had dreamed. Where were the tender eyes, deep and sweet as the infinite skies?

Little by little she became very despondent, often spending a whole day in her private apartments, and weeping out of sight. Thus she had all imaginable trouble to show signs of a decent grief the day that her attendants brought her the news that the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda, who was a mighty hunter, had been devoured by lions amongst the hills.

III.

When she had worn her weeds for more than six months, something began to whisper in her heart that nothing forced her to remain a widow. She felt her heart stirred by a thrill of tenderness at the sight of a cavalier who had just arrived at the Court, and who had overcome the most valiant knights of her father in the great tournament. Not only was this new-comer magnificently attired, but in his beaming face were found lips that were fresh and rosy as a rose that is wet with morning dew. The Princess could hardly restrain her joy when she learnt that this cavalier had formed the fixed design of marrying her. At once she gave her consent to this new engagement.

From the coffer of refined gold she drew the robe that was embroidered with the sun and stars, in which she clad herself with bliss on the morning of the wedding day.

But she was not long in perceiving, in spite of the rapture of kisses, that it is not enough for a prince to have beautiful attire and a mouth like a fresh-blown rose in order to assure the happiness of a damsel so exacting as herself.

Even this husband was not the Prince who had shown himself in her enchanted vision. Not his were the soft blue eyes like translucent sapphires. She grew to loathe the days and pass the nights in weeping, more unhappy than tongue can tell. The truth is, that it was a great effort for her not to smile through her tears when the news came that the cavalier—who was a knight-errant ever on the scent of adventures—had been slain by a wicked magician in an enchanted forest.

IV.

A year passed, and still the Princess had not thought of other nuptials. The two first experiences had been two painful for her to have heart to venture upon a third. She told herself that she would never find the husband of her dreams, and gave herself up to melancholy musings. But one evening, while she walked in an avenue of the royal park, she saw a youth approaching her in the dusk who seemed more beautiful than any mortal.

Was he really a human being, or rather some angel come down from Paradise? He seemed to be clad in robes of starry light. His mouth was like a fresh rose, but such a rose for beauty as never maiden found in any earthly garden. When he came beside her, there was in his blue eyes so infinitely deep a sweetness that she seemed to gaze at all the depths of heaven through two translucent sapphires.

This time, at last, she had found the mate whom she longed for. He stood beside her, like in all points to the delightful apparition of her dream. When he said, in a voice softer than the murmuring of the breeze upon the water, "Will you marry me, beautiful Princess?" she felt as if overcome by such languor that she seemed to be dying of too much happiness.

When the day of the nuptial ceremony arrived she opened the last coffer, which was all glittering with precious stones, in order to take from it the robe of the third wedding, which was to be the most beautiful of all.

But in the coffer there lay one strange garment. It was a linen shroud.

Then the Princess began to mourn, for she understood that the moment of her death was at hand. Taken with a sudden illness, she gave up the ghost before the fall of night. Her attendants wrapped her in the linen shroud, and laid her reverently in the coffer that glittered with precious stones. For to no one here below is it given to grasp the full fruition of an ideal. It is not upon this earth that princesses marry princes who have at once magnificent apparel, lips fresh as flowers, and eyes in which are seen the infinite blue depths of heaven.

IN TERROR OF DEATH.

"You know," said Manuel, "what a sorrowful day for Tarragona was the 28th of June, 1811. But you cannot imagine the horrors attending the city. You did not see 5,000 Spaniards perish in ten hours; you did not see houses and churches in flames; you did not see unarmed old men and helpless women slaughtered in cold blood; you did not see pillage and drunkenness mingling with murder; you did not see, in short, one of the greatest exploits of the conqueror of the world, the hero of our age, the demi-god Napoleon!

"I saw it all. I saw the sick rise from their bed of suffering, dragging after them their sheets, like shrouds, to perish at the hands of foreign soldiers on the threshold over which the day before had passed the Viaticum! I saw lying in the street the body of a woman they had slaughtered, and at her side her infant, still nursing at its dead mother's breast. I saw the husband, with hands tied together, witnessing the murder of his wife; children weeping with terror at the horrors that surrounded them; despair and innocence taking refuge in suicide; impiety insulting the dead.

"Dangerously wounded and unable to take further part in the conflict, I fled for refuge to Clara's house.

"Full of anguish and terror, she stood at the window fearing for my life and risking her own to see me in case I should chance to pass through the street.

"I entered and fastened the door, but my pursuers had already caught sight of Clara—and she was so beautiful.

"They saluted her with a roar of savage joy and a burst of brutal laughter. A moment more and the door would yield to the axe and the flames. We were lost!

"Clara's mother, carrying in her arms her year-old babe, led us to the cistern or reservoir of the house, which was very deep and which was now dry, as no rain had fallen for several months, and there we concealed ourselves. This cistern, the floor of which might measure eight yards square, and which was entered by a steep underground flight of steps, narrowed, towards the top, like the mouth of a well, and opened into the centre of the courtyard, where a breast-work was built round it, above which two buckets were suspended from hooks attached to an iron bar for drawing water.

"The child I have spoken of, whose name was Miguel, was Clara's brother, that is to say, the youngest child of the unhappy woman whom the French had just made a widow.

"In the cistern we four might find safety. Seen from the yard, the cistern seemed a simple well. The French would think we had made our escape by the roof.

"They soon declared that such was the case, uttering horrible imprecations while they rested themselves in the shady yard, in the centre of which was the cistern.

"Yes, we were saved! Clara bound up my bleeding hand, her mother nursed Miguel, and I, although I was shivering from the chill which had followed the fever caused by my wound, smiled with happiness.

"At this moment we noticed that the soldiers, wishing, doubtless, to slake their thirst, were trying to draw water from the cistern in which we were concealed.

"Picture to yourself our anguish at that instant!

"We drew aside to make way for the bucket, which descended until it touched the floor.

"We scarcely dared to breathe.

"The bucket was drawn up again.

"'The well is dry,' cried the soldiers.

"'There must be water upstairs,' exclaimed one.

"'They are going away!' we all said to ourselves.

"'What if they should be concealed in this well,' cried a voice in Catalan.

"It was a renegade—a Spaniard—who had betrayed us.

"'What nonsense!' responded the Frenchman. 'They could not have got down there so suddenly.'

"'That is true,' responded the renegade.

"They did not know that the cistern could be entered by an underground passage, whose door or trap, carefully concealed in the floor of a dark cellar somewhat distant from the house, it would be impossible to discover. We had, however, committed the imprudence of locking the iron grating which cut off the communication between the cistern and the passage, and we could not open it without making a great deal of noise.

"Imagine, then, the cruel fluctuations between hope and fear, with which we had listened to the dialogue carried on by those wretches on the very brink of the well. From the corners in which we were crouching we could see the shadows of their heads, moving within the circle of light on the floor of the cistern. Every second seemed to us a century.

"At this moment the babe Miguel began to cry.

"But at his first whimper his mother silenced the sounds that threatened to betray our hiding-place, pressing the infant's tender face to her bosom.

"'Did you hear that?' cried some one in the yard above.

"'I heard nothing,' responded another.

"'Let us listen,' said the renegade.

"Three horrible minutes passed.

"Miguel struggled to get his voice, and the more closely his mother pressed his face into her bosom, the more violent were his struggles.

"But not the slightest sound was audible.

"'It must have been an echo,' exclaimed the soldiers.

"And they all took their departure, and we could hear the noise of their steps and the clanking of their sabres slowly dying away in the direction of the gate.

"The danger was passed.

"But, alas! our deliverance had come too late.

"Baby Miguel neither cried nor struggled now.

"He was dead!"

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduc ion within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending Four penny stamps a book 'Corpulency and the Cure,' 256 pages, containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

"Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, 'Corpulency and the Cure' (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 4d.), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos=i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes—'I am just half the size.' A fourth—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Marvellous Increase in Circulation ! !

SHORT STORIES.

A 20pp. 4to. Weekly Magazine.

It is now little over twelve months since this magazine came into the hands of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. It has during that period more than DOUBLED ITS CIRCULATION. This has been caused chiefly by the vast improvement in its literary standard, and the increased facilities for publication. Further efforts in this direction are being made, and a consequent further advance in circulation is confidently anticipated. A Story entitled "The Tenth of June," from the powerful pen of Mr. John K. Leys, is now running. This story is being illustrated by Mr. Raymond Potter, whose contributions consist of a number of large sketches each week. No advance in the rates for advertisements has been made, nor is any contemplated until the circulation has reached

100,000 COPIES WEEKLY.

The scale is 10s. per inch, or £10 per page; and, as the advertisements are limited to four pages, the most effective publicity is ensured.

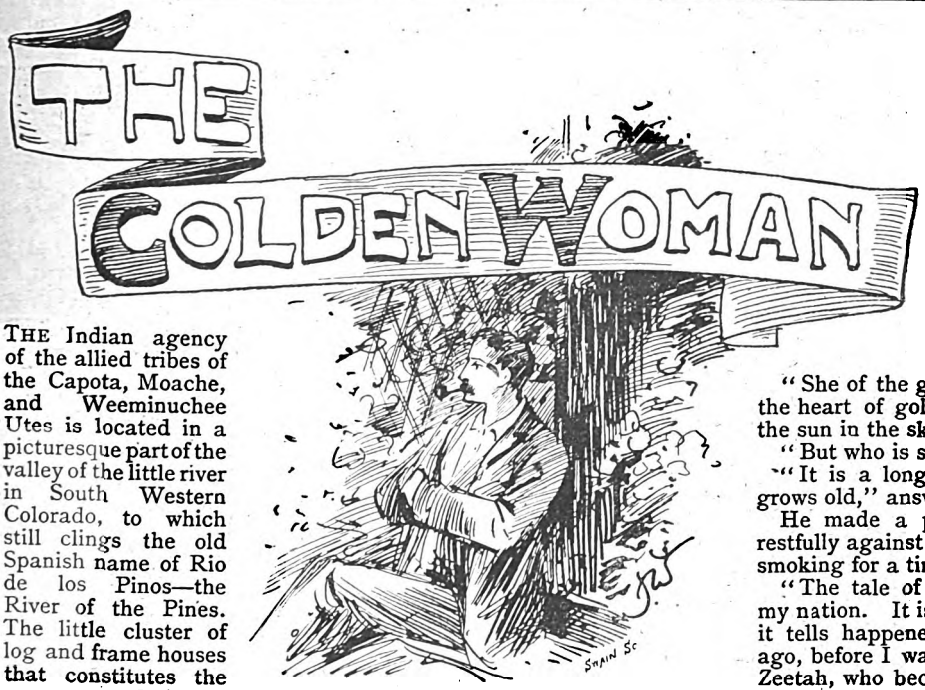
SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 335.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 1, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.



THE Indian agency of the allied tribes of the Capota, Moache, and Weeminuchee Utes is located in a picturesque part of the valley of the little river in South Western Colorado, to which still clings the old Spanish name of Rio de los Pinos—the River of the Pines. The little cluster of log and frame houses that constitutes the agency stands in the narrowest part of the valley, and high mesa walls rise from the river on either side. Far away in the distance on either side, their crests showing high above the mesa lines, can be seen the La Plata Mountains and the mountains that hem in grim old Cumbres Pass.

For a month the old log agency building was my home. During the day I lived among the Indians, listening to their strange tales of magic, of battles and hunts of the golden long ago, before the day of reservations and Indian agents, and at night—the month was March—we clustered about the big open wood fire in the doctor's quarters, and talked of the hundred thousand things that isolated men with time to spare can find to talk of.

One midnight found me sitting in the agency porch smoking and wondering at the beauty of the brilliant moonlight that filled the valley. About two hundred yards from the building was a cluster of can-nees or tents, one of them brilliantly lighted by means of a bright wood fire, and sharp at midnight there went up from this tent a chorus of as weird unearthly wails as I believe a white man has ever listened to. I knew it to be some of the "medicine making" of the Indians, and I thought lazily of going to the place to ascertain if any of the Indians, who were my friends, were there, and if I might witness the ceremony.

I sat so for half an hour, listening to the wail that came from the medicine tent, and, just because I had nothing better to do, I was going to turn in, when, without a sound, old Lo-To-Kah stood before me. He was dressed in full native costume; an eagle feather was in his hair, and he was wrapped in a rich Navajo blanket. He was not known to be on the reservation, and I had not expected to see him.

"Lo-To-Kah," I said in surprise, "where do you come from? Why are you here?"

"I am here, O friend, for two things. One is to see you, for Jose Amarille met me in the Blue Mountains and told me. And the other thing I am here for is to be present at the chant of the Golden Woman. Do you not hear the chant the medicine men are making?"

"I hear the chant," I answered, "but what is it all about? And who is the Golden Woman?"

The old man did not seem to hear me, and he gazed away down the valley as though he saw something. As though speaking to himself he said:

"She of the golden hair. The Golden Woman with the heart of gold! Ah! she was more beautiful than the sun in the sky on a May morning!"

"But who is she, or was she?" I asked.

"It is a long story, O friend of mine, and the night grows old," answered Lo-To-Kah.

He made a pillow of his blanket, and I leant restfully against the log wall of the building. After smoking for a time in silence he said:

"The tale of the Golden Woman is an old tale of my nation. It is a true tale, and the things of which it tells happened in the old time of the long, long ago, before I was fully a man, before I had ever seen Zeetah, who became my wife. Eighteen summers had come into my life, and that was all, and I was but a boy when the Golden Woman was brought captive to one of the encampments of my people. She was tied to a horse, riding astride like a man, and she was so weary that she swooned from faintness and fatigue as soon as she was lifted from the saddle.

"I have but to close my eyes, and in memory I can see that beautiful woman again. I can see her fair face, her eyes as blue as the arch of the sky, and her long silken hair that was of the glorious colour of molten gold. There was a time, too—just a fleeting bit of time scarcely long enough to be remembered—when I gazed upon her and was almost sorry my skin was red instead of white; for I thought if I had been white, and had been of the blood of her race, I might have won her love. Such thoughts were foolish thoughts, amigo, just stray, half-formed thoughts that wandered unasked into the empty head of a boy. And, too, that was before Zeetah had ever been seen by me."

The old man ceased speaking. He leant his head against the wall of the old agency building, a dreamy look came into his eyes, and he gazed down the valley. His cigar went out; I lit a match and offered it to him, but he did not see it.

A belated Indian swain, returning to his tent from some amorous expedition, passed us and spoke, but Lo-To-Kah did not stir. His mind was wandering back to that old time, almost three-quarters of a century gone, when he had been a youth and had known her who was called the Golden Woman. It seemed strange to me that Lo-To-Kah, the savage nobleman who had been a very knight in his loyal devotion to the one woman who had been his wife, should lose himself in a flood of memories of a woman whom I began to believe, he had loved in secret. He had had but one wife; and if a lurking love slept in his heart through all the long years that lay between his youth and his old age, it was a secret that he would not confess, and would not even give a hint of unless in some unguarded moment. After a time he roused himself and said:

"Pardon me, my friend; I was dreaming without being asleep. We old men, when we live past the time that is allotted for action, live over the years again in memory, and I was living over again a time that was old before you were born. I will now go on with my tale.

"When I was a boy, and esteemed by some of the vain-glorious warriors as being too young for battle, a party of our warriors set out on a raid against a roving band of Kiowas that were journeying beyond Tierra Amarillo. I desired to go with the band, and could have gone, except that Mirdo, who was sub-chief and had command of the expedition, said that I should not. This Mirdo had longed to possess my mother when she was a girl, and because she would not wed him, he hated her and my father and myself. Mirdo who was on his horse, stood up in his stirrups, pointed his goad at me and said:

"'I go forth to lead men, and not children, to battle. Yon Lo-To-Kah is called a Ute, because he was born to a Ute woman, but he acts like no Ute. He is now old enough to be a man, to have lovers, to cheat slow old men out of the kisses of their young wives, and to play in the games of kan-yute where men win horses and blankets. He is not a man in love or games, and he will not be a man in war. He cannot go with any band I lead.'

"I stood in silence, my arms crossed upon my heart, and listened to the talk of Mirdo. And as he talked I promised to myself that a time would be when I would hold the throat of Mirdo in my grasp and make him eat his words and beg for his life like a craven. But I spoke no word in answer, for an Indian, as you know, can bide his time when he promises himself to be revenged upon his enemies. And Mirdo and his band rode away, their feathers streaming in the morning sunlight, and I was left in the camp with the women, the children, and the old men.

"It was evening when our warriors returned,—an evening two weeks after they had gone forth, an hour before the going down of the sun, when from far over that mesa that lies towards the cruel heights of Cumbres, we heard a cry of 'ho-la-ho-ho!' The cry was a cry of victory. Soon the men came in sight, riding one ahead of another. Both men and horses showed the signs of long travel and hard riding.

"Mirdo rode at the head, two fresh Kiowa scalps flying from the shoulder of his hunting shirt; and by his side, strapped to her horse and riding astride like a man, was the fairest and most beautiful woman who ever trod the earth of the valley of the River of the Pines.

"I liked not Mirdo and I expected to hear him insult me, but I stood among the tents to greet the warriors. Mirdo rode up with a flourish, dismounted, and called some old women to come and unbind the woman. And when she was unbound she swooned but she soon recovered, for she was a woman who was brave.

"'Who is the woman with the golden hair?' asked an old man.

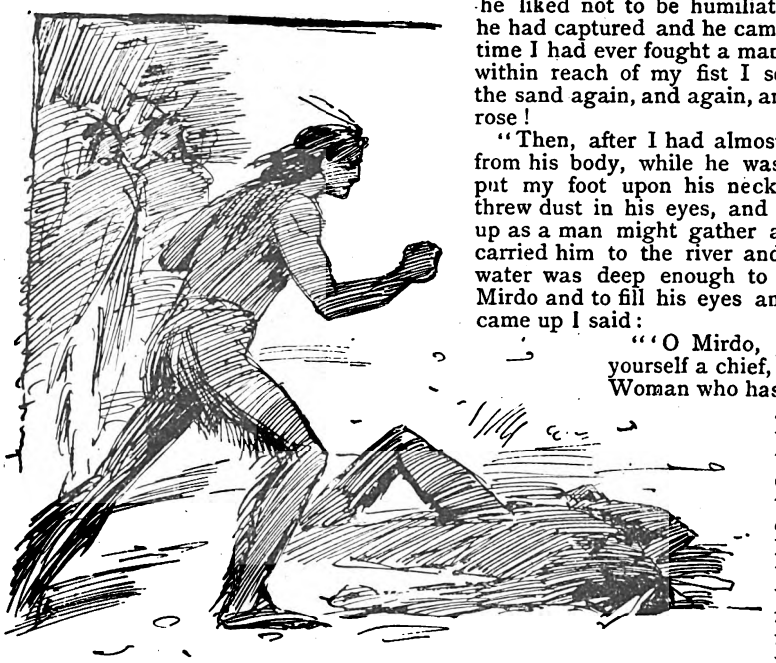
"'She is my captive,' replied Mirdo; 'the Kiowas took her from Navajos, and I took her from the Kiowas. She is mine to keep my tent; she is mine to work for me. I am Mirdo, and I am a man without fear, and a man who deserves the most beautiful woman in the land.'

"So boasted Mirdo; and as he boasted he looked upon the woman with his greedy gaze, and as he looked she cowered and shrank back. And I spoke to the woman, asking her name and from whence she came. The woman could not understand the Ute speech, but she seemed to feel that I was her friend, and she came close to me and held out her hands to me in appeal.

"I could speak the Navajo tongue also, and Mirdo could not; and I spoke to the woman in that speech, and she answered and asked me to protect her. I gave answer that I would protect her with my life. And then Mirdo took me roughly by the shoulder, saying:

"'Speak not to my woman, you squaw. What! Do you think to play with her and prattle to her? Get you to your mother's tent.'"

"Mirdo stood leering into my face, and as soon as he finished, I shot my clenched fist into his face and felled him as the blow of a stone axe would fell a sheep. He rose to his feet and drew his knife. The men caught him and took it away, and said that Utes must fight not like enemies but with their naked hands. Mirdo was a coward at heart; but he liked not to be humiliated before the woman he had captured and he came on. It was the first time I had ever fought a man. When Mirdo came within reach of my fist I sent him sprawling in the sand again, and again, and again, as fast as he rose!



"I sent him sprawling in the sand.

"Then, after I had almost knocked the breath from his body, while he was lying in the dirt, I put my foot upon his neck, I spat upon him, I threw dust in his eyes, and then I gathered him up as a man might gather a log of wood, and I carried him to the river and threw him in. The water was deep enough to wet the garments of Mirdo and to fill his eyes and mouth. When he came up I said:

"'O Mirdo, you coyote, who call yourself a chief, look upon the Golden Woman who has four times been made a captive! First this woman was taken by the Navajos, and because they took her they had the right to do with her as they liked. Then she was taken by the Kiowas, who had the same right for the same reason. Then she was taken by you, and the rights of the other thieves became your rights. But now she is taken by me, mine is the right to do with her as I choose, and it will fare ill with any man who dares to so much as lay his finger upon her.'

"Mirdo stood glaring at me, his bleeding lips hanging, and a look of murder in his eyes. I had not intended to strike him again, but the sight of his big brute face was a temptation that was too strong: and just as he was ready to snarl some reply to the speech I had made, I struck him, breaking his nose.

"Then Mirdo slunk away. He vowed that he would leave the tribe and lay in wait for me in the forest. But an old medicine man, the one who was teacher of Mape-ah-sas, whom you know, said to Mirdo that he was a coward, and that if he ever sought to do me wrong except in a fair fight or open battle, he would cause the evil spirit to haunt him all the days of his life. You know, amigo, that no Ute would incur the danger of a medicine man's curse; and I knew that I was safe.

"Then the old man said the woman was mine, and that I had fairly won her. I took her to my mother's tent, but with no thought of making her my slave or my wife as Mirdo would have done. I told her that she was safe from all danger, and then I sat down on the ground before the tent and thought. I tried to think of Mirdo and the battle I had fought with him; but I could not think of him, because I was thinking of the Golden Woman who had come into my life so strangely. And there I sat all the night keeping guard over the tent and wondering what the days of the future would bring forth.

"From that time on, life was different to me. Before then I had been a lonely, silent boy, wandering in the forests or sitting aside, while the men and boys played games. But it was not long before the Golden Woman became my friend and then my companion; and we talked to each other and wandered together in the forests, and rode ponies from one encampment of my people to another. Not at first, of course; for the woman was timid and half afraid.

"She was afraid of my people, and also afraid of me, for she knew I could make her my slave or my wife if I cared to do so. But she besought me not to take her to wife, and I placed my hand in hers and told her I would guard her, and that her life should be lived as she desired. It was after that—after she had thanked me, and kissed my hand—that she became my companion.

"A few times the woman was affronted. One burly man of my tribe, when drunk upon Mexican mescal, attempted to embrace her. I was sitting in front of our tent at the time, fitting heads to arrows; but her first cry took me to her side, and when I had been there but a little time, the brute lay upon the ground in a stupor that came very near being death. I was mad with anger, and after I had felled the man to the ground and knocked him senseless, I sprang upon his body and trampled his face in the dirt.

"Then I took the Golden Woman in my arms as a mother might take a babe, and bore her to my tent. When we were inside the tent, she placed one of her soft arms about my neck, she drew my face down to hers and kissed me, crying as she did so. Her kiss thrilled me through and through, and I was in danger of forgetting my promise. And I told her if she desired me to keep the promises I had given, she must kiss me no more. It seemed for a moment as though she, too, were tired of the promise, for she held my hand in hers, and looked wistfully into my eyes.

"After the fear of my people left her, it came about that she would go among them. At first she went only to the women and children, but it was not long until she went among all, even the chiefs and medicine men.

"When a child was born in some cold tent on a hillside, the Golden Woman was there. When a woman or child was sick, there was the Woman; and when a plague came upon our people, when the men died in their tracks as they stood in the camp ground, and little children were daily found dead in the arms of their dead mothers, then it was that the people of the Ute nation learnt to love the glorious being whom we named the Golden Woman.

"She comforted the sorrowing, cared for the sick, and prepared the dead for burial. She seemed sleepless and tireless, and every hour of the day and night while the plague lasted, she would be seen flitting from one tent to another, making tasteful things for the sick ones to eat, bathing the hot brows of those who were in the throes of death. And our people believed she was a medicine woman sent from a bright land that lies in the sun.

"Then some men came from the other Ute tribes, and they took home to their people the tale of this Golden Woman whose heart was said to be of pure gold. And thus it came to be that this woman was looked upon by us almost as a goddess, and that feasts and chanting are yet given in her honour.

"There are not many secrets among Indians who live in one encampment, and the people knew that the Woman was not my wife. I had another tent made, joining the one my mother had before, and I lived in the outer one.

"In time I taught her the Ute speech, and in time she told me something of her life. She was born in a great city in the East, and had gone to the West to be a missionary among the Indians. She first lived with a band of peaceful Navajos, and learnt their speech. Then she went to El Paso del Norte for rest.

"I took the Golden Woman in my arms."

"Between El Paso del Norte and Ciudad Fé, she had been captured by a roving band of Navajos, but before they had reached their camp they were beaten in battle with Kiowas and the Kiowas had taken her. The Kiowas started for their own country and were surrounded by the Utes under Mirdo. In this way she had been stolen by one tribe after another, and so swiftly that no harm had befallen her.

"More than this the woman did not tell me, thinking, because I was an Indian, I would not understand. But I learnt in time that she had journeyed to the wild lands of the West because of an almost hopeless hope that she might find her lover, who had come to the West and had never been heard of again.

"But as time went on, the Golden Woman grew silent as she went about her work of healing the sick. I fancied that she tired of dwelling in my tent, and when I asked her she said it would please her if she might dwell alone. It is not well for a woman to dwell alone, especially if the woman be young and beautiful, and I would not give my consent; but an old Navajo woman, who had been taken captive, and who had grown too old for work, also desired to live apart from the others.

"And the two women, the fair young one and the wrinkled old one, had a hut built in a sheltered part of the valley of the Rio Florida, and there they took up their abode. They tilled some land, and the hunters brought them much game, and they did not want for anything. The other people did not at first note the change that was taking place in the Golden Woman; but I, who knew her as well as though she were my mother, or daughter, knew that she was going mad.

"After this, the years sped on, and I lived my life as it came to me. I met Zeetah and took her to be my wife. I became a chief among my people, and much honour came to me. My mother died, my brother was killed by the Apaches, and many adventures of many kinds befell me. Often I journeyed to the ends of the lands that were known to my people, and often the time was long between my visits to these valleys.

"One time I took my band of people and went into the West, and for almost two years we did not see the Valley of the Pines. After a time we began, very slowly, to make our way homeward again, but going only by short marches, hunting and fishing by the way.

"While we were encamped in a valley in the Blue Mountains a man came to our camp, being on his way from this valley to visit one of our tribes in the place that is now Utah. And when he visited us he told me that the Golden Woman was sick in her hut, and that the old Navajo woman was also sick and had lost her mind. Then I told Zeetah what I intended doing, and I saddled my fleetest horse and set out for this place, hoping to see the woman again before she died, or perchance to save her life.

"When I came to the place I dismounted and went within. Upon a shelf-like bed built into the wall lay the old Navajo woman dead. And seated on the floor, in the middle of the room, her wealth of golden hair falling all about her, sat the Golden Woman, moaning and rocking herself to and fro. I stood in the door and gazed upon her, and it was long before she heeded me. In time, though, she saw me, and smiled a sad, sad smile that almost broke my heart. And she said:

"'So you have returned to me, Lo-To-Kah. Did you find Hugh?'

"I had never heard of any man named Hugh, and I knew not what answer to make. I stood in silence, trying to think, and the woman got up from her seat on the floor. She came and stood by my side, and took my hand in hers.

"'Lo-To-Kah, I have been crazed. For how long I do not know, but I know that when last a glimmer of reason and memory was left to me, the Navajo woman was living and was well; and now, you see, she lies dead. It must be that I am very ill, and it may be that I, too, will soon lie dead in this little hut. Now, when I am dead, I desire that you go forth and journey among the white-faced people until you find a man named Hugh; and when you find him, tell him that Helen died with his name on her lips, and that the love of him was the only love that ever was in her heart.'

"She sank down on the floor again, and before I could think of an answer to make, I heard a shout from outside, and, upon looking, I saw a small party of Navajo warriors riding forward. I did not fear the Navajos, for our tribes were then at peace. And when they came nearer I saw that a white man was with them.

"I was glad of this, for I knew not how to set about the task of finding this Hugh, and thought perhaps the white man could tell me. I told the Golden Woman to look; but at first she paid no heed, and she would pay no heed until the party of riders had drawn up their horses and stopped before the door. Then the woman rose to her feet, she brushed her long hair out of her eyes, and with me she went out.

"As she stepped outside the door, I saw the white man leap from his horse with a great shout. The woman saw him the same instant, and stopped dead as though she had been stricken with a palsy. The two white-faced people stood in mute, wondering silence for an instant, then the man called out the name 'Helen'; he sprang forward and clasped the woman in his arms, and all the time he wept as a mother might weep who had found her long-lost child.

"I thought at first the man might be her father, for he seemed older than she; but he was not her father, he was her lover. The woman nestled in his arms, and then for the first time for long years I saw the light of perfect reason shining in her eyes; for the first time since I knew her I saw her with a happy look.

"And then he saw me, and at once he stood as straight and firm as though he were made of stone.

"'Is this woman your wife?' he asked in a fierce tone.

"'Is she your wife?' I asked in turn.

"The man flushed hot and red; for a moment he did not speak, and then he hung his head and said:

"Stood in mute, wondering silence."

"'No, God forgive me, she is not. You have as much right to her as I.'

"'Why, Hugh, what is all this talk of right?' asked the woman, looking curiously into his face.

"The face of the man hung lower and lower; his cheeks grew first red and then white, and he said:

"'It means, dear one, that I gave you up as dead, and married another woman.'

"And then the Golden Woman lay on the ground at his feet, in a faint that seemed like death. And the man took her face in his hands, and kissed her lips, and wept over her as one weeps over the dead. It was a sad thing to see, friend; sadder than I at that time could understand. For then I knew only the ways of the Indians, and it seemed to me that if the woman loved the man, and the man loved her better than the other woman, who was his wife, that he could cast off his wife and take the Golden Woman in her stead.

"In time the woman recovered, and it seemed to me that the shifting light of lunacy was again beginning to come into her eyes. And I, knowing no better, stood by their sides as they talked, and I learnt that the man who was named Hugh had been the lover of the woman, Helen, and was to have taken her for his wife. He was an officer of the white-skinned soldiers, and had gone into the West, and the report had gone back to his home that he was dead.

"Then it was that the first touch of lunacy fell upon the woman; but she did not believe him dead. And saying she was going as a missionary among the Indians, she went to the East to seek him. She was captured, as I have told you. And the man who had not been killed, in time returned to his home in the East, and found that the woman had gone; and he believed her dead, and he had married another woman.

"He told the blue-eyed Helen that the woman who was his wife was cold, and proud, and haughty, and that he did not love her and she did not love him.

"'But she is your wife,' said Helen.

"'Yes, God pity me, she is my wife,' answered the man, his eyes upon the ground.

"What more they said I do not know, for I went with the men to help bury the old Navajo woman; and while we were thus at work the white man and woman talked, and the Navajos talked to me. They told me that the white man was a man who had first come to their country to fight them, but that he had become their friend, and that, more than a year before, he had come among them to live, telling them only that he was not happy in his own home. And I knew that he had left his wife, and would never call her wife again, whether Helen married him or not.

"When we had buried the old woman and returned to the tent, the man and the woman were still talking, both speaking in the Navajo tongue, which had come, from long usage, to be the same to them as the tongue of their own people. And I, knowing the thing that was troubling them, asked if a runner might not be sent to the white man's home to learn if his wife still lived, in order that he might take the Golden Woman to wife. The man said that could not be done. Then he mused a while and said to me:

"'Do you know the trails that lead to Santa Fé?'

"'I do,' I replied.

"The man took a paper book from his pocket, tore out a leaf, wrote upon it, and asked me how much gold I would require of him to carry that to Santa Fé. I replied that I would not do it for gold, but would do it for the Golden Woman. And he told me the paper was for a man who lived in Santa Fé, and was to ask him to write to the East and learn if the woman who was his wife still lived.

"I was told to give it to the man, and then, in six weeks' time, the man said he would send to Santa Fé again and get a letter that would let him know what he sought to know. And I took the leaf of paper and said I would go, and that I would also tarry in Santa Fé, if he desired, until the answer came out of the East.

"As the time drew near for the courier to return, both the man and the woman became troubled, and often they would anxiously gaze away over the mesas as though hoping, yet fearing, for the return of the runner, and for the news he would bring. I sent a runner to my camp to tell Zeetah why I should be away; and although I greatly respected the two white people, I thought they were fools.

"For if they had been wise, they would have lived and loved and forgotten the East, and paid no heed to the going and coming of runners. And when the time for the return of the runner came, I, too, began to grow restless, and I would go down the valley, many miles below where the rancho of Sevaro now is, to try to meet him. And it chanced that I met the runner fully two hours' ride away from the camp.

"'Ho, Navajo, what news?' I asked as soon as the man came near.

"'The wife of the white man lives,' replied the Navajo.

"The reply so angered me that I almost struck the man, for I knew how it would grieve the Golden Woman and the man she loved. You know, friend, that only Indians with evil hearts will lie. But at that time I resolved to lie, or to induce the Navajo to lie, which was as bad. And I said to the Navajo, whom I knew well:

"'Do you know the cayuse pony that is in my herd? The one with the glossy hair, that can run like a deer and leap like an antelope?'

"'I know that pony,' said the man. 'If it were mine, many are the blankets I would win with it in races.'

"'It is yours,' I replied, 'if you will forget this foolish message that was told to you by the white man in Santa Fé, and will tell the white man and woman that the wife in the East is dead.'

"'But the writing that I carry will tell the truth,' said the Navajo, his eyes shining at the thought of my cayuse.

"'Tear up the writing, and say you lost it,' said I. A strange thing was that I did not feel like a mean man, even when I advised such things.

"And the Navajo tore up the writing, and then galloped to the camp with his lying message. And when I returned I saw two happier people than I had ever seen before."

Lo-To-Kah pulled a gold hunting-case watch from some fold or pocket in his garments, looked at it leisurely, and asked me for a match.

"But the Golden Woman?" I asked. "What became of her?"

"She is dead," answered the old man, lapsing into the stolidity of his race.

"But what befell her before she died? Come, tell me the remainder of her story."

"The man and the woman talked long about returning to their own land, and to their own people," said Lo-To-Kah; "but the wilderness, forests, and the wild life, have many charms for those who have had sore hearts, and they like not to return to the clanging cities and the unwise ways of their kind. And Hugh, the white soldier, and Helen, the Golden Woman, agreed with each other that they would abide in the wild lands of the West.

"They went away that night, telling me not to say that I knew aught of their going; and I did not learn more of them for many years. My people believed that Helen had been an enchanted woman, and that she had vanished in the air and gone to her home in the sun. I said nothing to change their belief; and they began the chant of the Golden Woman, and the custom has lasted through all the years since then.

"After that time I knew no more of the Golden Woman for ten long years. Then I was riding alone, going to a great medicine ceremony on the river Gila, to which all men must go alone. And while I was riding across the desert I came to a fertile little valley, hidden away among cliffs, from which I saw smoke arising. I thought it must be the encampment of some wandering Indians, and I approached it with caution.

"And when I rode nearer to the place, I saw in the valley a house built of stone, and it was surrounded by fields of corn, and melons, and trees. And I rode to the house, and upon a porch that was covered with the boughs of trees there sat a man and a woman. The man was Hugh, the woman was Helen, the Golden Woman.

"They were glad to see me, and I was treated like a chief returning from a long absence. But I was grieved to note that the woman was again partially insane. She knew me, she knew her husband as well as ever; but she had forgotten many things that took place in the East.

"And the man told me that they had built that rancho and lived there alone, but that once a year they went to Santa Fé, or some other Mexican town for supplies. And he said he was happier, living alone with his wife in the wilderness, than he would have been if he had been a king and had not had her with him. And I believe I understood, in a dim way, how this might be a true thing that he said."

THE BOON OF SILENCE

AND so Peter Martin reluctantly came to the conclusion that he would have to consult a physician. He had never been to a physician in his long life, and to have to go now was bitter to him. It was a luxury. He felt he couldn't afford it. A man who keeps a four pounds a week family on two pounds a week paid monthly has a hard time of it in this world.

For thirty years the roar of the City had been in his ears, and he had no holidays. So it was just his luck to stumble into the office of the most expensive doctor in the metropolis. If the servant had seen him he would not have got into the presence of the great doctor, but Martin, knowing nothing of how a man whose time is worth two guineas a minute is hedged in, and happening to come when the last patient was undergoing examination, walked straight in from the street, and by good luck, to the infinite astonishment of doctor and patient, walked into the consulting room.

"There is something wrong with me," said he, fumbling with his hat. "I don't know just what it is, so I thought I should see a doctor. Which of you is it?"

The patient waved his hand towards the great specialist, and Martin turned his pathetic, appealing glance in his direction.

"See what's wrong with him," said the patient in a whisper, who was evidently impressed with the humour of the situation.

He thought it funny that so evidently poor a man should consult a physician whose fees ran into hundreds.

The doctor asked many questions and examined his new patient carefully. Then he stood away and looked at him for a moment.

"There is nothing radically wrong with you. What you need is absolute quiet. Medicine will not do you any good. Get out of the roar of the City for a couple of weeks, or a month, if possible. Go into the country, to some farmhouse. That's all you need."

Peter Martin sat down with a sigh of exhaustion.

"I cannot get away," he said, "I would lose my place, and besides, I can't afford it. I get only two pounds a week."

"Ah, I am sorry for you," said the doctor. "We have no prescription for poverty."

The wealthy patient put his hand in his pocket and drew out some money.

"Here," he said, "that will help you to a little holiday."

Peter shook his head. He was too nervous and shaky to draw himself up indignantly, as perhaps he should have done.

"I have never taken any money that I did not earn," he said, "and I am too old to begin. How much is your fee?" he asked, looking at the specialist.

"I usually get one and sixpence," answered the great man, "that is, of course, when I don't give any medicine."

"Of course," said Peter, simply, drawing out his lean purse and paying over the coin. "Good morning, gentlemen." And with that Martin tremulously departed.

"You did that nicely," said the patient rising. "I must follow him and try to smooth over my blunder."

"Are you going to experiment with him?"

"Perhaps."

Martin, as he walked slowly down the street, felt a touch on his shoulder. He turned, and saw the man who had been with the doctor.

"If you come with me I think I can help you. Will you step into my carriage?"

Somewhat reluctantly Peter did so. He did not like the man, but there was something in his dark glance that compelled obedience. When the carriage stopped Martin was taken into a house that was luxuriously furnished.

"Sit down," said the stranger. "Now let me understand thoroughly about your occupation."

Martin told him all about it, and the stranger listened patiently.

"If I understand you, then, your hearing is of no use to you in your business—that is, it depends on your sight only. If you were deaf you could still hold your place. Am I right?"

"Quite right," answered Peter.

"Well, then, I want to try an experiment on you. I think it will help you; in any case, it will do you no harm. Do you consent?"

"If it will help me."

"I think it will. Now fix your eyes and attention on this."

The machine referred to was a small box with a thin, upright rod on which were two horizontal arms each with a small, round, shining mirror at the end. The dark man touched a spring and the mirrors rapidly revolved. Peter looked at the whirling mirrors intently for a moment, then leant slightly forward with his eyes widely opened.

The stranger, watching him keenly for a few moments, at last stopped the machine. Peter's eyes remained gazing fixedly at nothing.

"You are asleep," said the man, quietly, passing his hand over Peter's face.

The eyelids closed and Peter answered not.

"When you awake you will be stone deaf—you will hear absolutely nothing. You will have to be very careful of the street crossings, and wherever there is any danger. Now wake up."

A shiver ran over Martin's body and he looked round wildly for a moment.

"What have you been doing to me?" he inquired.

"Can you hear me speak?" said the man loudly.

"What have you done to me?" repeated Peter. "Everything seems unnaturally quiet."

The dark man drew a writing pad towards him, and wrote on it handing the result to Peter. He read the words:—

"You are stone deaf. Try the effect for two weeks and then come back and see me. If at any time before you wish your hearing restored, come to this address. Try the effect for two weeks if you can stand it."

Here followed the man's name and address. Peter folded the paper in a dazed sort of way and put it in his pocket. He went out into the street. The traffic was as busy as ever, but an awful silence was over the City. There was something unearthly in the appearance of bustle and the absence of all sound. He was in a city of phantoms, and it frightened him at first, but finally there seemed to come over him a sweet peace, because noise did not exist.

When he went home that night his good wife received him just as she had done these many years.

"Now, you good-for-nothing, what's kept you? Here am I toiling and moiling, and getting something to eat for an old fool that doesn't know enough to come home for it before it's cold. What are you looking at me like that for? What's the matter with you? Have you been drinking again?"

Now Peter neither drank nor smoked, which no one knew better than Mrs. Sally Martin. He couldn't afford either; but as he always winced when she accused him of it she accordingly flung it at him.

"Sally," he said, quietly. "I'm deaf. I suppose you are speaking to me, but I cannot hear a word. You'll have to write it down."

"Write it down!" exclaimed the good woman, aghast.

She had some idea that he was shamming; but as she watched him she saw that he was serious. She broke out occasionally in wrath, but quickly subsided and murmured, "Oh, Lor'!"

And Peter Martin spent the first evening of peace at his own fireside for twenty years.

In two weeks Peter Martin called on the dark man in the fine house. He was looking very much better in health than he had done when he left that place a fortnight before. The far-away look of the deaf was already beginning to appear in his eyes. A sweet serenity sat upon his countenance.

"I am pleased to see you look so——"

Then the man remembered and drew his writing pad towards him and wrote:

'If you will sit down in the chair I will take away your deafness."

Peter read it with a smile.

"I merely came to thank you," he said. "I will not sit down."

A Tender Conscience

HE went among his friends by the name of the "Vatican Torso." Gordon Durmot rather liked him. In spite of the ponderousness of his sobriquet, and the magnificent solidity of build which had earned it, he had found the young man less heavy than he had supposed. The classic suggestiveness of his head and face did not prevent him from being an apparently simple young Roman of the nineteenth century, with a fine, lambent, open eye, and something ingenuous and almost appealing in all his mien.

It has been said that Gordon Durmot was inclined rather to like him. But this was before the moment when, like a flash of lightning, it came home to him that the Marchese Severini was his rival. Then all this changed. After all, Florence was only a girl, and girls were easily flattered by the devotion of youthful noblemen with profiles like Greek gods.

Gordon Durmot wished that he had never followed her at all; wished he had never come abroad. He hung upon the outskirts of excursionists as they scattered among the ruins, and looked over the Campagna and extolled the view. For Gordon there were only two objects in creation just then—Florence's light, slim figure, in its perfect costume, and the Marchese Severini's stalwart form by her side.

He was not usually so impressionable, but it seemed to Gordon at that moment that life could hold no further joys. He resolved to leave Rome on the morrow—perhaps to return home altogether.

After coming to this decision he seemed to gain some composure.

He no longer followed those two figures with his eyes. He turned, in a spirit of bitter defiance, to a pale, fair-haired girl who had sat by his side at luncheon, and, though he scarcely remembered her name, devoted himself vigorously to her for the remainder of the afternoon.

Meanwhile this was what had been transpiring between Florence and the magnificent young Roman.

"Mees—ah, you seema so cold. It is deefeecult—I don't know how you say—to speak to you."

"I do not know why it should be difficult to speak to me, Marchese," nervously.

"It is deefeecult for one who—who lofes you, mademoiselle."

That which she had dreaded had come at last, and Florence shrank back.

"Oh, please, please—don't!" she hastily murmured, with an averting gesture.

"You will not listen to me? You see I was right." The handsome young Roman's face betokened deep despair. He turned very white and his eyes had a hunted look. Florence's heart bled within her.

"It is very hard for me to speak to you so," she cried in trembling accents, "but I cannot do otherwise. I am sorry you have fixed any thought on me—you—I can only hope you will soon forget me!" she concluded, clasping her hands in her earnestness.

Severini shook his head mournfully.

"We are not like zat. We have stronger passions—stronger emotions. We are not like ze Eenglish."

Suddenly he raised his downcast eyes and looked at her.

"You will not care for me, you will not have any of my lofe—because of your compatriot who came a little while ago—because of the gut Monsieur—M. Durmot?" and before she could reply he had exclaimed, "Ah, yes, I know."

"I—you are mistaken. Mr. Durmot is only a friend," stammered poor Florence.

But Severini was not to be deceived.

As they went back to the others he spoke but once, and that was to say—

"He will never lofe you as I would. It is impossible. Ze Englishmen are fery cold. I know—yes, I know that he must lofe you, but it will not be like me."

That evening the married lady under whose chaperonage Florence found herself, observed, with all possible discretion, that she thought the Marchese Severini was becoming very attentive.

"He—he proposed to me to-day," said Florence, who felt horribly miserable and conscience-stricken, and longed to confide in somebody.

"And you refused him?"

A nod for a reply.

"Well, he has a fine name, you know, and he is very, very handsome. And you might have had enough for two—for, of course, he is quite, quite poor. Still, I suppose you know your own affairs, dear. Has—has Mr. Durmot anything to do with your decision? There! that is very prying of me. Quite inexcusable. Forget that I ever asked you."

But the good lady had had as much answer as she needed in the violent blush on her protegée's cheek. She resolved to keep her eyes wider open when Durmot next came.

But several days went by, and Durmot—who had been so assiduous that it really looked as though he had come abroad simply to be with Florence—did not appear. Someone said he was about to leave Rome. Florence began to grow pale and thin. She was wasting away. Her chaperone, who was a thoroughly kindhearted person, finally resolved to broach the subject plainly, and there resulted an admission on Florence's part that she believed Durmot did care—a little—for her—perhaps, but that he had probably resolved never to come near her again because he might think she had determined to marry Severini's good looks and title.

"That must be put before him in the right light then," said the lady.

"Oh, for goodness sake! I should die of mortification if anything were said!" cried Florence.

"Now, my dear, that is folly. It is my firm belief that many a woman has made herself, and a good man, too, miserable for life just because of some such false pride, false delicacy. Let me manage this thing. I shall shield you if you insist on it. But since you have actually refused that magnificent specimen of humanity, the 'Torso,' Mr. Durmot may as well know it."

Florence was too wretched, possibly, to make further objections. In any case, she said nothing at the time, and her friend took the silence for moral acquiescence. In the course of the same afternoon she so arranged matters as to have had an interview with Gordon Durmot, which put a sudden end to the misery that gentleman had been enduring ever since the famous day of the picnic outside the walls, and she furthermore found it necessary to attend an archæological lecture that same evening, leaving Florence considerately at home in the hotel. Nor was she surprised when, upon her return, the girl threw herself into her arms with a glowing face and whispered tremulously that Mr. Durmot had been there.

Gordon Durmot told the chaperone all that she wished to know. The beautiful diamond engagement ring which came the next day apprised her of nothing new.

. . . . . .

They were to be married immediately upon their return to England in the autumn.

A month before the wedding they found themselves in Paris.

And here Florence received a letter which made her turn very white. She was alone when it came to her, and she said nothing of it for several days. During those days she passed many hours by herself, seemingly almost shunning the society of Durmot.

"Do you know what ails Florence?" the latter said anxiously to Florence's chaperone.

"No," replied the latter with some impatience. "Girls are very queer anyway, and Florence especially so. She is supersensitive. One can never tell how things are going to affect her. She may have something on her mind. I think she has."

The knowledge of what that "something" was came upon Durmot like a clap of thunder out of a clear sky. He was sent for one day, and, arriving, found Florence sitting with downcast eyes alone.

"My darling," exclaimed the young man, "tell me what troubles you. I know there is something."

Florence drew away from his arm with a little shrinking shudder.

"Please don't!" she murmured.

"Come now, Florence," he cried vigorously in a moment, "this thing must stop! I will know what has come between us—what has estranged us."

"Nothing—oh, nothing can ever estrange me from you, Gordon," said the girl, quivering. "But——"

"But? Well! I am waiting!"

"Oh, Gordon," she suddenly wailed, "don't be so harsh with me! If you only knew how I have suffered, how anxiously I have striven to do right, you would not be so unkind. Oh, I think you ought to help me instead of making it all so hard."

"If you will explain what all this is about, perhaps——"

"I will explain," she interrupted, rising. "Severini—you remember Severini?" she stopped herself to ask, in a pitiful, pathetic attempt to gain time.

"I should think so," remarked Durmot with sarcasm.

"Yes. Well, he—he is dying!"

"Dying?"

"And it is I who have killed him."

"You killed him!" shouted Durmot. "Look here, my girl, are you in your right senses? Come to yourself, Florence!" The lover was thoroughly alarmed.

Florence slowly shook her head. All her agitation had subsided and she was very calm.

"No, I am not mad, though you think I am. I see my duty very clearly. I don't expect you to see it in the same light. But—but—I have come to the conclusion that it would be very wicked of me to marry you. It would be—it would be like marrying over a grave."

Durmot stood in stony silence.

"I could never be happy; my conscience would never rest. If you will think of it you will see that it would be impossible."

And her faltering phrases broke against his obdurate silence as against a wall. She raised her eyes at last appealingly to his. But there was no help in them.

"I don't know," Durmot said finally, "what to think of you. Either your conscience is morbidly diseased or you are the cruellest creature God ever made."

"Oh, don't—don't say that," the girl wailed. And then she saw that he had turned towards the door. "You—you are not going from me so—without a word?" she faltered.

"What would you have me say?" was Gordon's savage reply. And then Florence was left alone.

Those were dreadful weeks that followed for her, but she was upborne by the consciousness of having done a duty that must have been sacred, because it was so very, very hard to perform. Gordon had already gone home without sending any sign of relenting or toward forgiveness. And thus it seemed to Florence that the sacrifice was fully consummated. To all that her elderly friend could say she only replied—

"I could not be happy over the wrecked life of another. They tell me that that poor man is dying for love of me. It seems to me impossible, incredible, and yet they assure me that it is so."

"Yes, it is rather incredible," said the elder lady drily. "Men have died, and worms have eaten them, but not usually for love."

"Yes," Florence humbly assented. "I am not worthy of it in any way. But it is so. And I—I cannot be happy knowing it."

"The logical process by which you reach that conclusion is not apparent to anyone but yourself."

At last the day came that preceded the one fixed upon for their departure from Paris. Florence was nursing her wretched thoughts in her own room when her chaperone precipitately entered it.

"Well?" she remarked, and she stopped, looking at Florence.

"What is it?" said the latter, listlessly.

"Prepare yourself for a surprise."

Florence looked as though nothing could ever cause her surprise again in this world.

"The Marchese Severini is in the hotel. I have just seen him."

Florence's face changed.

"He is not alone," pursued the elder lady. "In short, my dear, who do you suppose he has with him? His wife."

Florence rose.

"His wife?"

She trembled like an aspen.

The elder lady burst into irrepressible laughter.

"Actually! His wife; an English girl she is, too, with lots of money. I found out the whole affair before coming to you. It seems that the 'Torso,' poor fellow, was really very low about you, Florence. He was desperately smitten. But this other charming English girl appeared on the scene and she sympathised with him at first, and so, by degrees, a love affair sprang up. The engagement was announced and the marriage followed almost immediately. Well, what do you say to that?"

But Florence was almost past saying anything.

"Oh," she sobbed, "do you think Gordon would ever—will ever forgive me?"

The elder lady considered a moment severely.

"Well, when we get home I suppose I might go and try to make matters right with him. It will be the second time, observe. Positively, I don't know that I would ever have done such things for anyone but you."

THE TENTH OF JUNE.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

SUMMARY.

Geoffrey Dundas—A young barrister.
Sir Arthur Chetwynd—A retired general and Geoffrey's friend.
Leila Chetwynd—His daughter.
Captain Bygham—An army officer, and cousin to Sir Arthur.
Lord Lavington—A friend of the General.
Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore—A Hindoo prince who visits Sir Arthur, and develops an unrequited love for Leila.
Chunder Sen—The Rajah's secretary.
Kuttapani—The Rajah's cook.

During the Indian Mutiny Sir Arthur, together with Geoffrey's father (since dead), took part in the looting of a Hindoo temple on the tenth of June, and on this day every year afterwards one of the Englishmen concerned, or some member of their families, is assassinated. On the last day of May, 1884, Amavati, the Rajah of Nagore, visits Sir Arthur, and Geoffrey tells him of the danger. Sir Arthur on learning from his lawyer that his cousin, Captain Bygham, to whom he had intended to marry Leila, is almost penniless, though representing himself to be rich, wills him but a small annuity. Chunder Sen makes it possible for Bygham to surreptitiously examine the will, and promises to help him out of the difficulty. On the tenth of June, Geoffrey goes to Wales, and is followed by Kuttapani, who attacks him in a lonely spot, and leaves him for dead. Geoffrey, however, recovers, and tracks him to a house in Westbourne Park, named Lancaster Villa, which transpires to be the headquarters of the Hindoo. Geoffrey asks the General for Leila's hand, but is refused, and goes abroad. On his return he meets the Rajah outside Lancaster Villa, and subsequently discovers that Captain Bygham is in league with the Hindoo. The General and Leila (believing that they are visiting Lord Lavington's yacht) are taken to a vessel chartered by the Hindoos, and are so caught in a trap.

CHAPTER XXI.

"I Cannot Let My Father Die."

General Chetwynd lay in his berth, sleepless, watching the round port-hole, as minute by minute the light increased. He was in that state of mind when a man is prepared for the worst. He was not unready to die. But Leila! He had to force himself not to think of her possible fate, lest he might go mad. He saw no hope, no possibility of rescue.

The one chance lay in his being able to make a sort of bargain with his murderers, giving his life that she might be spared. But what sort of bargain could he make? he asked himself, with the bitterness of despair.

His life was already forfeited to these savage fanatics, on account of that sacrilege in which he had taken part some thirty years before. Time had had no effect in lessening their thirst for vengeance. They would, he well knew, put him to death without mercy, as readily as if they had caught him but yesterday, red-handed, amid the smoking ruins of their temple. His fate was already decided. How, then, could he make a bargain on behalf of Leila? He had nothing to offer in exchange for her liberty and her life.

Gradually the light from the port-hole grew stronger, till the various objects in the cabin stood out clearly in the summer dawn.

A noise—faint at first, but now more decided—a noise as of a rat gnawing at the upper panel of the door. A tool, in the hands of an inexperienced workman, was slowly cutting away at the thin panel.

The General understood. His gaolers wanted to communicate with him, and they were afraid to enter the cabin. He had no weapon; but he thought with a grim smile that they were wise. Yet this did not deceive him. He knew that his murderers had only to thrust the muzzle of a loaded rifle or revolver through the hole in the door, and he would be completely at their mercy.

"Sahib!"

The General paid no heed.

"Sahib!"

Perfect silence.

"Let the Lord Sahib speak with his servant. It may be well for him—and well for the lady, his daughter."

"What is it?" said the General. He did not stir from the berth. His tone was as cold as if he had been speaking to a servant who had committed some fault.

"I wish to converse with the Sahib."

"Who are you?"

"I was known as the Secretary of the Rajah of Nagore, Chunder Sen."

"Ah! I understand."

"But I am now the head priest of the Brahmins who had the care of the Temple at Churruckpore."

"I guessed as much! I have sheltered a couple of murderers—that's all."

"Not so, Sahib! The Rajah did not know until he came on board last night who his secretary really was. He had no part in your capture. He did not know that any such measure was intended."

"Indeed!" said Sir Arthur ironically. "Perhaps you have made him a prisoner, too?"

"He is not at present under personal restraint," said Chunder Sen gravely. "We respect his rank too much to treat him with discourtesy. But he is not the master of this vessel; and he does not share our counsels."

"I may believe that or not; but it matters nothing to me. What is it you want to say to me? Say it, and be gone!"

"You are aware, Sahib," said the soft, silky voice of the Hindoo, "that your life is justly forfeited. The penalty of violating a shrine of Vishnu is death."

"Did you take the trouble of drilling a hole in the door to tell me that?"

"But Vishnu has already been avenged in part," went on the Hindoo, as if the other had not spoken. "There have been many victims. We are ready to spare you, and land you on the coast of France uninjured, if you agree to one condition."

"Ay? And what may that be?"

The General raised himself on his elbow, his heart beating high with expectation. He was known to be a wealthy man. Visions of liberty for himself and Leila through the payment of a ransom were already crowding into his mind.

"The condition is a very easy one," answered the Hindoo. "It involves neither loss nor degradation. It is merely this—that you give your written consent to the marriage of your daughter to your kinsman Captain Bygham, with a suitable dowry."

A cry burst from the General's lips—a cry, not of wrath, or agony, but of horror. In a moment he had sprung out of the berth, and stood behind the barred door, his arms crossed on his breast, his teeth clenched, his eyes flashing fire.

A cry burst from the General's lips.

"Bygham! It is impossible! He cannot be an accomplice of those wretches. I cannot believe it. A man of my own blood! No! Reginald Bygham cannot have descended so low. He cannot be mixed up with this abominable outrage. It cannot be!—And yet, why should those Hindoos make common cause with him if he is not their friend? Why should they make it a condition that he should marry Leila, if he is not one of them? He marry Leila!"—All this passed through his mind in an instant.

"I would rather see my daughter lying in her coffin than give her hand to that man," he said aloud. At that moment Captain Byngham seemed more hateful to the high-minded soldier than even Chunder Sen.

"You will think the matter over, Sahib; and if the young lady is willing——"

"I shall not think the matter over, you scoundrel! It is wasting your time to talk to me. We are in your power; and of course you know what that means. What security have I that if I signed such a paper as you tell me you want, my life would be spared? None! He who could play the part of a traitor once would play it again. Yet I would give a good deal to know one thing."

"And what is that, Sahib?"

"Only this—Why do you ask this thing from me? What interest is it of yours who my daughter marries? What is Captain Byngham to you?"

A low laugh was at first the only answer. Then Chunder Sen deigned to speak.

"The noble Captain is our friend," he said with a sneer. "From him we knew of the arrangement you made to sail with Lord Lavington, and we laid our plans accordingly. There was an agreement made between him and us long ago that he should inform us of all your movements."

"I have spoken my last word."

The answer to this was a groan.

"And this was to be his reward!" said the General, as if to himself.

"The Miss Sahib is to be his reward."

"Never!"

"You cannot prevent it. Captain Byngham is to come on board to-night and take her away."

"The miscreant! But it will be in vain. She will not marry him. He will never touch my money."

"The Miss Sahib will gladly marry him."

"Don't you see that she will look upon this ally of yours as a monster—that she would rather die than touch him?"

"She will not look upon him as a monster," replied the Hindoo, insensibly lowering his voice. "She will be told that he heard of your predicament through the English servant, Brown, whom we sent ashore before we left Plymouth, saying that the Rajah found a servant had been brought from London for him, and that he was not wanted.

"Brown knows nothing of the real state of the case; but the Captain will pretend that his suspicions were aroused by what Brown told him, that he followed the yacht, found her and boarded her, and discovered that you had run your heads into a snare. He will then give her to understand that he had to surrender his fortune in order to ransom her; and he will grieve with her that we refused to allow you to be ransomed also."

"Miss Chetwynd is not a fool; she will see through that shallow pretence," said Sir Arthur contemptuously. "Besides, my trustees will see through it. They would never consent to the marriage."

"They will be forced to consent to it. Captain Byngham will take the young lady to his own house, and detain her there for some days on the pretence that he is trying to get a man-of-war to follow this vessel and save you. By that tim will be too late to save you. The steamer we mean to abandon. But after a time your daughter will come to understand that she must marry Captain Byngham. If it should be necessary he can easily make representations to your trustees, which will make them glad to consent to the match."

The General was silent. He was amazed at the cunning and audacity of his enemies, and for the moment overwhelmed by the awful revelation that had just been made to him. He felt that he was totally unable to do anything to save his daughter from the fate that had been prepared for her; and indeed he saw that it might be better for her to marry her cousin, bad as he was, than remain in the hands of the Hindoos.

One thing only he resolved upon. Leila must pass his cabin door as she left the vessel. It would be impossible to prevent his calling out a few words that must reach her ears. He would not blacken Byngham's character to her as yet, on the bare word of a treacherous Hindoo. But if he heard the Captain's voice on board, if he heard the girl leave her cabin, he would take care to let her know the real character and motives of the man who was pretending to rescue her.

Once more Chunder Sen's voice was heard in the stillness.

"Does the Sahib, then, consent to this marriage? It would be much better for him to do so, and save his life."

But the General was convinced that he could place no dependence on the truth of what the Hindoo might tell him; It was possible that all he had heard was a mere lie designed to draw the written consent from him. And besides, if he did sign the paper, it was quite likely that the faithless Hindoos, having got all they wanted, would shoot him without mercy He made no reply.

Again the Hindoo pressed his argument—in any case the Miss Sahib's fate was sealed; but the Sahib might yet save his life by giving his consent to her marriage. The General could not understand his persistence. He could not know that one of the most powerful of the priests of Vishnu, who had not come to England, a subject of the Rajah, was bitterly opposed to his sovereign's contemplated marriage with a Christian, and had sent word to his fellow priests that they must at all costs hinder this alliance.

It was because Chunder Sen doubted the ability of Captain Byngham to force the girl into marrying him, that he was so anxious to get the written consent of the General, which might be of the greatest service, both with regard to Leila and with regard to her trustees.

The General, not knowing the primary motive of the Hindoos, wondered at the fidelity to their ally; but he was not the man to save his life by becoming a party to a vile plot against his own daughter.

"Go away!" he cried out impatiently.

"It is enough," came back the answer. "I have spoken my last word to you. You shall die before the morrow is one hour old."

The Hindoo's voice ceased and it seemed as if he must be gone, but no sound told of his coming or his going. To the General it was almost as if an evil spirit, a formless intangible creature with a voice, but no other part or attribute of man, had been tempting him.

"They may spare themselves the trouble of talking to me again," said the General to himself, as he strode back and forward over the narrow floor of his cabin. "I don't believe they would keep their promises; at least I have no security that they would. That way there is no hope. God help us! God help us!"

Some hours later the fastenings of the door of Leila's cabin were quietly undone, and she saw the handle of the door turn half way round; but as she had bolted the door it did not open.

"It is I, Miss Chetwynd," said a voice she knew well.

"You! I own I am surprised to think that the Rajah of Nagore should become an accomplice of common murderers!" cried Leila in a voice of scorn.

"You do me injustice. Indeed you do. I only beg you to open the door, and give me a hearing."

Lightly touched it with his lips.

"Do not trust him, Leila!" called out a clear, strong voice. It was the General's. He had overheard what passed.

"You may trust me; indeed you may," said Amavati.

Something in his voice carried conviction to the girl's mind.

"I am not afraid, papa!" she called out in a tone clear and strong as her father's had been. And with that she drew the bolt.

The Rajah entered, and stood respectfully at the further end of the tiny cabin.

"Will the daughter of the great soldier hear me?"

There was the same calm pride in the Rajah's manner now as there had been when he had stood before this girl an honoured guest under her father's roof.

"It seems hardly necessary, but speak if you will."

There was a world of scorn in the girl's tone, in the half raised glance of her eye; a world of contempt in the upright carriage and the turn of her slender neck.

"I assure you on the honour of a prince of the House of Sastri that I was wholly ignorant of this outrage. I knew something was plotted against your father; but I thought he was safe for this year. Like him I thought I was coming on board Lord Lavington's yacht. Like him I was deceived. The truth appeared to me when it was too late."

"You knew something, yet you did not warn us!" exclaimed the girl.

"He needed no warning; he knew of the danger that threatened him. But I did not imagine that the avenger would strike this year."

"What avenger do you mean?" asked the girl, turning a shade paler as she spoke. "What was the danger that threatened him?"

In a few rapid words Amavati told Leila the story of the burnt temple and the vendetta of the priests.

"As for me," concluded the Rajah, "though I knew such a conspiracy existed, I had no share in it."

"I believe you, Rajah!" cried the generous-hearted girl, holding out her hand to him.

He took it, bent down, and lightly touched it with his lips. Leila did not snatch her hand away, but neither did she allow it to remain in the Rajah's grasp an instant after this act of homage had been paid.

"I have not yet said that which I came here to say," said the Rajah with his eyes on the floor.

"What is there to say?" asked Leila softly. "We are in the power of these men. If they choose to kill us, as it seems likely they will, then we must die."

Amavati Sastri lifted his eyes and met those of the girl.

"Pardon me. They would neither wish, nor dare, to lay a finger on the wife or the father-in-law of the Rajah of Nagore."

Leila started. Her hands convulsively clasped each other in front of her dress; and she stared at the Rajah as if she hardly understood his meaning. His attitude was that of a man conscious of his power; but before Leila's clear frank gaze his eyes fell.

"What did you say?" came in hardly audible tones from her lips.

"I only tell you the truth. The way to save your father, and the only way, so far as I can see, is for him to become my near relative. I do not think that you personally are in any danger. At least these men gave me a promise that you should not be harmed. But your father is in danger, in great danger. If you promised to become my wife I could protect him."

Suddenly the girl's face changed. Distrust spoke in it, then contempt.

"So this is the price you ask for your treachery!" she exclaimed.

"You do me wrong," said the Hindoo; and though his voice was calm, it was plain that he was deeply moved. "I have told you that although I knew your father had enemies of our race I was not one of them, and had no knowledge of this plot against his life. Besides, you forget, I was at the time your father's guest."

This was said as if such a crime against the laws of hospitality was simply unimaginable. Once more the sincerity of the Rajah's voice and look banished Leila's mistrust.

"Forgive me," she said, "if I wrong you. I am ashamed to think that I should have doubted you again—but indeed it is all so strange, so horrible, that I don't know what to think, or what to believe."

"It is natural that you should suspect me, seeing that——." He was going to say, "seeing that the chief conspirator is Chunder Sen," but he stopped himself. If Leila knew that fact, he thought her suspicions might return.

"No; I suspect you no longer!" cried Leila. "I have insulted you shamefully by thinking you could have taken part in so base a plot. Once more I say I trust you. But, my father! Oh, Rajah, think! There must be some way of saving him! His whole fortune——."

The Rajah shook his head.

"It is not wealth they seek, but revenge," he said.

"Yes, I know; I know." Unconsciously she was picking at the bosom of her dress with her fingers, as she might have done had she been suffering an extremity of pain. "I know," she repeated; "but they are men. They have hearts in their breasts. I will kneel to them. I will offer my life for his."

"You could not expect me to help you to such a sacrifice; but it is not necessary. You have only to consent to be my wife. I love you, Leila; I have loved you since first I saw you. I will be true to you. I will become a Christian for your sake. I will make you happy."

The girl put her hands over her eyes, as if to shut out the pictures his words brought before her mind.

"I would like to be alone."

She stood there, without speaking; and the Rajah said no more.

"Give me time—time to think of it. But why should I ask for time? If there is no other way——"

"Believe me, there is none."

"Then I must consent. Yes; I cannot let my father die. I should be his murderer! Yes; I consent!"

They called out to each other.

She drew herself up, and gave the Hindoo her hand, as a pledge of her good faith; but as his soft palm touched it a strong shudder passed through her frame, and she made as though she would withdraw it.

A gleam had lighted up the Rajah's dark eyes. But now it suddenly died out. He made no effort to detain her hand beyond an instant. A sigh rose to his lips.

"Tell my father that he shall not die," she said, "but do not tell him the way in which he is to be saved—at least, not yet. Make them set him at liberty at once, if you can. And now, please, I would like to be alone."

CHAPTER XXII.

A Chivalrous Knight.

The slow hours dragged themselves along. Leila never could remember afterwards what her thoughts had been during that time of terror. She was hardly capable of coherent thinking. She dared not think of herself as the Ranee of Nagore, lest she should be tempted to repent of the sacrifice she had voluntary offered.

Still the steamer ploughed its way slowly through the green water. From the porthole Leila could see nothing but a waste of waves. Once, when the sea seemed calmer, she opened the porthole and looked out. The sun was shining on the water—a million waves were tumbling this way and that, as if they were the children of the sea at play. Far, far away the sun's rays fell on the topsails of a passing ship. All was lightness, brightness, freedom. The narrow cabin prison seemed more hateful than before, from the sight of the wide, unfettered sea. The girl sank down on the couch beneath the window, and for the first time since her imprisonment began, the tears fell like rain from her eyes.

As the afternoon wore on the sky became again overcast. Black clouds rose up from the horizon, bringing rain. It suddenly became cold. And the wind rose, whistling drearily in the sailless rigging.

There was no change for the captives. From time to time they called out to each other, to assure themselves that so far the other was safe; and it was a comfort to the girl to hear her father's strong, manly voice, singing out cheery words to encourage her.

"Keep up your heart, my dear!" he would cry out. "We'll find a way out of this mess yet."

Or again—

"I don't believe they will dare to touch me when it comes to the point; and I don't think they will hurt you in any case."

Or—

"I do believe they only want a heavy ransom. What else could they want? When they think we are hungry and dispirited they will begin talking about a cheque. We shall be landed in France to-morrow, you'll see!"

But it was only the sound of the old General's voice that was sweet to Leila's ears. His words had no meaning for her. She knew they were meaningless, merely invented to prevent her from giving way to despair. "Aye," she said to herself, "it may be we shall be at liberty to-morrow, able to walk about and breathe the air. But I shall be a slave, a life-long slave!"

Suddenly a thought came to her.

"I can try!" she cried out; and springing to the cabin-door she knocked on it as hard as she could with her tiny fist.

A step sounded in the passage outside.

"I want to see the Rajah!" she called out. "Go and tell the Rajah I must see him."

In a very short time the door opened, and Amavati stood before her.

"I have sent for you, Rajah," began the girl, "to beg you to think—to consider—— Would you not rather——?"

The words would not come. She was trembling from head to foot with excitement; and though she was eager to speak, it seemed as though she were in a nightmare, and could not utter the words.

She sat down and tried to calm herself.

"Amavati," she said at length, "I believe you are a good and honourable man. Will you not make an effort to save my father and me, without demanding this sacrifice from me? Which would you rather have, my lifelong gratitude and respect, or—my hatred?"

"Your hatred? No. Why should you hate me?"

"I am certain I should hate you if I were—if we were married. If I became your bride, you would find that you had purchased a slave, not married a wife. I tell you frankly, I could never love you, though I have liked and in some ways admired you. Why should you wish to forfeit my respect, in the vain effort to gain my love? It can never, never be yours. I may leave my father and my country, according to my promise, and go to live with you in India. But I should be longing for death all the time. I should soon die. You would not have the poor prisoner long."

The Rajah stood with his eyes cast down, dumb as a statue.

"Think! In our country we have stories—I daresay you have them in Hindostan—about brave knights who risked their lives to save maidens from peril. Did you ever hear that one of them made it a condition, before striking a blow, that she should marry him? It would have been reckoned a shame. And you are not without nobility of spirit, Rajah. You have some magnanimity. It is unworthy of you to drive a bargain with a girl for her father's life."

She paused, and waited for the Hindoo to speak. It was some time before he opened his lips; and when he did so his voice was low and indistinct.

"What would you have me do?" he asked without lifting his eyes from the ground.

"Do? Try to save our lives! you have influence with these men. You are a prince of their nation. They dare not touch you; and you can threaten them. Tell them that if they kill my father, you will denounce them, and they will suffer death themselves. Tell them that you are our friend, and that you will count an injury done to us as if——. Oh! you know what to say, what to do. Pretend, if you like, that I am to be your bride. But do not force me to marry you. No! Oh, no! Do not do that. Do not force me!"

"I have failed."

A heavy sigh, long suppressed, burst from the Rajah's breast.

"Leila," he said, "you have conquered me. Henceforth I will not seek to marry you, since I see you regard a union with me with abhorrence. I will be content—it is I who say it—I will be content with your goodwill. I will do my best to save you and your father; but I ask no reward."

"I renounce my religion."

"Oh, how can I thank you!" cried Leila; and she sprang up, her eyes filling with tears, and came close to the Rajah, so close that her dress brushed against his. "How can I thank you? What shall I not owe you? Life, honour, freedom? My gratitude and my prayers shall follow you as long as I live, wherever you go! I shall be always thinking of you—always thinking that if it had not been for you—— And always with the thought of you will come a grateful wish, and a prayer for God to bless you!"

"I will go now; but do not be sure that I can help you. What I can do, I will do. You may be sure of that. But these men are not my subjects, and they are priests. They care nothing for money, in comparison with revenge, and they care not hing for death. I very much fear—but I will try."

"Yes; and you will let me know as soon as possible whether you can save us?"

"Yes; I will send you a message," said the Rajah; and he slowly left the cabin.

The light grew mellow; it was the afternoon. The radiance that broke for a few minutes from a watery sun was pale and dim; it was drawing towards evening—and no word, no message from the Rajah. No sound was heard but the throb of the propeller—and occasionally the General's voice, as he called out to know how his daughter fared.

Leila had not dared to tell him that the Rajah was making efforts in their favour. Of course, all they said to each other was overheard; and she feared that it might embarrass the Rajah if she openly proclaimed that he was going to save them if he could. Besides, her father would naturally suspect the Rajah, as she herself had done. He would not believe in his good faith, and would most likely receive the news with a burst of mocking laughter.

The evening was now fading into twilight, and still the Rajah did not come. Leila had long since become anxious for the success of his mission. Minute by minute the suspense became more intolerable.

The weather was now completely changed. The wind had risen hour by hour; and the steamer was rolling a good deal. Her speed had been slackened. It seemed to Leila that she was hardly making any way through the water. The rain, too, had begun to fall, in small close drops, that made no sound on the planking overhead.

It must have been eight o'clock in the evening when Leila was startled by a slight rustling sound at her cabin door. She glanced round, and saw that something white had been pushed under the door. In a moment she had pounced upon it, and carried it to the porthole.

By the fading light she could just make out the words, scratched in pencil:

"I have failed."

The girl gave a low cry of horror and dismay, and sank down on the red velvet couch, pale as a sheet.

But the next moment she was shaking the cabin door, and knocking loudly to attract attention. As soon as she heard a step outside, she called out that she wanted to see the Rajah.

"What do you want with him?"

It was her father's voice, from the opposite cabin.

"I want to thank him, father—and to ask him to do something for me. He is our friend, and has been trying to use his influence with these people to save our lives; but he says he can't."

"You astonish me, Leila. I thought he was the head and front of the conspiracy."

"No, papa; I am sure he is not."

She was interrupted by the entrance of the Rajah himself.

Even in the dim light that came in through the porthole, she could make out that he was in a state of great agitation.

"You sent for me?" he began.

"Yes, I want to thank you—I thank you just as warmly, just as sincerely, as if you had been completely successful. You have done what you could. No one can do more. I suppose these men have no hearts?"

"They have not!" burst out the Rajah. "They are demons, not men. From this moment I renounce my religion. I will become a Christian. I will not have such men for my priests. They have broken faith with me—or mean to break it."

"Did you tell them you would accuse them of murder?"

"I did. I used every argument I could think of."

"Rajah"—the girl's voice sank so low that it barely reached her own ears—"Rajah, if it is necessary; if my father would be safe as your relation——"

"No, Leila," said Amavati, in a voice of deep sadness. "If I tell you the truth I shall confess that I was wrong. My marriage with you would be extremely unpopular with my subjects, and with all Hindoos, for reasons connected with the dynasty. I believe they would kill you rather than allow you to become my wife."

"Then we are lost!"

The Rajah was silent.

"You said the priests had broken faith with you; how was that?"

"They promised me, weeks ago, that you should not be harmed. And now I find that there is a fresh plot on foot. I cannot learn the details, nor even the precise nature of it; but I believe you are its object. I believe you are to leave the vessel soon."

"Oh, Rajah, save me!"

Her cry rang through the cabin. Her father called out to know what was the matter. She had to answer him, and reassure him; and that helped to steady her nerves.

"Promise me one thing, Rajah," she said, clinging to the Hindoo's arm as he was about to leave the cabin—"promise me that if there is no other way—rather than allow me to fall alive into the hands of these men, or any of their associates, you will kill me yourself—promise me!"

No shudder passed through the girl's body now, as she seized the Hindoo's hand in her own. She knew him to be her friend, and she had none but him to look to.

He gazed steadily into her eyes, and answered:

"I promise you. And I promise you this—you shall not die unavenged."

"What do you mean?"

But the Rajah had already left her.

He had not told her all.

He had spared her the awful news that the priests of Vishnu had decided that ere the first hour of the new day, the Tenth of June, had gone by, Sir Arthur Chetwynd would cease to live.

The Soul of the Cat

YES, John Ling was a lonely one. He had friends in plenty, and relatives, too, for that matter, but Ling had his own views on matrimony, and he didn't believe anybody could be happy without a wife. It was strange why he had so suddenly taken on that belief, for hadn't he lived fifteen years away from his own Flowery Land! Of course he had.

He came first to Lamb Flats and went to work on the diggings, but he couldn't stand it, for he used to feel the strange white devils at night punching him in the back. So he gave his claim to a relative and travelled down country to Sydney.

He was idle for a while, and then started in to sell soap to the laundrymen, until finally he got enough cash to rent a store. He put out his red sign, with the fluttering red streamers on it to keep the evil ones way, and he became store-keeper. Every night for years he had crawled into his little bunk, curtained off at the back of the store, and after comforting himself with the opium he loved so well he had fallen asleep, to dream of pretty Chinese girls, tottering on pink clouds across the water and stretching their arms out to him.

He often thought of China and the home life there, and he used to count the money in his trunk and wonder when he would have enough to go back and buy a koonfoo's rank and wear a cap with the red button of the third degree. Then he thought he would buy with some of his money the prettiest girl in the province, and she would have feet so small that she couldn't walk at all unless she had a strong servant holding each hand.

He often gambled in the hope that he would win, and he burnt prayer sticks before his kat god that he might have luck, but he might just as well have saved the sticks, for luck never came. So persistently did he lose that more than once he was tempted to let one of the burning prayer sticks fall over against the god and burn it, but he was afraid lest the deceit should be discovered and the god seek a just revenge.

One day there came into his store a white girl who lived in a house in the same street. She had hair like the gold he used to dig out of Lamb Flats.

"I say, John," she said, "me mother's run out o' sope, an' she's up to her neck in washin'. Gimme a bar!"

Ling was smitten with a great love. He remembered having seen this girl go past his store many times, but he never had such a chance as this to speak to her.

"You mommee want sope?" he asked. "She washee?"

"Yes; I want er bar, an' I want it quick."

"Alle lite," said Ling, and he clattered behind the narrow counter and pulled out from a shelf two bars of soap.

"You takkee two," he said. "No worry, you takkee; you sabe?" and he pushed the soap and the five pennies she had laid down away from him. Then he went on: "I likkee you; you heap nice! Lat you name?"

"So I get the sope for nuttin', do I, John?" said the girl. "Well, me name's Maggie Brown, if yer wanter know."

Ling looked at her with admiring eyes. Then he pointed to the soap and pennies, and said simply:

"You takkee. I heap lakkee you; sabe? You clum 'glain?"

"Yes, I sabe, John," said the girl, "an' I'll come again."

So she went out and Ling went to the door and looked after her until she had disappeared round the corner. Then he went back behind the narrow counter and sat down on a stool. He rested his elbows on a pile of paper, sunk his chin in his hands and thought very hard. His thinking amounted to something, for he went to the little room curtained off at the back of the store, and out of the big camphor wood chest he pulled some carefully folded clothes. He was a new man when he came out into the store again, and a couple of his countrymen, who had dropped in to have a friendly chat and a smoke, began to chaff him.

His old cloth blouse, with the shiny place on the back where his well-oiled cue had hung, lay in a heap on the floor with his old pow tail and coarse trousers; instead, he wore clothes of brocaded dark blue silk and his sandals were like those of a koonfoo. A cold wind was blowing up the street. It made him shiver, but he stood his ground and watched for the coming of Maggie Brown.

Every day for a week he watched, until on the eighth day he saw her running by with a shawl over her head and a jug in her hand. "Hi-lo," he cried, "hi-lo, Maggie Brown! you com' nichue?"

"Hello, John; how's things? I'll see yer when I get th' old man's beer," and she dashed on, while Ling went in and waited.

After awhile she came in with a rush.

"You lakkee China candy?" began Ling before she could say anything. "Heap good!" and he pushed a queer little box of keung towards her. "I lakkee you," he continued, while he picked at the gilt buttons on his blouse. "I bling you nice close, heap nice, you sabe? Makkee you nice close, you dless heap nice, sabe? You mally me, you have heap money."

"Marry you, John? Me old woman would pull the pigtail out of your head if she heard you talking like that."

"You mally me bimeby," said Ling, as though he felt sure he would win.

"So long, John," she said, as she went out munching the sweets. That was the first of the queer courtship. It struck Maggie seriously, as though she thought she might do worse.

"I don't know but what I'm marry the old chap," she said to herself. "I'll get all the clothes an' money I want."

There was a cat which used to sleep under Ling's counter. She grew fat on the scraps of chow suet and chue yunk which fell from the table, and altogether lived a life of peace. But the day Ling proposed to Maggie Brown the cat's manner changed. Instead of sleeping under the counter all the day she took to walking on the counter, mewing uneasily in a wailing voice which filled the room with a distressful sound.

Then she would pause in her walk, and sitting on her haunches glare at Ling with starting eyes. Once or twice he drove her away, but she came back and glared until her eyes turned from green to purple. Once he struck her with his bamboo t'ung, and she retreated to a high shelf and watched him.

"The evil one possesses her," said Ling, and he burnt more prayer sticks before his kashat Joss, but the wailing of the cat never ceased. She crept under Ling's bed that night and scratched at the matting on the floor; she paraded the little room, and her big shining eyes seemed to light up the dark place. From that night the cat was never at rest, and Ling became so stricken with a silent terror that he would go out into the street rather than cross her path.

He forgot about the cat a couple of days later, when Maggie Brown came in. She was better dressed than usual.

"Hello, John," she began, "I had a row with the old woman, and I've clim out. I'm dead tired of gettin' jumped on. Now, if you wanter marry me on ther square, I'm with you."

"You mally me," asked Ling, while a smile crept over his face. "Allee lite, I mally you."

"But I'll tell you, John," the girl went on, "you've got to cut that pigtail off and wear proper clothes. You got to be pretty near a white man. You got to be as white as clothes kin make you, an' you got to treat me white, too, or I'll shake you!"

Ling didn't want to lose his cue and he fought against what he considered a sacrilege, but he found Maggie relentless.

"I curl him up so," he said, as he twisted it about his head; "'n I puttee on hlat, so," and he pulled an old slouch hat down over his head, "'n noblody slee him, ha?"

No, even that wouldn't do, and Maggie went away saying: "I'm going up to a lady friend's o' mine ter stay ternite, John, an' I'll see you to-morrer, an' if ther pigtail don't go I don't git married, see?"

Ling didn't quite see, but he thought a lot. He thought Maggie was the prettiest girl he had ever seen. There was nothing ch'an about her. She had fine blue eyes, a trim figure and a shock of golden hair that attracted the Chinaman. The old cat jumped on the counter and howled and stared at him, and he went out to get away from those green eyes. He went to the Joss house and burned a lot of prayer sticks and paper. He made up his mind quickly after that, almost ran down the dark, creaking steps and across the way to where the barber lived.

"Take off this thing!" he said, when he sat down on the stool in front of the little razors and scissors.

"What!" said the barber, "are you crazy, or have the foreign devils got you too?"

"Cut it off, I tell you! Are you not here to do such work as this?"

"No, that is wrong. I knew your mother. What would she say if I did it? Her curses would come to me as well as to you, unworthy son."

Ling ran out while his courage lasted. He went to a Kwang-tung man who lived near Pell street and had no cue.

"Cut this thing off!" he said; he did not need to beg this time.

"Ha, ha!" laughed the Kwang-tung man, "you are going to be one of us; good!" and he picked up a big pair of shears. Snip! and Ling's cue was gone, cut close to his head. Out Ling ran, leaving his cue behind him. He went into his store and sat down to think, when up jumped the cat. Her eyes were yellow this time, and she howled mournfully.

"Get away, you evil thing!" and he pushed her off with a stick. He did not sleep that night; he dreamed strange things and saw strange sights; he thought of his home in far-off China, and his mother and the little Chinese maidens whom he had known before he came to the new country. He smoked and saw faces in the clouds. In the morning his eyes were heavy, and red with the opium. He lay in his bunk and smoked the opium until he heard a voice. It sounded as if it came from a great distance. It said:

"Hullo, where's John? In the back room? All right!"

The curtains were pulled back and Maggie Brown came in.

"How's yer pigtail?"

"I cut him off. He glone," said Ling half stupidly.

"That's good. I knew you'd come round. Git up if yer a-goin ter git married."

Ling had a vague idea that he was very happy. The opium had brought a peaceful feeling, but he was rather stupid. Maggie sat on the edge of the bunk and the cat walked across the room with stately tread, glaring at her. She paused at her feet, and at one bound was on her lap. "Hullo, pussy!" she said, putting her face down and stroking the fur. Like a flash a paw shot out; five hooked, sharp claws were unsheathed and dragged across the girl's cheek. She gave a frightened scream, and when Ling looked he saw the red lines down her face, from which blood was oozing. And the cat walked slowly across the floor with the same stately tread.

"I've got a nice-looking face now!" said Maggie, "and I think I'll have that cat killed."

"Less," said Ling, "kill him," and he rose dreamily and tried to drive the cat out, but she wouldn't go. He gave it up, and cursed the spirit which possessed the cat. "Some enemy of mine has died," he thought, "and his soul has gone into the cat." Maggie washed the blood from her face and put on three long strips of plaster, and then they went to the little mission house where they were married.

They went back to the store then. There was a letter on the counter near the scales. It had come from China and was for Yee John Ling. The cat sat near it and would not move. Ling pushed her away with a stick, but she came back. He was afraid to put his hand out for the letter, so he pulled it towards him with his pipe. It was from his native town.

"Your good mother is dead," it ran; "the scourge devil carried her away. It was her will that you return and marry the girl she has betrothed to you."

The letter fell from Ling's hands; he looked up and saw the cat still staring at him.

"My mother's soul is there, to curse me," he whispered to himself, backing towards the door.

"It is she! She has come across the big water because I did not return," and he kept stepping backwards.

"The curse has come upon me!" And he felt for his cue. Then he looked at Maggie and saw the marks of the claws. With a shriek he opened the door and rushed out!

"John's gone crazy!" said Maggie to the attendant. "It's the opium, I guess. It knocks 'em all when they get the habit."

Ling never came back, so Maggie patched a truce with her mother and went back to the tenement. Nobody but the minister knows she is Mrs. Yee John Ling, and the new sign which swings over the door of the little store tells everyone who looks up at it that Sun Quong sells Chinese groceries there. Sun Quong was the attendant.

Pearson's Fresh Air Fund.

PEARSON'S FRESH AIR FUND is in the fourth year of its existence, and each year the field of its influence extends farther and farther. For the first two years the little children of the London slums were the only ones who benefited by it, but last year its usefulness was increased, and 25,000 street arabs from some of our largest provincial towns were by its agency able to enjoy a day in the country. This was in addition to the 49,074 London children, making 74,074 in all.

This year arrangements are being made to give at least 80,000 children in London and the large provincial towns a day in the country, and not only a day in the country, but plenty to eat and drink during that time—no small consideration to these city waifs, to whom an unlimited supply of beef-pie, bread and butter, jam, cake, and milk, is, indeed, an unknown experience. The money required to do this is £3,240, which we have every confidence will be subscribed by the readers of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, STHORT SORIES, HOME NOTES, and our other papers.

In making arrangements for these outings, Mr. C. Arthur Pearson guarantees that half the amount needed for each town shall be given, whether or not it is sent by the readers of our several papers. I have no doubt, however, that the money will come in, as it has done in former years, for, I think, of all charities that which benefits little children especially touches people's hearts. I feel sure that it will appeal to the readers of SHORT STORIES, who know how much their own little friends delight in the country.

If children in happy circumstances and surrounded by every pleasure do this, what must such an outing be to the small gutter child, with no idea beyond the squalid court or alley in which he lives?

But to return to the disposal of the money which we hope will be entrusted to us. This year, all towns with a population of 200,000 more have been included in the list of the Fresh Air Fund. Our readers are so widespread that I am sure they will be glad to know which towns these are. The following is the list:—London, 40,000; Birmingham, 5,000; Liverpool, 5,000; Manchester, 5,000; Glasgow, 5,000; Belfast, 4,000; Leeds, 3,000; Sheffield, 3,000; Edinburgh, 2,000; Hull, 2,000; Bradford, 2,000; Nottingham, 2,000; Bristol, 2,000.

I give this list hoping that readers will interest themselves in the especial branches nearest to them, and will go and see the real delight experienced by the children.

Now, with reference to the expenditure, it cost but ninepence to give each child a day in the country, with plenty of food and drink. You will understand, therefore, that every farthing of the money sent is given to the children, the whole of the heavy working expenses being paid by PEARSON'S and the Ragged School Union.

Every little helps, even if it bebut nine pence for one child. To those who are blessed with means I would say that £8 2s. gives a day's enjoyment to a complete party of 200 children with a proportionate number of teachers to take care of them.

Subscriptions addressed to PEARSON'S WEEKLY Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., will be gratefully acknowledged in the columns of PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

RAISING THE DEAD.

TOWARDS the middle of the fourteenth century there suddenly appeared in Florence a personage calling himself Dr. Attrapeccini. Whence he came no one knew. His name indicated an Italian origin; but, from his accent in speaking, one would have supposed him to be a German, while his long beard, grave expression, and majestic bearing seemed suggestive of the Orient. Certain manuscripts, indeed, declare him to have been a native of Gascony; but the authenticity of the manuscripts has not been proved.

Whatever might be his nationality, however, the doctor had no sooner arrived in Florence than he caused to be announced, with a grand flourish of trumpets, cornets and drum, that on Tuesday, the 1st of May, at precisely six o'clock in the morning, he would repair to the city's cemetery, and there restore to life five persons of his own choosing.
